Mr. DOBSON. Before we leave this place we will have to designate the number of the districts, and we may as well do it now as at any other time. If the matter were left to the Legislature, we might insert these words, but at the first election under the new Constitution they are to be elected as we district the State. I think, therefore, that we may as well leave the amendment as it is.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well; I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend the section by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, That every organized county shall be entitled to elect at least one member of the House of Representatives."

In support of his amendment, Mr. B. addressed the Convention as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have considered this question as being one of great importance, and as I have desired to submit my views upon the subject to the Convention, although it is near the hour at which we usually adjourn, if no other gentleman desires to continue the debate, I will proceed to state those views as briefly as I am able, consistently with the nature and importance of the question. The report made by the Chairman of the Committee on the Legislative Department (Mr. Bright) proposes to empower the General Assembly to reduce the House of Representatives to sixty members, and also that the Senate may be reduced to not less than one-third of the number of the House. Now, sir, to this reduction of the House of Representatives, I am utterly opposed; and so far from desiring to see that body reduced below its present number of one hundred, I would much rather see it increased to one hundred and fifteen or a hundred and twenty members, and a provision inserted that would secure to each county in the State at least one Representative. On this question, I consider myself bound by instructions.

At the Convention at which I was placed in nomination for a seat in this body, the following, among other propositions, was laid down:

"The division of the State into single districts for the election of Representatives; but each county to have at least one member of the House of Representatives."

And, sir, I stand here to defend, to the utmost of my power, both of these principles. Should we, as proposed in the proposition I have just read, give to each organized county in the State one member of the House of Representatives, we could then reduce the Senate to thirty-four members, which would be a reduction in that body of sixteen members from the number of which it is at present constituted. Add these sixteen to the present number of the House of Representatives, and it would make that House consist of a hundred and sixteen members. There are now ninety organized counties in the State, and it would of course take ninety out of the hundred and sixteen members to represent these counties. That would leave an excess of twenty-six members to be distributed among the largest counties. This arrangement would give two members to every county having the number of 2500 free white male persons, over the age of twenty-one years, and would include one of the counties which I represent (Allen) which has 3214 free white male citizens, as returned by the Auditor of State. But, sir, if the Convention is not prepared to go that far, let us provide that any county having one-half of the ratio, shall be entitled to send one member. This would secure to all the counties numbering over 2000 free white male persons, two Representatives; and would allow to all the counties having one thousand such persons, one Representative.

Sir, I cannot but think that some concession should be made by the large counties to the smaller counties in the northern part of the State.

The gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelson) has said that we must either take territory or population as a basis of representation, and I understood him to say that if we take one of these principles, we shall be necessarily compelled to abandon the other. Now, sir, with all deference to that gentleman, I do not see that any such necessity follows at all. Allow me to ask him why we may not unite both of these principles? I am decidedly of opinion that the Senate should be based upon the whole number of inhabitants; but I am for basing the House of Representatives on the whole number of free white male persons, over the age of twenty-one years; and then taking into view in the apportionment of the House of Representatives that each county, as a political organization, is entitled to be represented, I think the uniting of all these elements in the apportionment will, in my opinion, not only be productive of the most beneficial results, but be entirely satisfactory to a great majority of the people of the State. If we look at the House of Representatives of the United States, we there see that each State has at least one Representative in Congress; and all men admit that it is a correct principle. It works well in the National Government, and I can see no reason why the same principle should not operate equally well in a State Government.

Sir, it has been said in this debate that those of us who are disposed to stand by the small counties in this, the severest hour of their trial, are disposed to introduce the odious principle that property and not numbers should be represented in the popular branch of the Legislature. Let me here say, sir, once for all, that this charge is without the slightest foundation, and that nothing can be further from the truth than such an imputation. No, sir; it is because we think that property should not have a preponderating influence in the government of this State that we desire to see the large counties limited in the number of representatives they may have. Not, sir, that we desire to prevent capital from having the weight that legitimately belongs to it, but we are opposed to its possessing the all-controlling influence in the Legislature.

Sir, the great interest of the State of Indiana is agricultural; and while that class of our population engaged in these pursuits retain the ascendancy in the councils of our State, we have no reason to fear but that she will be well governed. Let us not, however, attempt to conceal from ourselves the fact that the towns and cities of our State are rapidly on the increase; that banks, insurance companies, railroads, and other corporations and associations have increased beyond anything we could have expected, or even dreamed of a few years ago, and that, at no distant day, unless some measures are taken to prevent it, there is reason to fear that the capital and moneyed influence of the State will govern its legislation. And, sir, it is because I find that in nearly all the large counties, such as Jefferson, Marion, Tippecanoe, Vigo, and others, large cities are gaining the ascendancy, and sending up here their three or four members to the popular branch of the State Legislature, that I desire to see a provision inserted in the new Constitution that shall retain and secure to the farmers in the new and sparsely settled portions of the State their full share in the representation of the State. In regard to the increase of population in the States of this Union, it is a fact that has been well ascertained, that, after they reach a certain point in population, the rural districts remain stationary, while the towns and cities continue to increase. In many of the old States the population of the country has even decreased to a very great extent, while the large cities and towns are constantly drawing the population to them. I therefore contend, that, in fixing the principle for the apportionment of representation, which, for aught we know, is to continue for a century to come, these facts should be constantly borne in mind; and unless we do bear them in mind, it will be found that, in time, the agricultural counties will be too much at the disposal of the commercial counties, having within their limits the large cities and towns of the State.

And now, sir, let me again repeat what has already been observed by others—that the principle for which we contend is not new, notwithstanding that some gentlemen would seem to insinuate such to be the case. It is a great mistake to suppose that numbers is the only principle that has heretofore been observed in this country in regard to representation. In addition to the General Government, to which I have already alluded, I would direct the attention of members to the book of Constitutions of the several States of the Union, which are now lying on their tables. This book, I presume, will be regarded as the collected wisdom of the American people in regard to the best method of construing organic law for the wise government of a people; and by turning over these pages what do we find? In Massachusetts, Connecticut, and the rest of the New England States, it is expressly provided that each township shall have one member in the lower branch of their Legislature; and in several of the States, the number of representatives in the popular branch of the Government amounts to three or four hundred. In New York and Pennsylvania, the agricultural interests of these States, in order to secure themselves against the overpowering influence of their great cities, have provided in their new Constitutions that each county shall have at least one member in the House of Representatives. In New Jersey, one representative is sent from each county, without regard to its population. The same principles may be found in the Constitutions of Delaware and Maryland. In North Carolina, my own native State, under their new Constitution, each county, without respect to its population, is entitled to send one member to the popular branch of the Legislature, whether it has the ratio fixed in the Constitution or not. It is the same in Georgia and in South Carolina. In the State of Louisiana, it is expressly provided in her new Constitution that "each parish shall have at least one representative." In Tennessee, the rule was adopted that every county having two-thirds of the ratio of representation should have one representative; and I am told by a gentleman I have reason to believe is well informed upon the subject, that, practically, this gives to all her counties one representative. I have not had time to examine the Constitutions of all the States minutely, but I find that the Constitutions of Alabama, Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Michigan, each contain a provision that each county shall be entitled to at least one representative; and a friend, who has examined the matter, informs me that the Constitutions of twenty-five out of the thirty-one States of the Union, in some shape or other, contain the same principle. Now, sir, with this evidence before us, am I not justified in saying that the united experience of our country requires us to adopt this principle, or one similar to it? Sir, the more this subject is examined, the more I am satisfied it will be found that there is nothing so really odious in allowing each county which has one-half or two-thirds of the ratio to be represented in the popular branch of our State Legislature.

Sir, I cannot but believe that when the State Government has come to the conclusion that any portion of the territory of the State should be organized into a county government, it would seem to me as necessarily following that the interest of that portion of the territory would be so separate that from any other county that it ought to be represented in the government that had organized it. Sir, I am not only a "State rights" man in regard to our National Government, but I am, to some extent, a State rights man in county matters; and I hope that this Convention will re-organize the county boards and vest in them the power of local legislation, and thus render it unnecessary that the Legislature of our State should be occupied with that class of business. The business which even now is committed to their care is very important. They have to act on all claims against the county; they have to take care of the poor; to erect county buildings; to construct roads and bridges; and to transact various other important business which I have not time now to mention. And how, could these miniature republics be properly represented in the great council of the State, unless the principle for which we contend should be adopted? Can it be done by attaching them to some adjoining county? Sir, there are many questions which have reference to each county in its capacity of a separate political organization which never could be fully and fairly represented by a person who had his feelings and wishes divided by representing at the same time another county. I have known of jealousies and unfriendly feelings existing between counties when they have been attached together for purposes of representation, and I have always looked upon the joining of counties together for such purposes, as an evil that, if it were possible, should be avoided. When a person is elected to represent two counties, whatever may be said to the contrary, it practically results in his becoming the representative of but one; for it is a matter of course that he will be attached to the county in which he resides; and in all local matters he will be disposed to give more particular attention to its interests than to the interests of the other county, especially where the interest of the two counties might happen to conflict. There was much truth in the remark of the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) that there was now a double necessity that as far as possible, each and every county in the State should be represented in the Legislature, and for the very reason that he suggested. We have decided to have the General Assembly meet but once in two years. Now, we know that when two counties are attached together for the purposes of electing a representative, they usually take it in turns; and thus under the new Constitution, one of such counties would only in fact be represented once in four years. I repeat, sir, that if the system reported by the committee on the legislative department should be carried into effect, it would do manifest injustice to the smaller counties. In my opinion the new counties in the northern portions of the State, of all others, need most to be represented in the Legislature, to enable them to secure their rights. These counties are just organized and are now being settled. They are, as it were, just in the chrysalis state, and for that very reason they stand more in need of attention than the older counties, whose interests are permanent, and which have already received the fostering care of the Government. The remoteness, too, of these counties from the seat of Government, makes it doubly necessary that each of them should have some one upon the floor of the House of Representatives who would in truth and in fact, and not in name only, represent their interests.

Sir, I know that some of the smaller counties in the northern portion of the State have been held up to ridicule on this floor; and it has been triumphantly asked here if such counties, with their sparse population, were each to have as many representatives as Wayne, with her four thousand seven hundred and eighty-two polls. No, sir; no one has ever contended for this. We have no objection that Wayne and the other large counties should have their two or three representatives. All that we ask is, that each of these small counties should have, at least, one representative. Suppose, sir, that the population of these northern counties is now sparse, is that any reason why they should be deprived of their voice, when you have already recognized their separate territorial existence?

But, say gentlemen from the large counties, the small counties will be allowed each a representative once in four years; or should there be some three of them joined together to form a representative district, then once in six years; and that once in two years they will be allowed to participate in electing a representative for the whole district. It is contended that this ought to be sufficient for them; and that at all events one person ought to be able to represent three or four such counties. Sir, need I repeat what I have already said, that the interests of even contiguous counties, are not always identical, and that the person elected to represent them, necessarily becomes the representative of one in preference to the others, for the reason that his personal interests and attachments unite him in feeling with the county in which he resides. Besides, sir, as is frequently the case where one county is the larger of the two, it will overpower and entirely control the representation, and thus the smaller county goes entirely unrepresented if the interests of the counties should in any way conflict. For all these reasons, then, which, whatever weight they may have with the Convention, have great weight with me, I think the course we ought to pursue is, to give to each of the counties, at least one representative.

I now come to speak of another feature of this report to which I object. For anything that I can yet see, the odious principle of representing fractions, by what is termed in the language of the politicians of this State, the system of "floats," will be continued if the report of the committee should receive the sanction of the Convention. I think, sir, that we should endeavor to fall upon some plan which will effectually put an end to this system and make the representative districts permanent, so that no party hereafter in power by this system of gerrymandering may perpetuate their power in defiance of the will of the people. Sir, this system holds out too many inducements to do injustice to political opponents, not to be abused; and in my opinion, no majority in either party, ought ever to be entrusted with it. I am aware, sir, that equality between counties is not to be obtained. There will ever be fractions; and therefore mathematical accuracy cannot be had in any system of apportionment, sir, if counties were not already organized, and if we were at liberty to disregard township and county lines, and begin at the confluence of the Ohio and Wabash, in Posey county—and, sir, I believe that we always begin in the pocket to apportion the representation for any purpose—and there count the first two thousand voters and authorize them to send a member to the Legislature, and thus proceed on through the State until every two thousand polls should have a representative, we might make the representation equal. But this we cannot do. On the contrary, in any system of apportionment which we may adopt, we must have reference to the existing political organization in the State. I have already alluded to the fact that both in our national and State Government—and I may add that in every representative government in the world where they pretend to have a system of popular representation—they are compelled from necessity to have some reference to the local division established by law in apportioning their representatives. It was a wise institution of the great Alfred, and much improved upon by our pilgrim forefathers, to divide the country into counties and townships. They have ever been looked to in our political organization, and from this division some of the most beneficial effects have resulted to our Government. They already exist in this State, and we cannot disregard them in any plan of apportionment which we may adopt, even if we should desire to do so. And, sir, allow me to say further, that as long as any attention is paid to the political organization of the counties, perfect equality in representation cannot be obtained. Sir, we are compelled, in all our efforts, to equalize the representation to take in a county here, and to throw away a county there, to enable us make the fraction larger or smaller; and it was in attempting to correct this evil of large fractions that the system of floats, to which I have alluded, was introduced, which has since been so much perverted by both of the great political parties of this State.

And now, sir, in connection with this subject, let me call the attention of the Convention to another feature of the system heretofore practiced in the State which does great injustice to the small counties, and even some injustice to the medium sized counties, but not to the same extent. I am told that the whole number of polls in our State is not far from 200,000. If they do not reach that number now, they probably will do so by the time of the first apportionment under the Constitution which we may adopt. And, sir, if we limit the representatives in the popular branch of the Legislature to one hundred, we can see how this system will practically work. Take Marion county, for instance, with her 4226 polls, and she would be entitled to two representatives and would have but a small fraction. Now, sir, supposing that there were four counties like Allen, the one in which I reside, with 3214 polls. Each county would be entitled to send one representative, and each would also have a fraction of over 1200 polls which would make their united fractions over 4800 polls, which would go unrepresented, thus losing two representatives in the district of country comprising the four counties. Sir, do we not all see that every county must lose a fraction, and that the more counties there are, the more chances there are of losing fractions, and that very frequently the smaller counties have much larger fractions than the larger ones? I have not examined the matter sufficiently to speak with certainty, but I am told that in both of the apportionments of 1840, and 1845, three-fourths of all the fractions which went unrepresented in the House of Representatives, were lost in the middle sized and small counties. Sir, I cannot believe that the framers of the Constitution of 1816, ever designed that such an unjust system as this should be adopted in our State. I learned from one of the members of the Convention that framed that Constitution—the late Col. Polk of Fort Wayne—that no other idea was entertained in the Convention than that every county should have at least one member in the popular branch of the General Assembly. And, sir, in support of this idea we find in the very first apportionment, and in several of the subsequent ones, that each county, without reference to its population, was authorized to send one member to the House of Representatives. Indeed, sir, if we turn to the Constitution, we will find that in the very language employed, this idea is fully carried out, for in speaking of the apportionment of representatives in the House it uses this language:

"The number of Representatives shall, at the several periods of making such enumeration, be fixed by the General Assembly, and apportioned among the several counties, according to the number of white male inhabitants above twenty-one years of age in each."

But, sir, when it comes to speak of the apportionment of the Senate it says:

"The number of Senators shall, at the several periods of making the enumeration before mentioned, be fixed by the General Assembly and apportioned among the several counties or districts to be established by law according to the number of white male inhabitants of the age of 21 years in each," &c.

Now, sir, it may be observed by gentlemen what a marked distinction there is between the language which relates to the apportionment for the House and that for the Senate. When it refers to the House of Representatives it speaks only of counties, and says nothing whatever in regard to districts. On the other hand, when it refers to the apportionment of Senators, the language is entirely changed, and it speaks not of counties only, but also of districts.

This, sir, has always been conclusive to my mind that the old Constitution never contemplated that counties should be joined together and formed into districts for the purpose of representation in the Lower House; but that, on the contrary, in the formation of senatorial districts, they might be so constituted if it was found to be necessary.

Sir, I am fully satisfied, from all that I have heard and read upon the subject, that the Constitution intended that the very principle I am contending for should prevail; and one objection I have to the report is, that it now expressly does what the old Constitution never authorized to be done—that is, to provide that two counties may be united together for the purpose of electing one representative to the popular branch of the General Assembly. As there will of necessity be fractions, the only way to represent them is either by the system of "floats" or by allowing each county to have one member or at least one to every county having one-half or two-thirds of the ratio of representation.

This would secure one member to each of the counties of Adams and Wells, which constitute a part of my district, and would thus comply with the instructions which were given to me when I was placed in nomination. It is true that one of the counties which I represent upon this floor (Allen) has no favors to ask in this respect. She is now the eighth county in the State in point of population, contains the largest area of any county in the State, and has more good tillable uncultivated lands, with prospects in every respect equal to those of any other county in Indiana. Sir, I was surprised when, during the past year, I passed through the different parts of that county, to find what extensive tracts of rich land were lying unsettled, held by those greatest of all enemies of a new country, the land speculators. We have a flourishing city now numbering between four and five thousand inhabitants, and it will soon double, and probably treble its present population; and, sir, unless I am greatly mistaken. Allen county, at no distant day, is destined to be the "Empire" county of the State, and Wayne, which has heretofore been designated as the "old Dominion," will be compelled to yield the palm to Allen. But, sir, strong as she now is, and encouraging as are her prospects for the future, she would despise to deprive her sister counties who are so unfortunate as to be less prosperous than herself of a fair and equal representation with her in the legislation of the State. If, sir, she were like some other counties of the State which seem never to look beyond their own borders, unless it be to gain some political ascendancy in the affairs of the State, she, too, would probably desire to retain the present number of one hundred members in the House of Representatives, and to continue what the present system practically carries out—to give the advantage of all or nearly all the fractions to the large counties. No, sir, we desire nothing of the kind. On the contrary, we desire that the younger and weaker counties should be protected by having a fair representation on the floor of at least one of the branches of the General Assembly.

Sir, in addition to the instructions to which I have referred, I am also instructed to vote for a plan requiring the General Assembly either themselves to divide, or cause to be divided, those counties having more than one member, so that the districts may be single. This might be done by the county boards of the respective counties, dividing them into as many districts as there are members to be elected in the county. Should this principle be carried out, it should be so regulated in the Constitution that the county boards would not be authorized to divide any township in forming a district; and the districts ought to be constituted of contiguous townships, and other necessary provisions ought to be inserted in the Constitution calculated to secure a just and equal division of the counties for the purpose of representation.

Sir, I favor the single district system for many reasons, only a few of which I can now take time to mention. In the first place, I regard it as a method better calculated than any other to arrive at the real opinions and wishes of the voters of the State upon all measures of public policy, and this from the fact that it brings the representative home directly to his constituents, and requires him to be chosen by those only who are best acquainted with him.

This, sir, I hold to be a very important principle—to make every representative as directly responsible as possible, to those he represents. I favor it also, for the reason that it gives no more political influence, so far as voting is concerned, to a person residing in one portion of the State, than it does to a person residing in another. Sir, I deem it of much importance that we should at least, make the effort to equalize the votes in every part of the State as far as possible; and I cannot see how this can be done while we allow the voters residing in those counties having three or four members, to vote for the whole number of members to which a county may be entitled, and thus give the voter in one county, four votes, whereas, were he residing in another county, he could only give but one. And, sir, I object to this system further, on the ground that it gives to the members when assembled at the Capital, from the large counties, a decided advantage. Inasmuch as the same influence elected them all, they usually act in concert on all questions coming before the body of which they are members. I know that it has been contended here, that because four thousand voters in one county are entitled, each, to vote for four members, the representatives, when assembled in the halls of legislation, have only four votes, and that this system does not really give to persons residing in those counties more power than it does to the residents of any other four counties, each having a thousand voters. But, sir, were gentlemen to contend with me until doomsday, they cannot convince me that their position is practically correct. Need I say to gentlemen, that as you concentrate political power, you thereby render it doubly efficient? And when those gentlemen shall make me believe that in any election for a member of a deliberative assembly fifty votes given by fifty men can ever be made as efficient as fifty votes controlled by two men, then, and not till then, will I believe their theory. Sir, when this proposition was up some weeks since in the form of a resolution of inquiry, introduced by the gentleman from Putnam, (Mr. Stevenson,) it did not then appear to receive that favorable attention from the Convention that would seem to indicate its adoption; and from all that I have seen and heard since, I fear that neither it nor the proposition to give to the small counties a fair proportion of representation will be engrafted upon the Constitution. Sir, I shall repeat this much; because if the larger counties are determined to retain a principle which gives them an unfair advantage in the fractions, thus securing to them from two to three representatives each, it does seem to me that the single district system should be ingrafted upon the Constitution; for nothing, in my opinion, would probably tend more to reconcile the voters in the small counties, to the new Constitution, than for their delegates, when they return home, to be able to say to them—"It is true that the Convention refused to increase the House of Representatives as you desired, and would not give one member to each county, or even to those counties having one-half of the ratio of representation; yet we have so provided that a man in Wayne county cannot give four votes to your one, for we have arranged it so that he can only vote for one person in the district in which he resides; and, therefore, so far as this principle prevails, you have as much political weight in the affairs of the State as he has."

Sir, I hope this principle of dividing counties into districts, will prevail for another reason. It is the best calculated of any other system to break up the central influence in the counties which has heretofore exercised altogether too much control in the business affairs of the counties. I am told that three-fourths of all the members of this Convention reside at the county seats of their respective counties. Now if the Constitution required that counties sending more than one member to the House of Representatives, should be divided, then only one member, at any rate, in any one county, could reside at the county seat, and the farmers would have, at least, some chance of electing a man that would represent their interests. Sir, if no other reason had any weight, this one recommends the measure to my most cordial support, inasmuch as it prevents the overshadowing influence, which the large towns are rapidly acquiring, not only over the affairs of the counties in which they are located, but also over the legislation of your State.

Sir, in all ages, and in all countries, the influence of large cities and towns, when exercising a controlling power over the destinies of a people, has been detrimental to their best interests. I believe that the greatest of political philosophers now admit that it was the overshadowing influence of the city of Rome, that finally proved fatal to the prospects of that republic. If those laws had been passed which the true but much abused friends of their country advocated, and which were calculated to secure each Roman in the enjoyment of his home; if the political power of that great republic had been diffused among the honest yeomanry of the country, and not concentrated in their great metropolis and the other cities of the republic, it is more than probable that she would never have fallen a victim of the united evils of internal convulsions and foreign invasion.

We find too, sir, that the little Grecian republics were entirely ruled by their cities and towns, and that their luxury and licentiousness proved their ruin. Sir, I trust that we will avoid the rock on which they split—that we will place the rural districts forever beyond the control of the commercial parts of this State. I know, sir, that the idea that the towns of this State could ever attain such an influence as in any measure to control its legislation is deemed futile; but, sir, those gentlemen who have been connected with the legislation of your State tell me that even now when three or four of the largest towns of the State unite their influence on any subject, it is almost impossible to resist them; and if such is the case now what may it come to be when these towns shall have greatly increased in number and in size. Sir, we should not place the power of the State in the hands of this interest. Such a course is anti-republican, and contrary to the genius of our institutions. No, sir, every motive should induce us to disperse the power over the State, and not concentrate it at particular points where it may not always be used for the best interests of the people. I again repeat that the single district system ought to prevail, as I believe it is the most safe and efficient plan to equalize the power and influence of the large and the small counties.

Sir, it has been intimated by some of the members representing large counties that they are prepared to vote for an increase of the House of Representatives if those representing the interests of the small counties could be induced to reduce the Senate to some thirty-two or thirty-four members, provided that the whole number in both Houses did not exceed the present number of the members of the General Assembly—namely one hundred and fifty. So far as I am personally concerned I can say that I came here rather expecting, and perhaps desiring, a reduction of the Senate to some thirty-four or thirty-six members; but I expected an increase in the House of some fourteen or sixteen members, thus keeping the whole number of the members of the General Assembly as at present. I know that there are some who have shown a great anxiety to reduce the number in both Houses, thinking it would have a tendency to expediate legislation; but in this I think they are deceived; for it occurs to me that facts will show that in those States where they have the largest number of representatives—the New England States for instance—business is done with more dispatch than it is in smaller bodies. Now when we consider the present number of the inhabitants of the State, and the prospect that in some twenty years hence she will double her present population, I do think that one hundred and twenty men to represent her great interests in the popular branch of the Legislature are as few as ought to be asked for or desired.

But, sir, after all the argument that has been urged on this floor in regard to the Senate, I am still of opinion that, in point of numbers, it could be reduced to advantage, and I would go for it did I not think that by thus voting gentlemen might begin to entertain the idea that the House of Representatives could also be reduced with equal advantage, and might vote to reduce it accordingly. The opinion has been expressed by several gentlemen—in which I, in a great measure, concur—that the reduction of the Senate would tend to give more permanency to our legislation.

I know that it has been repeated on this floor until it has become almost threadbare, that one of the greatest evils complained of by the people of the State, and which, perhaps, operated as much as any other cause in requiring the convoking of this assembly, was “the evil of too much legislation;” and, more than all, “the constant changeability of our laws.” And, s'r, the question arises, how can these admitted evils be remedied in the organization of the legislative department of the Government? Now, sir, in my opinion, the most effectual manner of accomplishing this object is by improving the character of the Senate. If, by reducing the number of senators, and lengthening the term of their service to four years, we can draw forth the wisdom and worth of the State, we shall thereby do much, in my opinion, towards giving a permanent character to our State policy. Sir, I have heard it intimated that a proposition will be made to abolish the Senate entirely, or, if retained at all, it should be made the same as the House of Representatives, by being elected by the same voters, and for the same period of service. In this view, I certainly cannot concur, as I have always looked upon the Senate, in the institutions of our country, as a body, who, from the fact of their being composed of the older men of the country, and mostly possessing much experience, would be most likely to correct the evils of too much legislation. They should be men who are thoroughly acquainted with the affairs of the State, stable in character, not only from the fact of their holding well matured principles and opinions, but also from the fact that only one-half of them will be changed in every two years. This arrangement I regard as necessary, in order that those senators who are to supply the places of those who retire should have the benefit of the experience of those who are to remain. In so far, I agree with the report of the committee, that the length of their service should be four years, and that one-half of the body should be elected fresh from the people every two years. One of the greatest objections I have to the Senate, as at present constituted, is, that it is too numerous, and too similar in its character to that of the House of Representatives, and for that reason, operates as but a slight check upon the action of that body. The majority of the Senate is elected by single counties, and these counties, also, elect the majority of the members of the House. Being elected by the same voters and in the same counties, it has generally been found that what the representatives of these counties passed in the House, the persons representing the same counties in the Senate mostly sanctioned. Now, if the Senate is reduced to some thirty-six or forty members, it would take, in most of the districts—say three-fourths of them—two or three counties to make a senatorial district, and but very few senators would be chosen by single counties. This, I imagine, would have a much better tendency to constitute the Senate in such a way as to make it a reasonable check upon the House of Representatives; and if, in addition to this reduction, we should apportion the one House on the whole number of the inhabitants of the State, and the other on the whole number of polls, it would also better tend to produce this result, than to constitute them both upon the same basis. Sir, the subject is one that should command the deliberate consideration of this body.

Mr. President, I had designed to present some further views in regard to what I consider to be the proper plan of apportionment, and the best method of organizing the two houses, so as to make them not merely a check upon each other, in theory, but a check really and in fact. But as it is now late, and as I am not disposed to trespass further upon the patience of gentlemen, I will express, in conclusion, the hope that the amendment which I have submitted, or something similar in principle, will receive the approbation of this body.

The amendment I have submitted, or some other provision similar in its character, that will secure to the small counties and the agricultural districts from the overwhelming power of the large counties, and the leading commercial points of this State, would receive the sanction of this body.

Mr. DOBSON. It appears that we are getting a little entangled. The proposition of the gentleman from Allen is to amend the section, and is not an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. BORDEN. Then I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

The question was then taken on the amendment as amended, and the yeas and nays being ordered and taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Edmonston, Elliott, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hogen, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—67.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kinley, Logan, March, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—62.

So the amendment as amended, was adopted.

Mr. BROOKBANK offered to amend, by adding a proviso, that any county having two-thirds of a representative ratio, shall be entitled to one Representative; and after the year 1860 the Legislature shall have the power to increase the Representatives to any number, not exceeding 120.

Mr. COLFAX moved further to amend, so that such addition shall not increase the members of the General Assembly to a greater number than 150, in all. His object was to reduce the number of Senators, if the House should be increased.

Cries of "No, no, no."

Mr. FOSTER. Can there be a division of the question on the amendment offered? I cannot vote for the proviso. Although I voted for the amendment already passed, yet I feel it necessary that the smaller counties should be represented. By adopting the two-thirds ratio, the greater part of them will be represented. But if the amendment is persisted in, to give the Legislature from 115 to 120 members, I cannot vote for it, unless there is a division of the question.

I would here remark that I am pledged to my constituents to reduce the number of Senators and Representatives, so far as my single vote would go. I have voted so all the time, but have been out-voted, and I cheerfully submit. But I wish gentlemen to understand, if they wish to provide for the small counties, by giving them a two-thirds ratio, they will be mistaken; for myself and others will be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I wish to say a few words.

Mr. COOKERLY. I move that the Convention adjourn.

A division being called for, there were for the motion, yeas 48, noes 52.

So the motion did not prevail.

Mr. KENT moved to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. GOOTEE moved that the Convention adjourn; and pending the question on the amendment of Mr. COLFAX.

The Convention adjourned.

MR. BORDEN'S SPEECH

On the Compromise Resolutions, delivered in the Convention on the 3d inst.

I wish, sir, to ask whether, inasmuch as the gentleman from Posey has introduced a new proposition, and no motion to postpone indefinitely has been since made, it will not be in order now to make such a motion.

The PRESIDENT. The motion to postpone indefinitely is in order now, although it was not in order yesterday evening, a motion of the same kind having been made a short time before.

Mr. BORDEN. I move, then, sir, that the resolutions and pending amendments be indefinitely postponed; and I have a few words to say upon that motion. Yesterday when the Convention adjourned, I was addressing a few observations to this body in regard to this matter, and I wish to correct a misapprehension that I see prevailing in a paper of this morning. The paper seems to intimate that there was some difficulty between the gentleman from Posey and myself. It would seem, from this paper, that the impression has got abroad that I was addressing some observations to the gentleman from Posey of an unpleasant character. This, certainly, is a great misapprehension of the facts. Now I will state what I had in view on that occasion. And first, I will observe, that during the last summer I paid but little attention to the proceedings of Congress. I was absent from home during a great part of the time. After my return my time was occupied in attending to my affairs, and I had but little leisure to ascertain what was going on in Congress. I know but little, therefore, about the particulars of the compromise measures, and by the proposition which is here submitted to us we are called upon to indorse the whole of them together. As I was desirous of being more particularly informed upon the subject, I addressed certain questions to the gentleman from Posey, because he introduced the proposition, and I therefore supposed that he, having had more leisure than myself, had informed himself thoroughly of the proceedings of Congress in relation to those measures, or else he would not ask us to indorse them; and that he could inform the Convention whether we were acting properly or not in indorsing those measures by wholesale, and I stated to him at the time that I hoped he would give us this information. I say, then, that as regards the fugitive slave law, I have not had time to give it that thorough examination which so grave a subject really demands, not having had an opportunity to do so, and not knowing what constructions may be put upon it by the courts. I have heard, however, in conversation here in the Convention, some things stated in regard to the interpretation put upon it by the United States Judge in this district, which, if it be true, will prevent me from giving my support to all its features, although I say here that no man will go further than I will to sustain the Union. I will go as far as he who goes farthest to maintain the laws of the land so long as they remain in force on the statute book. And when gentlemen get up on this floor as they have done, and say that those who will not vote for the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne are disunionists, they do me injustice, and they do injustice to many others also. I said, a few days ago, that the Convention had nothing to do with such resolutions as these—that they were improperly introduced here, and that I did not think the Convention had any right to call upon me to express an opinion in regard to the subjects embraced in these resolutions; and that in my opinion the Convention ought to lay them upon the table, and return to its legitimate business, as my constituents did not send me here to do the business which properly appertains to Congress. What is it that this Convention should desire under the circumstances? They should chiefly desire to promote peace and harmony throughout the country. Ours is the province to pour oil upon the troubled waters, and not to agitate them. The excitement that prevailed has mostly subsided since the adjournment of Congress; for with the exception of a very few traitors at the South, and fanatical agitators at the North, there now remains nothing to disturb the tranquility of the country.

I have no doubt, sir, but there are many portions of the fugitive slave bill that requires modification; but I believe that the people of the country generally are disposed to have it executed until it is repealed or greatly modified. But, sir, this is not the only measure that is connected with the Congressional scheme of compromise, and which we are now asked to indorse by the wholesale. There is, for instance, the bill respecting the settlement of the boundary of Texas, and for the establishment of territorial governments for Utah and New Mexico. There may be, and probably are, objections to these measures which none of us now fully perceive. And for that reason, perhaps, all of us are not now ready to approve of them, yet it is submitted to us as one entire question, whether we approve of them as a whole or not. I was addressing certain questions, as I have said, to the gentleman from Posey, and among other things I asked gentlemen of this Convention, how many of them had read this fugitive slave bill, to see what particular provisions it contained. I inquired how many delegates on this floor had examined closely the proceedings of Congress in relation to these measures; and I asked the gentleman from Posey in particular, to inform this Convention whether it was not true that a committee was appointed in the Senate of the United States, consisting of Southern men, and others who usually acted with them; and whether they had not agreed upon the boundary between Texas and New Mexico, commencing at the south-western corner of the Indian territory, in about latitude 34, and running to the Rio Grande, near El Paso, in about latitude 32, which was to be the permanent boundary between that State and Territory; and if this line had been agreed upon it would not have transferred the greater portion of the valley of the Puerco river to Texas, and have thus transferred a territory as large as the State of Indiana from New Mexico to Texas?

But that the South, not satisfied with this, demanded still further concessions, and that thirty-six thousand more acres of free territory was, by this compromise measure, transferred to Texas, and the United States had to pay them ten million of dollars to induce them to take it. Are we prepared to say that they have done right? If they have not done so, it is true the act cannot be recalled; but I ask why should we be required to indorse their action? There are some things connected with those measures, that, had we been members of Congress, we might have voted for, and others we would have felt bound to oppose; but here we are called upon to indorse the whole of them together. Like young eaglets, we are to open our mouths and swallow down whatever our leaders may see proper to present to us. I, for one, am not prepared to indorse measures by wholesale. And I hold that this fugitive slave law ought not to be dragged in here for the purpose of obtaining an expression of our opinion upon it.

I now wish to call attention for a moment to some other points, which I hope will be carefully examined by the Convention before they indorse them. In the first place, sir, I wish to direct attention to the circumstance of free territory being taken from New Mexico and given to Texas to be made slave territory. Now I do not believe there is a man on this floor who will not say—at least I am satisfied that the gentleman from Posey himself, who has investigated this matter—will not pretend to say that there ever was a foot of country watered by the river Puerco, that was within the province of Texas. The country lying upon the Upper Rio Grande, including the valley of the Puerco, never was Texan territory, although the country below the mouth of the Pedidro, usually called the Lower Rio Grande, was. It was settled by the Spaniards long before any portion of the United States was settled. Yet the greater portion of the lower valley of the Puerco has been transferred to the Texas.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. The question before the Convention is, I believe, on the amendment to the resolutions. The gentleman is certainly wandering very far from the question under consideration.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion for indefinite postponement.

Mr. PEPPER did not press his point of order, and

Mr. BORDEN proceeded.

Now, sir, (said Mr. B.) I wish to state here what was said by Southern statesmen on this subject. I read, sir, from an address of Mr. Bailey, a distinguished member of Congress from Virginia, to his constituents, soon after the measures passed Congress which we are now asked to indorse. Speaking of the Texan boundary bill, he says:

"The bill converts forty-three thousand six hundred and thirty-seven square miles of free soil into slave territory, if the people residing upon it shall so decide when they form a constitution, preparatory to coming into the Union as a State. By the resolutions of annexation it is provided: 'New States of convenient size, not exceeding four in number, in addition to the said State of Texas, and having sufficient population, may hereafter, by consent of said State, be formed out of the territory thereof, which shall be entitled to admission under the provisions of the federal Constitution; and such States as may be formed out of that portion of said territory lying south of 36 deg. 30 min. of north latitude, commonly known as the Missouri Compromise line, shall be admitted into the Union with or without slavery, as the people of each State asking admission may desire; and in such State or States as shall be formed out of said territory north of said Missouri Compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crime) shall be prohibited.' Most of the territory last referred to is included within the limits of New Mexico."

Now here, sir, it is expressly admitted that this bill has taken forty-three thousand square miles of free territory and transferred it to Texas, to be made slave territory. Are we prepared to say that is right? That after the South had fixed upon its ultimatum in regard to this matter, it is right to go north of the line and take territory and transfer it to a slave State? And is not that the operation of the measure? And are we prepared to indorse it?

Well, sir, there is another subject.

It will be recollected that some thirty years since, when Missouri was admitted, it was agreed that slavery should never extend beyond what was termed the Missouri Compromise line. That is to say, north of 36 deg. and 30 min. But it is now said that these compromise measures, adopted at a late session of Congress, rescinds this agreement. Listen a moment to what Mr. Bailey says upon this subject. He says:

"The act establishing a territorial government for New Mexico, provides, 'that when admitted as a State, the said territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their Constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission.' The absolute prohibition of slavery north of 36 deg. 30 min. is removed by this provision."

Now, sir, is this Convention prepared to say that in violating that compromise, our senators and representatives done their duty to the people of this State? For my own part, I can only say that if this be the true construction to be put upon that measure, it can never receive my assent. The measure being passed, it may not be expedient now to interfere with it, but I can see no necessity for our coming out and indorsing it; especially as I do not believe any gentleman upon this floor was sent here to do it.

Well, sir, this bill is understood by some to require the establishment of slavery in the territories. They so understand it themselves at the South; or, they say if it does not expressly establish slavery in New Mexico and Utah, it at least recognizes it as already existing there. I hope the Convention will indulge me in reading another extract from the same address: "But I shall not go into that question. In this case it is unnecessary; for the territorial bills and the fugitive slave bill each recognize the legality of slavery in the Territories. In the former it is enacted that—

"Writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of said supreme court shall be allowed, and may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same regulations as from the circuit courts of the United States, where the value of the property or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party, or other competent witness, shall exceed one thousand dollars, except only that in all cases involving title to slaves the said writs of error or appeals shall be allowed and decided by said supreme court without regard to the value of the matter, property, or title in controversy; and except also that a writ of error or appeal shall also be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of said supreme court created by this act, or of any Judge thereof, upon any writ of habeas corpus involving the question of personal freedom."

It will be perceived that there are two classes of cases here provided for; the last, between the negro and his master, involving the question of his personal freedom; the first between other parties, involving title to slaves. This last clearly contemplates the existence of slavery in the territories."

It is contended by them, too, that slavery is recognized as already existing in the Territories of New Mexico and Utah, because one of these compromise measures which we are required to indorse, expressly says that slaves escaping from the Territories in the United States, shall be returned to their masters.

Mr. Baly says as follows:

"Besides this, the act providing for the recapture of fugitive slaves, throughout contemplates the escape of slaves from our Territories. It enacts: 'that when any person held to service or labor in any State or territory, or in the District of Columbia, shall escape,' &c. Slavery is prohibited in Minnesota and Oregon; and if it is also prohibited in Utah and New Mexico, our only other Territories, then there is no subject to which a part of that law can refer."

Now, sir, Minnesota is not slave territory. The ordinance applies there and applies to Oregon. What territory could they escape from, if not from New Mexico and Utah; these four being the only existing Territories.

By turning to the bill organizing a territorial Government for New Mexico, it will be found that the persons who settle in that Territory, are guaranteed their right to property in it.

If, therefore, a slave holder goes there with his property, it is granted to him in that very bill, or at least this is the Southern construction of the law, that he shall hold his slaves there. It goes on and provides further, that in all cases arising between master and slave, such cases shall be determined by the court. If there be no slaves there how could there be any controversy between master and slave. I say, I fear this bill has indirectly transferred slavery there, yet we are asked here to gulp it down.

I have said, I am not disposed to interfere with these compromises. Let them go. Perhaps the only thing that can now be done is to modify the fugitive slave law. But when called upon to indorse them bodily, I say it is going too far. And it is for the reason that several of the members desired to hear the views of the gentleman from Posey, that I rose to make the inquiries that I was propounding to him yesterday previous to the adjournment, not for the purpose of trespassing upon the time of the House, nor from any unfriendliness to him, as the gentleman is well aware. I am not disposed now to occupy much of the time of the House. I repeat, sir, that I am as much devoted to the Union as those who make such great pretensions of it here.

Much has been said, sir, about a Union party here. I am for the Union, but I go into no new organization with any one. The platform of the democratic party is broad enough for me. I have this to say, that these propositions ought to have been permitted to remain on the table, or now to be indefinitely postponed; for if gentlemen will keep them here, and continue to agitate matters that do not belong to, or are not properly cognizable in, this body, I will say that, in my opinion, we have no right to sit here and employ our time in such a manner. For myself, I do not think that I ought to take my pay for the three days, time that we have thus foolishly spent in discussing this subject. We are not attending to the business for which we are sent here. I have done all I could to get rid of the question, and I now say to the Convention that I shall take the occasion, while they are squabbling on this miserable subject, to attend to some business matters, and when I shall hear that you have got through with this discussion, and are ready to return to the legitimate business of the Convention, I shall return to my seat, and assist in revising the Constitution, and not until then.

I desire to treat the Convention respectfully, but I must say that I look upon the whole proceeding as out of place.

SATURDAY, DEC. 7, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MILLS.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. BORDEN moved that it be

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Convention be directed to address the Governor, and the Treasurer, and Auditor of State, and request them to procure some other room for the sitting of the Convention.

It will be observed, said Mr. B., by turning to the act authorizing the call of this Convention, that it is provided in that act, as follows:

[Mr. B. read from the act.]

I take the view that it is the duty of these officers to supply a place for the sitting of this Convention. I apprehend that it will be generally admitted that we shall be hardly able to get through with our business before the session of the Legislature commences, and I do not suppose that the Convention has any disposition to hold possession of this Hall, to the exclusion of the Legislature. I understand that the officers of State are anxious to commence sitting up this Hall for the accommodation of the Legislature, and that it is a work that will require some little time. There is now only about three weeks remaining, before the Legislature will meet, and perhaps it will require some little time for these officers to look around and select a suitable place for the accommodation of the Convention. I merely wish to call the attention of members to this subject. I am not strenuous as to whether the resolution which I have offered shall be adopted. The Convention may take any other course that they think proper.

Mr. WATTS moved to amend the resolution so that it would read "procure a place for the sittings of the House of Representatives."

They are, said Mr. Watts, a smaller body than this. We are very comfortably situated here, and if it is made the duty of these officers to provide a place for the Convention, they can just as easily provide a place elsewhere for the Legislature. We are the occupying claimants, and if they come on and have no place to meet in, let them look out for a place for themselves. ["Consent."]

Mr. KENT moved to strike out the words "some other room," and insert the words "Supreme Court Room."

It was, he said, a much better room than this.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I imagine that the gentleman from Dearborn is hardly in earnest in regard to our claiming the possession of this Hall under the occupying claimant law. And I am induced to come to this conclusion, sir, for the reason that they would also be compelled to provide another building for their sitting. They would necessarily be compelled to have a room for the House of Representatives and another for the Senate, whilst the Senate chamber in this building would be lying idle. This body being an indivisible body, can occupy any room that may be selected, either the Supreme Court Room, or Concert Hall, or Masonic Hall, and I have no doubt we could get almost any of the Churches for the time being. I therefore think the original resolution would be the proper one to adopt, I hope the Convention will not undertake indirectly to disturb the representatives of the people, or prevent them from holding their sessions at the usual place, particularly as it would require two rooms for the accommodation of the General Assembly.

Mr. MURRAY. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn, if adopted, would occasion a good deal of inconvenience. The Senate and House of Representatives have frequent occasion to interchange messages, and they should be therefore at no great distance from each other; and I cannot but feel that it would be an act of usurpation that would not be very creditable to this body if we were to keep possession and exclude the Legislature from this Hall. I hope that if another place is to be provided it will be for the Convention and not for the Legislature.

Mr. STEVENSON. The amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn I think should not be adopted. At the time the act calling this Convention was passed, there is no doubt it was supposed that the Convention would be able to complete its labors before the time fixed for the meeting of the Legislature. I have some doubts, also, about the propriety of adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Floyd; at any rate I think it should not be adopted until we ascertain whether the court room will answer the purpose. There is another thing: I am inclined to believe that this body would be much less disturbed if we should be at a greater distance from the Legislature. There will be a constant disposition on the part of the members of one body to be present at the sittings of the other, whenever there is any question of interest debated. It will, therefore, be better for us, I think, to have a room at some distance from the Legislature, and I think it is time that we should be taking some steps to procure a suitable place. I should be sorry to see this Convention adjourn, as I have heard it suggested, to meet again after the Legislature shall have terminated its session, because it would have the effect of protracting the final close of our labors to altogether too late a period. I am in favor of finishing the work now while we are here. I trust that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Allen will be adopted.

Mr. GIBSON moved that the amendments be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to

Mr. KELSO. I wish barely to make an inquiry, and it is, whether we have a right to call upon these officers to furnish a place for the sitting of this Convention, when they have already discharged that duty. When we first came here we were advised of the inconveniences we would be subjected to if we were to occupy the Hall, and began casting about for a more suitable place for an accommodation. At that time we did not think of calling upon these officers to furnish a different place for us. We sent our own committee to make the arrangement. Why should we not do so again! It is a mere change of position. It is true we have the occupancy of this Hall at present, and I apprehend there is no legal power that could turn us out, yet I am for yielding to the House of Representatives on the ground that it would be incommoding the two bodies, the Senate as well as the House, if we retain possession of this Hall. For this reason I am decidedly in favor of surrendering up the Hall. But I would inquire why may not a committee of our own body select a room? They will take pains to make arrangements at the cheapest rate, and will supply us with conveniences equal to those we have here. I will move, therefore, to amend the resolution by striking out the officers named in it, and inserting "a committee of five."

Mr. BORDEN. Allow me, sir, to explain my views in relation to this matter. In the first place, one of the objects which I had in view was, to bring up the question in regard to adjournment. It has been talked of somewhat that the Convention might adjourn to meet again after the close of the session of the Legislature. If we are to adjourn and go home and return again, the sooner we determine it the better. I do not say that I am for adjournment. I only say that if we are to adjourn over the holidays, the adjournment should take place soon. At all events, we ought to determine whether we shall go on and complete our business, or have an intermission. If we are going to adjourn at all it ought to be done soon. And in reply to the gentleman from Switzerland I have only to say this, that the provision of the law which I have read declares that the Governor, Auditor, and Treasurer of State are authorized to provide suitable accommodations for this Convention. I think that the Legislature designed to put this matter into the hands of those officers. We have the right, I have no doubt, to provide a place for ourselves if we choose to do so. I am not strenuous about the matter, but I do not think that there is any disposition on the part of the Convention to hold this Hall to the exclusion of the Legislature. It would produce a bad state of feeling. And I doubt whether we could hold it. The law does not authorize the Legislature to meet any where else than in this Hall, and as arrangements must be made for our accommodation elsewhere, I think it is time that the matter was decided. If the Convention choose to appoint a committee I have no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland, and I would remark to the Convention, as many gentlemen are, perhaps, not aware of the fact, that there is in this city a suitable room that may be had at a reasonable charge. I allude to Concert Hall. It is in a new building on Washington street. The Hall is 55 feet square, sufficiently large to accommodate 300 persons, giving to each 10 square feet. The room is well ventilated and well lighted. I think it is very well fitted for our purpose.

The question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN. Inasmuch as the resolution has been altered, I do not wish to be considered responsible for it any longer.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution as amended, and decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. HELMER moved that the Convention adjourn sine die on the 8th day of January, 1851.

Mr. KELSO moved to amend the resolution by inserting, "Provided, we are through with our labors."

Mr. HARDIN moved that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. RARIDEN. I move to lay both the resolution and amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman cannot make that motion.

The question being on laying the amendment on the table,

Mr. KENT demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 42, nays 83—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Bicknell, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Duzan, Farrow, Gootee, Gordon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Logan, Mathew, May, McLean, Moore, Murray, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Shannon, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Trimble, Watts, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—42.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Maguire, March, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson; Schoonover, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, and Mr. President—83.

Mr. COOKERLY. I think it is evidently time to think about adjourning. The Convention has been in session for nine weeks now, and I am fearful that if we do not adopt some rule in regard to the matter, we may be here ten weeks longer. For one, I must confess, that I am getting tired of being here, and I should like to see some system adopted by which we may proceed a little more regularly with our business than we have heretofore done. For that reason I will move to postpone this resolution for two weeks from this day.

Mr. GIBSON moved to lay the resolution and pending amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley offered a resolution in relation to the propriety of districting the State for judicial and representative purposes.

Mr. COOKERLY moved to strike out the word "judicial." There was no necessity whatever, he said, in his opinion, for the Convention troubling themselves about judicial circuits in this connection.

A VOICE. It is all right.

Mr. COOKERLY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. KELSO suggested that it would be better to strike out "representative." If the State were districted for judicial purposes that was all the districting that was necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said he had no objection to modify his resolution.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. It is desirable to know, in the first place, how many judicial circuits we need, and until another committee make their report this cannot be ascertained. I move, therefore, that the resolution be laid on the table for the present.

Mr. PEPPER, at the request of Mr. Foster, withdrew his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me that that part of the resolution that relates to forming judicial districts had better be left to the judiciary committee. And that part that relates to the representative districts to the committee on the apportionment of representation. I will here remark, as there seems to be some discrepancies of opinion in regard to the power of the Convention to prescribe the Senatorial and Representative districts, that it appears to me to be so plain a matter that I can hardly see how any gentleman can be opposed to it. It is clearly the duty of the Convention to form Senatorial and Representative districts. The presumption is, from the indications that we have had, that the elections hereafter to be held, if this Constitution should be adopted, will not take place until October; and it is also to be presumed that the new Constitution will be submitted to the people anterior to that time. But if the Constitution should not be adopted, then the elections would go on as at present; but if adopted, and the elections ordered to be holden in October, how are the districts to be formed unless it is done by the Convention? It is the duty of the Convention to do it, and if we fail to do it, how are the people to know how many to elect? I make these remarks because some gentlemen have expressed doubts as to the propriety of our districting the State for representative purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. The object I had in view in offering the resolution, was to bring the attention of the Convention to the subject. I know it is held by a great many gentlemen here, that the Convention has nothing to do with the matter. But I have been unable, myself, to see how the provisions of the new Constitution are to be carried into effect without districting the State for judicial and representative purposes. I have thought this point worthy the attention of the Convention, and I offered the resolution for the purpose of bringing the question up. If I have not given the resolution the proper reference, if gentlemen think that it ought to go to a larger committee, one from each judicial circuit, I will modify it so that it shall be referred to a committee of thirteen, one from each judicial circuit.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I wish to say, in respect to this subject, that it is one that did not enter into the contemplation of either my constituents or myself before the election. It was not expected by me, nor was it expected by any of my constituents as far as I know, that this Convention would enter into any arrangement of this kind. I am opposed to the Convention taking into its hands the districting of the State for senatorial, representative, or judicial purposes.

Mr. FOSTER. Who will do it?

Mr. PEPPER. The Legislature.

Mr. FOSTER. What Legislature?

Mr. PEPPER. The Legislature that will first meet after the adoption of the Constitution. I have not risen to make a speech on the subject, and shall content myself with voting against the proposition.

Mr. KELSO. I am decidedly in favor of the Convention taking upon its shoulders the responsibility of districting the State into judicial circuits. I want to see this Convention make as fair a division as they can of the State into judicial circuits, in which shall be held either two or three circuit courts in each year, and five judicial circuits, in each of which one supreme court judge shall be elected.

We cannot very well take the one division independently of the other. So far as districting the State for representative purposes is concerned, I am not going to make to that part of the proposition at present any strenuous objection, it can do no harm to allow it to go to a select committee of thirteen, and let them consider it.

Mr. BORDEN. It strikes me that we are proposing to raise a select committee to whom shall be referred matters that properly belong to the committee on miscellaneous provisions, the committee of which the gentleman from Hancock is chairman. On looking over the Constitutions of the various States it will be found that each of these has attached to it a schedule or explanatory provisions as to the manner in which it shall be put in force. This schedule divides the State into districts for representative purposes, and also into districts for judicial purposes. It is not supposed of course that the Constitution is to do more than to fix and declare certain principles, and the provisions for carrying it into effect will be no part of the Constitution itself, but will be appended by way of schedule. I take it that the matter does not apply to the committee on apportionment, or to the committee on the legislative department, for they have nothing to do but to determine the number of the members of the Legislature. It should not go to a select committee, but to the committee on miscellaneous provisions. When the number of senators and representatives shall be fixed, and the number of judicial districts ascertained, then the committee on miscellaneous provisions can proceed to act upon this matter.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. A single remark. We have the right, I believe, and certainly it is according to my own wish, to send this matter to a standing committee instead of a select committee. I prefer that it should remain as I first offered it. I will, therefore, take back my acceptance of the modification.

Mr. RITCHEY. The question of apportionment was spoken of during the canvass in my county, and it was presumed both by candidates and electors that it was necessary that the districting of the State should be done by the Convention. I think if gentlemen would reflect for a moment they would see that it is a matter of necessity that it should be done. The Legislature by a provision of the old Constitution will have to district the State this winter. It may be that the new Constitution will not be adopted. The Legislature will of necessity have to apportion the State, and if we say nothing about districting the State, and especially if we adjourn until after the next session of the Legislature is closed, they will not know how many districts we may agree upon. And it may become necessary to call a special session of the Legislature for the purpose of districting the State. You must either impose the duty upon the Governor of calling the Legislature together after we adjourn, for the purpose of districting the State, or you must require the Legislature that sits this winter to adopt an apportionment for both the old and the new Constitution, and as their session is limited to six weeks, [a voice—"O no, they are not limited!"] Yes, sir, they are limited, because their per diem runs out at the expiration of six weeks, and that is tantamount to a limitation. Then they are under the necessity of forming an apportionment under the old and the new Constitution. It is, I think, better for us to do it. I look upon it as a work that is obligatory upon us. I care but little as to what committee has the consideration of this matter.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said: The debate has been quite tedious, so many members having spoken to its merits on the question of postponement. On that occasion I desired to say a few words, but quietly waived my privilege for the accommodation of other members. As the resolution under consideration involves the same principles I will allude briefly to the position of the question as it now presents itself.

The Convention on yesterday, decided by a close vote, that the future ratio of representation should not exceed fifty senators, and one hundred representatives. This number is the same that now exists under the laws formed under the provisions of the old Constitution. With some reluctance I voted for even so great numbers as were formerly and are at present in our General Assembly. For all convenient and practical purposes I am of opinion, a less number would be preferable, but in obedience to a call upon our generosity not to disfranchise the smaller counties the members from Marion, with one voice gave them four votes, in favor of the then proposition of the small counties. They now attempt to push their claim farther, and to demand a greater number than one hundred representatives. Here I and my colleagues must pause.

I would say this to our friends with whom we acted on yesterday, that if they are still content and satisfied with the numbers as decided upon, we will still sustain them; but if they are determined to persist in demanding one hundred and sixteen, or one hundred and twenty representatives, and are desirous to establish the principle that territory, instead of population and taxation, shall constitute the basis of representation, that we, the delegation from Marion county, as well as other members, will recede from our former votes, and go for a less number than one hundred, before we will go for a greater number. In voting for fifty senators and one hundred representatives, we went fully as far as we believed our constituents would justify our action. We had added nothing, in this respect, to the former law and the old Constitution, therefore, we could urge in justification of our votes that we desired no county to be placed in a worse condition, as to representation, under the new Constitution than it was placed under the old one. [A voice—

"is that a threat.]" No, this is no threat, but the plain truth, spoken after due deliberation, but in no unkind spirit. Thus far will we go but no farther, and gentlemen may make their calculations knowingly upon that ground. If we have to go forward or to reduce, we must and will recede—or in other words go for a smaller number.

I would also state, that if the ratio be maintained as it now is, there will be no necessity of referring the matter to a committee for the purpose of apportioning the State for representative purposes. It is easily avoided by letting the districts remain as they now are, until they be changed by a General Assembly, which shall be brought together under the new Constitution. The Legislature now about to meet will find no necessity to change them, except it may be to do justice where a change has been found in the increase or decrease of population. If we attempt to district the State, and to apportion senators and representatives, we make our work, the new Constitution, liable to all the objections which those counties will feel and urge, where their representation has been lessened. All that we have to do, is to provide that the existing ratio shall exist until changed by a subsequent Legislature.

I may hereafter reply to some of the arguments that have been made to extend the members, but as this resolution does not properly afford the best occasion, I may take another opportunity. But this much I will now say, that if members from small counties do persist in the attempt to take a rightful power from the larger counties, or to establish any other basis of representation than population and taxation, they must expect the delegations from the large counties to interpose their power to prevent such sheer injustice to the people whom they represent. For myself there are two radical principles which I think are well settled, and which I must adhere to, viz: That population and incidentally taxation are the only true basis for representation in a republican government.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. PRESIDENT: I have listened with great attention to the arguments which have been advanced upon this question, and feel convinced that we should base representation principally upon territory.

The object of nearly all legislation is to unfold the resources that are buried in the soil—to develop minerals, and bring into operation water power—to give suitable aid and protection to mechanical skill, and by equitable laws, to encourage all industrial pursuits.

Now, whenever even a small community are organized into a separate county, they necessarily require the various mechanic arts to supply their natural wants; they must also have among them a portion of the mercantile interest; and the agricultural interest, to the fullest extent, requires the especial care of the Legislature, to open highways and provide for their imports and exports. They have a portion of independent sovereignty, and have, in many cases, a separate and distinct interest, which requires to be represented in the halls of legislation. For instance: if an important State road, or plank road, or railroad is to be granted in the direction of their county, it may be greatly their interest, and, perhaps, their just right, that it should pass through their county. It may be also very important to them to have this public improvement enter and depart their county lines at particular points. This cannot be done by local legislation; State works are emphatically legislative duties. It is in vain to say that these works should look only to the public good, and that the counties through which they pass should have no voice in it; for, although this may be sound in principle, every one who has the least experience in legislation, knows that the points of commencement and termination, as well as intermediate points, are settled by compromises and agreements, before the bill passes for their execution.

From this, all will see that the interest of any county, not having a representative on the floor to claim her particular rights, may, and will most likely, have her rights neglected.

It is also a truth, that small communities, having the various arts, trades, and agricultural pursuits among them, require laws for their protection and encouragement, the same as large communities. A law protects five thousand as easily as it does fifty. In another point of view—and it seems to me to be a forcible one—is this: that if a member represents three counties, he is often compelled, from their conflicting interest, to displease his constituents in two of them, by which the interest of two counties are not represented; and, of course, the representative must fall under the displeasure of two-thirds of his constituents. Is it right, Mr. President, that gentlemen—particularly those in the prime of life, looking forward to honorable promotion—is it right, sir, to place men between cross-fires in this manner, by which they must fall, and their laudable aspirations be blighted in the bud? And, beyond and above this, is it right that a part of his district should be unrepresented? I feel clearly convinced that territory should principally influence us in providing the basis of representation, and that every county should have one representative. Upon this principle, there will be left, under the ratio proposed, ten members, to be apportioned among the larger counties; and they have this for their consolation, also, that the new counties will soon have a population that will entitle them to what they now ask as a favor.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I do not think it is proper to bring up again the question that was discussed so fully yesterday. But I think the observations of the gentleman from Marion are entitled to consideration. I concur with him, that we ought not to undertake to apportion the State for county representation; and I do so, chiefly, because I do not think that we have time to do it, and also because I think there is no necessity for it.

The gentleman from Morgan has said that the Legislature must, of necessity, make an apportionment this winter—that they are bound by the old Constitution to do so, and that we cannot exercise any control over them. Why, sir, it is easy for us to provide that the first apportionment under the new Constitution shall be that which may be made by the Legislature under the old. I see no difficulty in doing this. But if we undertake to make an apportionment, we shall have the same difficulty upon our hands that the Legislature would have; the same local and conflicting interests to reconcile. Now, I want to keep local and political questions out of the Convention altogether. Every gentleman who has been in the Legislature must be aware that it will take two weeks, at least, to district the State; and we shall gain nothing by doing it, because the Legislature is about to perform the same work.

And I do not conceive that we should divide the State into judicial districts. We can direct that they shall continue as now provided by law, or as may hereafter be provided by law. I do not think we ought to prescribe the precise size of these districts. I think that we ought, by all means, to keep these extrinsic questions out of the Convention.

Mr. MAGUIRE moved to strike out from the resolution so much as related to districting the State for representative purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution as amended,

Mr. WATTS. I am opposed, sir, to the adoption of this proposition at this time. It appears to me that it is altogether out of place. If we district the State at all for representative or judicial purposes, it should be the last act of the Convention. I do not know what the number of representative districts ought to be.

The PRESIDENT. All that relates to representative districts has been stricken out.

Mr. WATTS. Well, sir, I do not know what should be the number of judicial districts. I do not know what number of judges the Convention may decide that there shall be on the supreme bench. All these things should be settled before we district the State, if we district it at all. I therefore hope that the same disposition will be made of this proposition, without any further debate, in order that we may first ascertain what is necessary to be done, and if no other gentleman wishes to see the resolution any longer above the table, I will move that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. CARR of Jackson, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Convention will now take up the orders of the day.

The resolution was adopted.

The Convention then resumed the consideration of the second section of No. 12—the pending question being a motion of the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Kent) to lay an amendment offered by the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) on the 5th instant, to an amendment offered by the gentleman from Union, (Mr. Brookbank,) on the same day, upon the table.

The question was put, and decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment of the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) was laid upon the table.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Union (Mr. Brookbank)—

Mr. B. said: In order to give a friend of mine the opportunity of introducing an amendment, I will withdraw the one I have offered proposing to introduce it again if the one he introduces shall be rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Union cannot now withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. In order to get the amendment out of the gentleman's way, I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. HOWE moved to amend the original section, by inserting the proviso "that each county shall be entitled to at least one Representative."

Mr. H. said, I agree with the gentlemen who support this section, that, as a general proposition, the smaller the number of Representatives the better; provided, however, at the same time, you give a just representation to all.

At first, sir, I was in favor of fixing the number of Representatives in the House at 75; but upon hearing the arguments of gentlemen in the course of this debate, and consulting with friends in regard to the matter, I have come to the conclusion that that position is wrong, and that the adoption of such a proposition will prevent the just representation of counties below or equal to an average. All the counties cannot have each a Representative with that number, and we must, therefore, adopt such a number as to give one Representative to nearly all. It will be utterly impossible, with seventy-five Representatives, to give a just representation to all. I therefore adhere to my original rule, to adopt the smallest number practicable, that will furnish a just representation.

It is true, my proposition is liable to some objections, for instance, that it interferes with the rule that representation is based upon population. But it is impossible in carrying out this idea practically, to arrive at mathematical accuracy. It is but an approximation to abstract justice. But I think this proposition carries out both of these ideas as far as practicable in just representation and a minimum number of legislators. It gives the smallest number practicable, and at the same time carries out the idea of just representation as far as it can be carried out. Obviously there are some objections to it, but it is less obnoxious than any proposition I have yet heard. If this proposition does not carry, I am ready to introduce another—the next best in order; that each county having two-thirds of the requisite number of males shall be entitled to one Representative. If that does not carry, I have another proposition to introduce, providing that each county having two-thirds of the requisite number of polls, shall be entitled to a Representative; and if that does not carry, I am willing to adhere to the original proposition of the committee, to fix the number of Representatives in the House at seventy-five. I am consistent, sir, in these views. Seventy-five is a smaller number, and practically, is enough to carry out the purposes designed. The only reason presented against its adoption is, that it conflicts with just representation.

If, however, the counties of the average or smallest size, are not to be secured in the privilege of a Representative each, they will be as well represented, and as little, perhaps less obnoxious, to want of proper representation, with the total number of seventy-five than of one hundred. The smaller counties are in justice entitled to considerable allowance in fixing the ratio of representation, because the greater number of them will increase very much between the periods of districting the State for representative purposes, while the older and larger counties will be stationary, and will possibly decrease.

Mr. GARVIN moved further to amend by adding the following:

"Provided, after the year 1860, upon the petition of the qualified voters of any county in this State, the Legislature shall cause a vote to be taken at a general election held for the purpose of electing State officers, and if it shall appear that a majority of all the votes cast at said election shall be in favor of an additional ratio of representatives, then it shall be the duty of the Legislature to make such additional ratio of representation as shall be necessary: Provided, also, That it shall never exceed one hundred and twenty."

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. It occurs to me, that the argument of the gentleman from Lagrange amounts to something like this: If he cannot do a great deal of good he is determined to do a great deal of harm. If he cannot get a Representative for each of the counties in the State, he is for reducing the number of Representatives. I concede to the gentleman that he states his views with a great deal of frankness, but I am one of those who believe that in fixing our representation, we should decide upon a consistent and correct system by which it will be diffused as far as possible over every section of the State. I stand upon the old platform, sir, that population is the correct basis upon which to predicate representation. That is a rule that has been long established; a common sense and just rule, and I would adhere to it were it not for the purpose of accommodating the sparsely settled portions of the State, and the weaker counties. I do not know, sir, but I may be tempted to adopt the two-thirds ratio. But, sir, I am determined to do justice as far as I can in this matter, as my votes have already indicated. The county I represent, sir, is not one that is likely to be affected by any system of ratio that is likely to be adopted. There are nearly three thousand polls in my county, so that we shall always most probably be entitled to a Representative.

If gentlemen will fix the votes upon the basis of population, they will find that in a few years this matter will come right. Population in the progress of time will diffuse itself equally over the State. Because, sir, this is an agricultural State and all portions of it have a good soil calculated to invite population; and those counties which are the weakest in the State at present will become the strongest in a few years. The progress of population in the State, if gentlemen will take population as the basis of representation, will give the necessary number of representatives to represent the State fairly. The proper mean to strike upon, I think, is one hundred, and when the population of the State is more dense that number will be ample to represent it correctly. The correct number of representatives I conceive to be fifty to the Senate and one hundred to the House, and the increase of population in the progress of time will, remedy any inequalities which may exist at present under this arrangement.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. MR. PRESIDENT, I come from a large county, yet I have been voting to give to each of the small counties, as far as possible, a representative as they do not seem to be desirous of having the number reduced.

But, sir, I cannot vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe). My county which has three thousand two hundred and forty-eight polls lies alongside of the county of Benton which has two hundred and fifty-six polls, and adjoining that county is the county of Jasper with six hundred and forty-five polls. If I give to each of these counties a representative they, with one quarter of the population in my own county, will be entitled to twice as many representatives, and I cannot consent to such injustice. I do not think the principle is at all correct.

A gentleman over the way, sir, has stated that territory and not population is the true basis of representation. Now we have a vast desert prairie on the Western border of the organized States of the Union devoid almost entirely of population; does any gentleman say that that desert should be represented in Congress without population. Why should that desert be represented independently of population? There is no fairness, sir, nor justice in such a system of representation. I am willing to share the number of representatives, fixed at one hundred, so as to accommodate the smaller counties as much as possible; but when I am asked to sacrifice the rights of my constituents in order to accommodate the interests of other portions of the State I think it is asking too much. I cannot go so far, it is an unequal and unfair proposition.

Mr. HELM moved to lay the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Kosciusko (Mr. Garvin), on the table.

A division being called for the question was taken and decided in the affirmative—yes fifty-two, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. STEVENSON. As I think members have made up their minds definitely on this matter I call for the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, will the Convention second the demand for the previous question?

The demand was seconded.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, shall the main question be now put?

It was so ordered by consent.

The PRESIDENT. The question will now be taken upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe).

Upon this question Mr. BORDEN demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and taken with the following result—yeas 48, nays 76:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bicknell, Borden, Brookbank, Chandler, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Harbolt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, March, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Robinson, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Trimble, Walpole, Wheeler, Work, Wunderlich, Mr. President—48.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Logan, Maguire, Mather, McFarland, McLean, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—76.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Foley) to the amendment of the gentleman from Jennings (Mr. Prather), submitted on the fifth instant—

Mr. ROBINSON asked for the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken with the following result—yeas 56, nays 65:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beard, Borden, Bourne, Butler, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Helmer, Holman, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Logan, March, McClelland, McLean, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—56.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Edmonston, Elliott, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, May, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, and Wunderlich—65.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question then being upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Jennings (Mr. Prather)—

The yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered were taken with the following result—yeas 64, nays 58.

Those voting in the affirmative were:

Messrs. Allen, Badger, Beard, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Chapman, Chenowith, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johson, Kelso, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Todd, Trimby, Elliott, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Zenor, and Mr. President—64.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Barbour, Bicknell, Borden, Brookbank, Carr, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, March, Mather, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Morgan, Niles, Read of Clark, Ristine, Ritchey, Sherrod, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—58.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then being, shall the section as amended, be engrossed for a third reading. The yeas and nays were demanded and being ordered, were taken with the following result—yeas 73, nays 51:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Hovey, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Maguire, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Thornton, Todd, Elliott, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Zenor—73.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Barbour, Bourne, Carr, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fiser, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Haddon, Hardin, Helmer, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Warren, Logan, March, Mather, McLean, Milroy, Morgan, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Read of Clark, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Yocum, and Mr. President—51.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. McFARLAND moved that the Convention adjourn until Monday morning nine o'clock.

Upon a division, the motion was not agreed to—yeas 49 nays 52.

Mr. HARDIN moved that the Convention adjourn until two o'clock P. M.

The motion was not agreed to.

The third section of No. 12 was then taken up for consideration, on its second reading. It is as follows:

“Senatorial and Representative districts—where more than one county shall constitute a district—shall be composed of contiguous counties; and no county for representative purposes, shall ever be divided.”

Mr. RITCHEY said, as I do not suppose the members of the Convention are desirous of having a speech inflicted upon them at this late hour of the morning session, I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Mr. KELSO moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Johnson, (Mr. Ritchey,) by adding the words “until Monday morning, eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick, asked for the yeas and nays upon the question, and

The yeas and nays were then ordered and taken, with the following result—yeas 39, nays 67.

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Allen, Barbour, Berry, Bourne, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Conduit, Cookerly, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Hendricks, Hitt, Kelso, March, May, McFarland, Milroy, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley and Mr. President—39.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Beard, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helmer, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Trimby, Wallace, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—67.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RITCHEY moved a call of the Convention.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll having been called through by the Secretary

Mr. NAVE moved to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Upon this question a division was asked for, and it resulted as follows—ayes 45, noes 45; and the President voting in the affirmative, the call was dispensed with.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. Richey to adjourn, it was decided in the affirmative.

And the Convention adjourned until two o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the third section of the report from the committee on the Legislative department, as follows:

"Senatorial and representative districts (where more than one county shall constitute a district) shall be composed of contiguous counties, and no county, for representative purposes, shall ever be divided."

Mr. DUNN. I move to amend the section by inserting the words "or senatorial," before the word "representative," in the last line, so as to make it read "and no county, for senatorial or representative purposes, shall ever be divided." I would beg leave to say a single word in explanation of this amendment. It will be seen by reference to the section, that it provides that no county shall be divided for representative purposes. The word "representative" is used to apply exclusively to the lower House. I think the words "senatorial or," should be added so as to prevent the Legislature from ever dividing a county either for representative or senatorial purposes.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to amend the section by striking out all after the word "districts" in the 11th line, and inserting what I send to the Secretary's desk. The section as I propose to amend it, would read, "Senatorial and representative districts shall be single, such districts to be bounded by county, precinct, or ward lines, to consist of contiguous territory, and be in as compact a form as practicable. Provided that parts of different counties shall not be attached in the formation of said districts."

Mr. KENT moved to lay the amendment on the table, but at the request of Mr. Stevenson he withdrew the motion.

Mr. STEVENTON. I trust that this amendment will not be disposed of hastily, for I look upon it as one of considerable importance. It provides that representative districts shall be single. When a county is entitled to two or more representatives it shall be divided into as many districts, each electing a representative.

It is only by single districts that a just accountability can be secured from the representative to the constituent. A few populous townships in a county, a large town, or a few active managing politicians but two frequently control the election of all the representatives of the county; and the representatives consequently feel themselves accountable to those who elect them. But to show more clearly that a just accountability can only be secured by single districts, let us suppose that the county of Marion and Hendrix were united for representative purposes, and that the two counties jointly were to elect two or more representatives. Now, Marion being the largest county could, and probably would, elect all the representatives. The representatives consequently would feel themselves accountable to the people of Marion county; and Hendricks would be deprived of her just influence in the Legislature, to the neglect of all the just interests of the county. Now, sir, the case is precisely the same in the large counties where they elect more than one representative without being 'districted into single districts, a few townships are apt to control the elections to the injury of the smaller townships. But the elections are still more apt to be controlled by the county seats, where a few men reside who make politics a trade, and the representatives feel themselves accountable always to those by whom they are elected. Now, sir, I hold that it is just to the different portions of the large counties, that they should be divided into "single representative districts." It is due to a just and proper accountability of the representative to his constituents, that the counties should be divided into "single representative districts" whenever they may be entitled to more than one representative.

In the election of representatives to Congress, the single district system is acknowledged to be correct, and the old plan of electing by States is universally discarded; single districts obtain in the election of Senators to the State Legislature. The principle is correct and should be adopted; there can be no objection to it; there is nothing wrong about it. It has been adopted by several of the States as a constitutional provision. The following is the provision of the Constitution of Wisconsin:

"The members of the Assembly shall be chosen annually by single districts, on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday in November, by the qualified electors of the several districts, such districts to be bounded by county, town, or ward lines, to consist of contiguous territory, and be in as compact form as practicable."

In the amendment that I have offered, it is provided that parts of counties shall not be attached in the formation of representative districts.

But Wisconsin is not the only State that has adopted a similar provision. New York has done the same; here is their Constitutional provision on the subject :

"The members of the Assembly shall be apportioned among the several counties of the State by the Legislature, as nearly as may be, according to the number of their respective inhabitants, excluding aliens and persons of color not taxed, and shall be chosen by single districts."

This proposition is not new. It has been adopted by other States, and is one of the improvements of the times; and I trust gentlemen will not hastily dispose of it, but give it that consideration that it deserves.

This, sir, is an age of improvement, not only in the arts and sciences, but in government also. It is to meet the improvements or advances of the age that has called this Convention. The improvements in the science of government does not consist of the number of restrictions that may be placed on the people, but in removing them, and enabling the people the better to govern themselves. The improvements, in my opinion, that we are mainly called upon to make, are to be found in the three great divisions of the power of government—the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judicial. As you improve these you better enable a free people to govern themselves. Great reforms are contemplated in the judicial department and I trust they will be carried out. Judges hereafter are to be elected by the people, and other very important reforms are contemplated in the practice in courts of justice. The executive department is also being improved. This Convention has already determined that all executive officers shall be elected by the people and that they shall serve but short periods.

The Legislative department should also be to the improvement of the age. The people should be enabled to elect, directly their own representatives, and they should be held directly accountable to the district that elect them. Under the plan proposed by the committee, this will not be done, and can in no other way be so well effected as by single districts.

Mr. WOLFE would ask the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Stevenson) whether he proposed to divide counties into districts where a county sent more than one member?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. BORDEN. If I understood this proposition, it is that where a county sends two or three members to the House of Representatives, the Legislature may cause such county to be divided into so many districts, as there are members to be elected—that they may either divide it themselves, or cause the county board to divide it. I think the principle is a correct one, and I should be glad to see it adopted. If the Convention is not prepared to say that it shall be so, we might at least leave it with the Legislature to adopt such a principle if they should think it advisable to do so. Then the person elected to a seat in the Legislature will be accountable to the people of the immediate district for which he is elected.

Mr. NAVE. So far from agreeing with this proposition, I must say that the idea of dividing counties for representative purposes seems to me to be proposterous. It would create a division in each county that has more than one representative. I believe, sir, that the only way to obtain a fair representation in reference to territory, is that each county should send one member, at least, to the Legislature. This would supercede all the difficulty which gentlemen seem to apprehend in those counties which send more than one representative. I am decidedly opposed to representation in the Legislature being based on mere territory; but if gentlemen desire to have the representation confined to certain limits, and that the State should be represented by certain designated territories, the true policy, in that case, would be to let every county in the State have a representative. The proposition of the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Stevenson) can never effect what he designs to effect by it. It can never have any other effect than to create county factions and county difficulties which must be forever entailed upon the counties of Putnam, Monroe and others, sending more than one representative to the Legislature. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment.

Cries of "question, question."

Mr. STEVENSON. The amendment I have proposed is precisely the provision which is found both in the Constitution of New York and that of Wisconsin, with this exception, that I have added a provision that parts of counties shall not be added to each other in forming districts. With that exception, I have copied verbatim, the same provision which exists in the Constitutions of both the States I have mentioned.

Mr. JOHNSON moved to lay the amendment on the table; and upon a division—ayes 43; noes 39—the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON moved to amend the section by adding the following proviso: "Provided that each county shall be entitled to one representative."

Mr. BORDEN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "provided," and inserting the following:

"That any county having two-thirds or more, of the ratio of representation, shall be entitled to elect one member of the House of Representatives."

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. BORDEN. Then I will ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken as follows:

AYES.—Messrs. Badger, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Haddon, Hardin, Hogen, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Logan, Maguire, McLean, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, and Mr. President.—56.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Colfax, Dick, Dobson, Edmonston, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tague, Trimble, Walpole, Wheeler, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor.—55.

So the amendment and the amendment to the amendment were laid on the table.

MR. STEVENSON. I move to strike out the words "or representative;" and that will leave the matter discretionary with the legislature hereafter, whether they will divide the counties or not.

THE PRESIDENT. The Chair would inform the gentleman from Putnam that his amendment is not in order, these words being part of the words which the Convention, a few minutes ago, refused to strike out.

MR. LOCKHART offered the following proviso, to be added at the end of the section:

"Provided that any county having two-thirds or more of the ratio of representation, shall be entitled to a Representative."

SEVERAL MEMBERS. That has been voted down already.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was adopted—ayes 55, nays 46.

MR. KELSO. I move further to amend the section by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, further, that the Legislature shall have the power to transfer the residuum due in large counties, to small counties adjoining, for purposes of representation."

I am requested to explain what I intend by this proviso. It is this: Supposing that, by the time we will have the present Constitution adopted by the people—if that should ever happen—there should be in the State, two hundred thousand voters, for a hundred Representatives; that would give two thousand polls to each Representative, or for the ratio. Now, take two counties adjoining each other, and say that one of them has two thousand five hundred voters, and that the next county may lack one, two, or three hundred of coming up to the ratio. What, I ask is, that the Legislature shall have the power to transfer the benefit of the overplus of the ratio in the large county to the smaller one, so as to entitle it to a Representative.

MR. MILLER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. DUNN of Jefferson. Is it in order, now, Mr. President, to move to strike out the whole section?

THE PRESIDENT. It is.

MR. DUNN. Then I move to strike out the section as amended, and insert in lieu thereof, a section, which I will send to the Clerk's table, which is, in effect, the same as the one originally reported by the committee. I make this motion for the reason that, after we had voted down, by yeas and nays, the proposition to allow a Representative to every county having two-thirds of the ratio of representation, the same proposition is suddenly sprung upon us in another form, and carried. The yeas and nays were not called on the second vote, and I must believe that the question was not understood by the Convention. Now, sir, I feel that it is desirable that every county in the State, should, as far as practicable, have a Representative in the popular branch of the Legislature. I shall, therefore, when the section providing that the Senate shall not consist of less than fifty members, and the House of not less than one hundred members, comes up on its third reading, move to refer it back to the committee which reported it, with instructions to report a section, providing that the Senate shall consist of not more than thirty-five members, and the House of Representatives of not more than one hundred and fifteen members; by that means giving a greater number of counties each a Representative in the lower branch of the General Assembly. I hold it to be the true democratic doctrine, that the people are to be represented in the General Assembly, and not territory. Suppose the ratio of representation is so fixed that every fifteen hundred voters shall be entitled to a Representative; then, under the two-thirds rule, a county having a thousand voters, would be entitled to a Representative, while another county, having fifteen hundred voters would be only entitled to one Representative. Is this fair? We all enjoy the protection of the same laws,—we share alike the burdens of taxation; then let us all stand upon the broad basis of equality, and share equally in the legislation of the State.

MR. KELSO. The gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) is very liberal in his professions of liberality to the smaller counties. I wish he were equally as liberal in his acts and votes.

He is perfectly willing to do all that he can to give them a representation, provided that they do not get it. [Laughter.] That is just the length that he goes, and there he stops, and I am sorry to say that there are too many gentlemen on this floor who are like him.

Now, sir, the large counties with a small population, are entitled to more consideration in this Convention, than they seem likely to receive. You take a county north, with perhaps six, eight, or ten hundred voters in it at the present time, and with from four to five hundred square miles of territory, with every possible inducement for people to settle there, and I believe that, within a very short time, the population will double its present number; and yet you so arrange it that, under the new Constitution, they cannot get their fair share of the representation. There is not a single question that arises in the Legislature, which gives rise to more vexatious discussion than this question of apportioning the State for representative purposes; and of the truth of this assertion I know that I may appeal to the President for his testimony. Now, if we could have it as it is now, that there should be a Representative from each county, we would save all that difficulty, and the immense expense, and trouble, and vexation that has, every five years, occurred in the Legislature, ever since we had a government. I say that there is no good or substantial reason that can be urged, why a county with three thousand voters, is any better entitled to two Representatives, than one with fifteen hundred voters. If we were going to continue the old mode of legislation, as I once before remarked, that every county, and perhaps every township, should have its separate laws, and that there should not be in two counties, on the same side of a creek, two laws alike, in regard to the regulation of county business, then there would be some propriety in contending for a large number of Representatives in each county. But as the matter is now, as it is the intention of the Convention to place a barrier between the Legislature and the people, so that there shall not be this special and local legislation, that has distracted the State for years, and heaped upon us burdens of taxation for no good purpose; then, sir, the argument fails, and the reason of that provision has ceased, and the force of it has ceased. One man can represent a county with three thousand voters, just as well as he can represent a hundred men. Where, then, is the use of contending for a large number? There is one single reason, and that is just such a one as every member on this floor has taken great pains not to mention: In the election of United States Senator—for beyond that it cannot go, if we adopt the principle that the people shall elect all the officers of the State—in the election of United States Senator, while the mode of election continues as it is now, there might be some reason for contending for it. If Wayne county should continue to send four whig Representatives, she would have four whig votes; and if Marion county should retain her three Representatives, she would give three democratic votes. Upon that score there may be some reason to contend for a large number of Representatives; but even in that matter it is by no means unfair to say that each county should have one vote. Some gentlemen appear to be extremely wedded to the people just now. Everything must be measured by the population. Now let us see if we have not a precedent on this subject, somewhat different from the principle here contended for. In the organization of the General Government, they have based one side on the representation of the population, and the other side upon territory. The little State of Rhode Island, with as much territory as would make a tolerable potato-patch, has her two Senators, while the great State of New York, with ten times more territory, and population too, has only the same number of Senators. Thus, then, we see that one branch of the General Government is regulated by territory, while the other is based upon population. Now, will any man deny that that is a wholesome foundation on which to base representation? No, sir; long experience has furnished too strong testimony in favor of that principle. Now can there be any danger in changing that mode, so as to fix the basis of the apportionment for the Senate of Indiana, on the population, and that of the House of Representatives on territory? If that be a good organization of government, and one that has been found to work well for three-quarters of a century, to base one portion of the National Government on territory and the other on population, why may not the same thing answer in the State of Indiana, only reversing the difference between the Senate and the House of Representatives?

Now there is a plan which occurs to me that has not yet been proposed, and which, so far as I can judge, is better than any that has yet been offered. It does not originate with me, but I will mention it; and that is, that the State should be divided into fifteen Senatorial districts, based on population; or, if gentlemen are determined to have fifty Senators, then say twenty-five Senatorial districts, based upon population as nearly equal as possible without dividing the counties, and in each district let two Senators be elected. Then if there be contending local interests, you will have each fairly represented. By that means you would secure the Senate in such a way as many gentlemen contend for. Then let each county have one Representative, fixing the ratio, if you please, at two thousand votes, and let the surplus over that amount go to the small counties. That kind of plan would be more just. Whether it will succeed here or not, I am not prepared to say; but, as the matter stands now, I contend that it is a nearer approach to justice than any plan which has yet been proposed to this body.

The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) has complained that this question has been sprung upon the Convention again after it has once been voted down; but he will find that, so far from this being a just matter of complaint, it is the result of calm and deliberate reflection, and a righteous determination to do that which is right in the eyes of all the people.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I always regret, Mr. President, to be under the necessity of addressing the Convention. We have so much to do, and as yet have accomplished so little, that I feel disposed to contribute at least my silence to the dispatch of business. But the gentlemen from Allen and Switzerland have alluded to me so directly in their remarks, that I must crave the indulgence of the Convention for a few words in reply. Before gentlemen are so very liberal in their imputations of interested motives to others, it might, perhaps, be quite as well for them to turn the glass the other way, and examine their own hearts to ascertain whether they are totally disinterested in urging the claims of the small counties in this State to such peculiar and important privileges. I have advocated the propriety of basing your representation upon population and not upon territory, not because I happen to be a delegate from one of the most populous counties of the State, but because I believe that to be the only fast and firm basis of representation. I hold that a man should be a man in any county of the State, and in no county the mere fraction of a man. I can see no justice in allowing two men in one county the same influence in the Legislature of the State as three men in another. I have no interested motives in this matter whatever. I know very well that many of the counties in this State which are now but sparsely inhabited, will soon be occupied by a large population, and were I to regard exclusively the interest of that part of the State in which I live, I should vote exactly the reverse of the vote I intend to give. I know that the southern part of Indiana is not increasing in population as rapidly as the northern, and that, in a few years the portion of the State that will control its destiny will not be the centre and the south, but the great north; and as I have said on a former occasion, I care not how soon the north obtains that control, provided she obtains it on that basis which places every voter in the State on an equality as to his political rights.

The gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) says, that in a county which has four members in the General Assembly, one voter counts as much as four voters in a county having but one representative. That is not the case; or if it is, I should like to have explained the rule of arithmetic by which it is found. It is true, five thousand voters in the county of Wayne may have five representatives in the Legislature, but the same number of voters in any other part of the State have the same number of representatives. Four counties having a thousand voters each, may separately elect their four representatives, and their representatives thus elected have the same influence in the Legislature, so far as their votes are concerned, as the four representatives elected by the same number of voters in the county of Wayne. According to the multiplication table I learned, four times one counted just as much as one time four. Even at the two-thirds ratio, many of the counties in the State will not be entitled to a separate representation. We cannot establish any ratio of representation that will suit exactly the division of our population by county lines. There will be fractions above as well as below the ratio, and where they are not large they should be disregarded in both cases. Where, however, it is impossible for us to arrive at the exact line of equality, it is our duty to approximate it as nearly as possible. I have been surprised that gentlemen on this floor should so pertinaciously insist that every county, without regard to population, should have a separate representation. Such a provision, unless the number of representatives is increased beyond any number yet suggested, would give to such a county as Benton, having but two hundred voters, the same power in the legislation of the State as a county with ten times her population. Such a system of apportionment would be as detestable as the rotten-borough system of England.

Some gentleman has referred to Sir Robert Peel's borough of Savren, which sent two members of Parliament to represent an empty pig-pen, and I think, sir, we shall entitle ourselves to a place in a pig-pen whenever we adopt so unjust and unfair a system of representation as that which has been so earnestly advocated by the gentleman from Switzerland and others.

Sir, I understand it to be the true democratic doctrine that the will of the majority, under such constitutional restraints as may be reasonably imposed, should be the controlling will in a State. And when I speak of a majority I refer to men, citizens of the State, and not to acres of land, whether they be acres of wood land, prairie land, or "land covered with water." Under any other system, to say nothing of ordinary legislation, in the election of a United States Senator the acres might triumph over the men of the State. I trust, sir, that no basis of representation will be adopted that does not regard the people as the source of all power.

Mr. DOBSON. I had no anticipation that this question would have been agitated this afternoon; but as it is up, I will say a single word. I am not willing to depart far from the well-established rule of "taxation and representation;" yet, as we cannot possibly arrive at exact justice, I have always been willing that a county having two-thirds of the ratio of representation should be entitled to a representative in the Legislature. There are, however, some counties with but a small number of voters; and it would be unfair to give them a voice in the Legislature, when, by so doing, you would deprive some of the large counties of two-thirds of their representation. I think the section is as good as it can be; and I hope it will be allowed to remain as it is.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I supposed, this morning, when we passed the section providing for fifty senators and one hundred representatives, that we had established a great and important principle, alike permanent and proper. But, from the many attempts to disturb that decision, and the success which has seemingly attended the effort, even to carrying an amendment directly in collision with our previous action, I am now doubtful as to what is the real sense and intention of the Convention. The gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) is not content with the vote which ordered the section to be engrossed, but still presses his attempts to effect a change. By perseverance, or accident, or inattention, together with a thin attendance of the members, he is in a fair way to succeed with his proposition. This proposition I consider as injurious to the people of the State. It violates every well-settled and correct rule of legislation—every republican right. If the small counties be permitted to have the same voice in the halls of legislation as the large counties, you directly establish the principle that the minority shall govern the majority.

That, sir, is the practical effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Switzerland. There are ninety organized counties in the State, and the number of representatives will probably be one hundred, such yet being the decision of the Convention. Suppose each county gets a representative, thus; ninety of the hundred would be disposed of, and ten representatives would remain to be distributed among the whole number of counties in the State. What would be the operation under this rule? There are in Indiana fifty-two counties containing over two thousand polls, and thirty-eight counties containing less than two thousand polls. Now, let me inquire which of the fifty-two large counties are to be permitted to take an additional representative out of the ten which remains after giving one to each of the several counties, large and small? Which of the forty-two large counties are to have but one representative? How can this ratio be made to work equitably? How can you satisfy the people of the counties that get but one member of the correctness of such a division. Ten members are to be divided into fifty-two counties. What a field for contention—for arrangement—for trade and barter—if even corruption be avoided. A general scramble must decide the result, and the ten members be set apart by chance, or some other equally uncertain mode. Wayne and Marion, and possibly Jefferson counties, would probably get two representatives and a senator each; but the balance of the counties would have to contend in a sort of general scramble for the other seven or eight members.

The gentleman from Switzerland county has instanced the organization of the Senate of the United States, as being based upon territory regardless of population. I look upon the Senate of the United States as being organized upon a very different principle, affording no parallel case, and therefore an unfortunate illustration. I hold, that, in the structure of the Government of the United States, the Senate was created as the power peculiarly fitted and requisite to guard and protect the sovereignty of the several States, they being, in all respects, equal, so far as the attribute of sovereignty is concerned. The Senate of the United States is endowed with diversified powers; these powers go far beyond a mere legislative power. In one sense, the Senate may be considered as partially executive, so far as it controls executive appointments, or advises and consents to the diplomacy of the Government, and in the sanction of executive action and the ratification of treaties. They are an entirely different body from the representative body, and that difference is so apparent, that I consider it unnecessary to go into further comparison, or to pursue that branch of the subject at greater length. I would in reply ask the question: Upon what basis is the House of Representatives of the General Government established? Certainly upon population, and not upon territory. The representatives of that population are there to protect and guard the special interests of their local constituency, as well as to legislate for the general welfare. They relieve the Senate from the detail of local business, and afford senators more opportunity for studying and acting upon objects of a more national character. But enough on this head; for it must be apparent, that the basis of representation in the Government of the United States is population instead of territory.

By the report of the Auditor of State, we see that the number of polls in the State is a little short of one hundred and eighty-seven thousand. If we adopt, as a ratio, four thousand polls for a senator, and two thousand polls for a representative, it will give forty-six senators and ninety-four representatives. It is probable that the real number of votes within the State proper very nearly to two hundred thousand, because the poll list exempts all persons over fifty years of age. Should this estimate be correct, then the number of fifty senators and one hundred representatives will be a very appropriate number, predicated on the ratio above suggested—four and two thousand. As counties increase in population, their relative weight in representation will increase. Those which have wild lands and good soil will settle densely, and at each State census take their position in the legislative halls; but I cannot assent to the idea that forests and swamps, mountains and cliffs, trees and stumps, an unimproved country in a state of nature, shall claim and have the same amount of representation in the Legislature, that is given to a county containing a dense agricultural and commercial community, having great interests in the mechanical, agricultural, and commercial way to foster, watch over, and direct. We legislate for the people, not for the hills and the valleys, the stocks and the stones. The great interests of the people are to be guarded from all improper contingencies and influences. It is not right to give to a small county an equal voice with a large county in levying taxes, in controlling property, or in electing a United States' Senator. Every man should have an equal voice in the councils of the State. This proposition gives to a man in White county, or in any other small county, a greater weight of influence than it gives to a voter in any one of the larger class of counties. By its operation, two men, in the counties having a population of two-thirds of the regular ratio, are to be made equal to three men in the large counties. The large counties will certainly consider this an unjust division of power. They will not relish a law that discriminates so much to their disadvantage. It is manifestly unequal; and my doctrine is, that we should look to the old rule of equal taxation and equal representation.

I have already expressed my belief that even a smaller number of senators and representatives would conduce to the public benefit; and I here give notice, that, if I can find an opportunity of probable success, I am quite ready to go for a reduction of the Senate, so that it shall not consist of more than thirty-five members.

Mr. MURRAY said, that it appeared to him that it was necessary that the various interests of men should be represented, rather than their mere number. The same law that would protect ten men of any class of society, would equally protect a hundred. If there were ten merchants or a hundred merchants, the same law that would protect the ten would protect the whole. It would seem to him that any county having all the various interests of a county to represent, should be entitled to one representative. It appeared to him also that in giving so many representatives to the large counties and none at all to the others, there was a manifest injustice in many points of view, and especially in regard to the election of a United States Senator.

However, he had not risen to speak upon the subject, but rather to make an apology to his colleague for having spoken in a manner, in the early part of the day, in which on calmer reflection, he felt he ought not to have done. He hoped the apology would be accepted.

Mr. READ of Monroe. It is now a settled point—settled against my convictions as to what is best—that we are to have one hundred and fifty men to constitute the General Assembly; and the only question which now remains is, how this body of men shall be divided so as to accommodate the large counties and the small counties, and so as to make the best possible General Assembly, in order to secure wise and good Legislation.

It is my opinion if we make the House of Representatives to consist of one hundred and fifteen members, and the Senate of thirty-five, we shall thereby best secure the interests of the small counties without injury to the large ones; and to those gentlemen who represent small counties, I pledge myself, whenever the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) moves to re-commit the section, I shall vote for its re-commitment. What do we accomplish by the arrangement he proposes? Why almost every county in the State will be represented. And what else do we accomplish? While we shall have every locality in the State represented, we shall also have a conservative body in the Senate, consisting of thirty-five men, who will represent larger districts of the State, and I may here remark that this is the division which obtains in all the States. I mean that the proportion between the two bodies is much greater than exists under the present Constitution in the State of Indiana. It is known that in the State of Massachusetts, where there are six hundred members in the House of Representatives there are but forty in the Senate; and in the State of New York the Senate consists but of thirty-two members, while the House of Representatives consists of one hundred and twenty-eight. In the State of Ohio, it is proposed to increase the House of Representatives which heretofore has consisted of seventy-two members only, and to diminish the Senate. In that plan of apportionment which was sent to our table from the Ohio Convention, and which has been regarded as one of the best plans ever prepared in the United States, it is proposed that the Senate shall consist of but thirty members; and I believe that by adopting a division of Houses somewhat similar, as we shall do by accepting the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, we shall best meet the views and wishes of the people of Indiana, and have a far better General Assembly than could be constituted by the numbers of fifty in the Senate and one hundred in the House. Look at the Senate of the United States. There are but sixty members in that body, while the House of Representatives consists of two hundred and thirty. It seems to be a settled principle in constituting the different Legislatures.

of the United States, that the Senate should be a comparatively small body, while the House should consist of such a number as should represent the local interests of the various portions of the State.

The very reason why we have had so much local legislation in Indiana, is found in the fact that both Houses represent small districts, and in many cases the very same constituencies.

Mr. NAVE. I have sat here and listened very patiently, while gentlemen propounded their reasons on which they predicated their notions of representation. Some have gone so far as to state that their notions are founded, not upon population but upon the representation of territory without population. I have always understood that the rule and the only reason given for representation as connected with taxation, was population, and that where there was no population to represent and no people to pay taxes, there was no need of representation, because there was nobody to be represented. But, sir, we have heard a different doctrine advocated on this floor. We have heard it urged that, although there may be no persons living in a certain territory, although there are no persons there to pay taxes, yet that that territory shall be entitled to a representation in the Legislature of the State of Indiana. Sir, such a proposition seems to me to be in direct opposition to the very first principles of government. I, for one, rise to inform this Convention that I cannot sit still and suffer my constituents to be taxed to pay for a representative in a different county in the State. It would be unjust that a county having eighteen hundred votes should have a larger portion of them transferred to another county with a less number, and that the constituency I represent on this floor should be compelled to contribute to the per diem pay of such a representative.

Sir, let me ask, is there any principle of justice in this? None whatever; and I hope that the gentlemen who have been standing on this floor voting for an increase of representatives equal to that which we had under the old Constitution, have now seen that they have burned their fingers, and carried their project too far; and that if they will come back and stand up with their humble servant we can bring the rest back in short order; we can at least reduce the number of the Senate to thirty, and thereby save the State several thousand dollars annually. If gentlemen will only come up we can establish the principle that we wish to represent MEN and not TREES and PRAIRIES. No, sir, if they will but consider this matter they will soon see the difficulty into which they have thrown themselves. I am therefore in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, to strike out his proposition and insert the original.

Mr. READ of Clark. This subject has created a great deal of excitement, and when I look around the Convention and perceive that there are only some seventy or eighty members present, I think this is hardly the time to pass a section on which may depend many votes in regard to the adoption or rejection of the revised Constitution. We ought therefore to endeavor to act with coolness, and to reconcile conflicting interests, and adopt some article on the subject that will be satisfactory to the people. As we are hardly, therefore, in a condition to do this to-day, I will move to lay the article and the amendment on the table for the present.

The motion to lay the resolution and amendment on the table was not agreed to.

Pending the question on the motion of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) to strike out the section as amended and insert it as originally reported by the committee.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, DEC. 9, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BABB.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. MAGUIRE. There was a resolution adopted on Saturday, calling upon the Auditor of State for certain information. I move that the vote by which that resolution was adopted be re-considered. I will remark that all the information that was desired by gentlemen was furnished last winter to the Legislature, and published.

The question being upon the motion to reconsider,

Mr. MILLER of Gibson opposed the reconsideration. It appeared to him that it was time that some steps were taken to provide the means of paying off the State debt. The interest upon it was fast accumulating, and he thought some system of taxation should be devised by which the amount might be gradually reduced. The information, at all events, that was asked for by the resolution, ought to be obtained and laid before the public.

Mr. MAGUIRE remarked that the information had been procured and published already. His only object in making the motion was to save trouble, the Auditor's time being fully occupied with other matters. But if the Convention demanded that it should be again furnished he would offer no opposition.

The motion to re-consider was agreed to.

On motion, by Mr. WATTS,

The resolution was laid on the table.

On motion, by Mr. LOCKHART,

The communication from the Warden of the State Prison was taken up and referred to a select committee of one from each judicial circuit, with instructions to consider the propriety of providing for a House of Refuge for juvenile offenders, &c.

Mr. THORNTON, from the select committee appointed to communicate to the family of the late Col. R. M. Johnson, the condolences of this Convention, reported that the committee had performed that duty; and had received from the Rev. J. T. Johnson, brother of the Hon. Richard M. Johnson, the following letter in reply:

GEORGETOWN, Dec. 4, 1850.

Messrs. Thornton, Pepper, and Rariden:

GENTLEMEN—Your esteemed letter of condolence and sympathy, communicating the resolutions of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Indiana, in reference to the death of my beloved brother, R. M. Johnson, came to hand this morning. I cannot give utterance to the feelings inspired by so touching an incident—a proceeding so honoring to one to whom I owe so much of the little education with which I am blessed, and the influence I enjoy amongst my fellow-citizens.

The deep fountains of the heart have been broken up, by remembrances like yours, from every quarter of our beloved country; and the gushings of the heart afford us relief. He was greatly beloved by us all, and he was made doubly dear, by his continual anxiety and efforts to render his relations honorable, and to make them a blessing to our race.

Inasmuch as you have selected me as the honored medium of communicating these resolutions, so highly prized, to the relatives of the deceased, permit me, in their name, to make a return of their profound gratitude. They receive it as a movement more enduring than marble, and the richest reward that a nation can bestow.

The friends of the deceased, wherever found, will be pleased to accept this, as the best tribute of grateful hearts.

Accept for yourselves, and for the distinguished Convention of which you are the honored organs, the most grateful emotions of your friend and fellow-citizen,

J. T. JOHNSON,

Elder of the Christian Church, Georgetown, Ky.

On motion, by Mr. THORNTON, the letter was ordered to be spread upon the journals of the Convention.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, the first business in order being the fixing the number of Senators and Representatives, on its third reading.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to amend so that the Senate shall consist of not exceeding thirty-five members, and the House of Representatives not exceeding one hundred and fifteen.

Mr. SMITH of Scott moved to amend the instructions so as to make the members 34 in the Senate and 116 in the House to be proportioned according to population.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved to lay the instructions upon the table.

A DELEGATE. That will carry the section to the table, also.

Mr. SMITH withdrew the motion.

Mr. KELSO. Is it in order to move to amend the last instructions?

The PRESIDENT. The last instructions are moved as an amendment to the former.

Mr. KELSO. Well, let us understand how this is.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. I believe I have a claim to the floor, sir.

Mr. KELSO [continuing]. The first instructions, according to my idea, stand as an original proposition subject to amendment, and that amendment is also subject to be amended.

Mr. PETTIT. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Switzerland is out of order. The gentleman on my right is entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Scott claim the floor?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELSO. The gentleman from Tippecanoe is mistaken. I had the floor and gave way for a motion to amend.

I wish now to move to amend the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Scott, by striking out his proviso; and I do it for the purpose of making it as acceptable as possible to members of the Convention. As the proposition stands at present, it is to give thirty-four members to the Senate and one hundred and sixteen to the House. So far I am willing to go for it. But there is appended to it this additional proposition:

"That if any county have a certain number of votes, she shall have a representative."

Now there is not enough gained by this to make me go in favor of that which is not acceptable to a large portion of the delegates to this Convention.

Mr. PETTIT. I suppose the gentleman from Scott is now entitled to the floor?

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Scott.

Mr. SMITH. I have offered this amendment as a kind of compromise between the two extremes; and I cannot for my life see why it is that gentlemen should be so averse to the proposition that I have offered. It is asking only that which belongs to every organized body in the State. Now I hold that it is a principle that ought not to be disregarded; that every county that has to submit to the law should have a voice in framing the law. I hold it to be a principle that is indisputable, that where one man represents three or four counties, the voice of each county is not represented dis-tingly, as it ought to be. Why it is that gentlemen of this Convention are so strenuous in opposition to this proposition, I cannot understand. There are other States having laws as wholesome and efficient as those of Indiana. Look at the Southern States. They have laws that have conferred blessings upon the people who have been governed by them, equal to those that have been enjoyed by the citizens of Indiana, and their representation has not been curtailed. Turn to Massachusetts, we find there that even a township containing less than one hundred and fifty voters is represented. Every township is entitled to a representative without regard to the number of inhabitants it contains. Have any ill consequences flowed from this system! None, sir. Why is it that they have adopted the system? It is that the interests of each section may have due consideration. Now when we come to our own State, here are ninety-one counties, each having a local interest, an interest applicable to itself alone; and each county, I contend, should have a voice in the shaping the laws that are to govern the county.

I have offered this as a compromise. According to the principle by which we have been governed, that of merging the small counties into the larger ones, the smaller counties never can be heard. I ask that they shall have a separate and distinct voice in legislation. I ask it as a matter of sheer justice to the smaller counties. Why should gentlemen count so particularly upon numbers, regardless of the interest of the smaller counties? I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. PETTIT. If I understand the section, it provides that there shall be fifty senators and one hundred representatives.

The PRESIDENT. There shall be not exceeding that number.

Mr. PETTIT. Well, that is just as well. The Legislature will be sure to keep it up to that number; for that proposition I shall vote, and therefore, I shall vote against recommitting the section with instructions to amend. Not, but that I am convinced that thirty senators and sixty representatives would do the business of the State just as well, and probably better, in a legislative capacity, but because this is the number that we have had for a long time, and because it is a number that will be more likely to meet the approbation of the Convention, and of the people, than any number that we might substitute for it, I shall go for it. First, however, let me say, that I think a smaller number would answer all purposes, and I do not believe it is necessary to represent all the small counties separately. The basis of representation should be people, not acres of land, whether cultivated or uncultivated. Sir, I am contemplating the practice that has prevailed in this respect, under the old Constitution. I grant you that the argument of the gentleman from Scott, would be well-timed, and have its force so that argument might extend to townships and neighborhoods upon the same principle. Under the old practice, you will recollect local legislation was the order of the day—local legislation for counties, and, indeed, down to townships. If they did not directly legislate for townships, they did indirectly. They would pass a law in reference to the sale of ardent spirits for instance, and make that law applicable to as many townships as choose to adopt it, by vote of a majority of the voters in said townships. Now, the inhabitants of this State, are but one people, from Lake Michigan to the Ohio River, and from the boundary of the State of Ohio to Illinois, and they are for putting restrictions upon this sort of legislation, and requiring the Legislature to make but one uniform law, for all sections and divisions of the State. Let it not be said that the Indian who travels from one part of the State to the other, shall be subject to half a dozen different laws in the course of his travel—laws that he may not know the existence of, when he leaves home—but that the same laws shall govern him in all parts of the State. That he shall have the security of the protection of the laws wherever he may go [consent]. I insist that there is no necessity for local legislation, and consequently no necessity for local representation. If your laws are to be uniform, the representatives of Marion county, may just as well represent Tippecanoe and St. Joseph, provided they are of equal intelligence. And, I suppose, looking at the delegates from those counties, they will not suffer by comparison. Well, what do you propose to do. You say that you will have only general legislation; that is, all railroads, plank roads, bridges, &c., shall be made under general laws. You say that county and township business shall be done in a uniform manner, not by commissioners in one, and Justices of the Peace in another. That there shall be one uniform mode of summoning Grand Juries and of transacting all other county business; that the system of taxation shall be uniform throughout the State; that the laws shall be the same, the principle the same, the application of them the same. If we go upon that principle, sir, we might, in my judgment, with all propriety, reduce the number of senators and representatives, were it not that we were attached to the old customs and policy. I shall go for the section as it stands. I hope it will not be re-committed, but that we shall pass it as it stands.

Mr. WATTS. I am in favor of this proposition, and my views accord to some extent, with those of the gentleman from Tippecanoe; but I go for re-committing the section, while he goes against it. I go for re-committing it, because I wish the number of Senators and Representatives reduced. I believe that one hundred men can represent this State as well as five hundred, and my constituents expect a reduction to be made, If the logic of the gentleman from Scott is correct in regard to having a representative from each county, the principle will hold good in regard to our representation in Congress. If his argument is correct, we are not sufficiently represented in Congress, because the representative in Congress cannot represent a county in which he does not reside. It appears to me that population is the correct basis for representation. I therefore, shall vote against laying the instructions on the table, and shall vote to instruct the committee to report fifty Senators and one hundred Representatives.

Mr. PETTIT. Well, that is precisely what the section is now.

Mr. RITCHEY. I hope Mr. President, that the motion of my friend from Wayne, (Mr. Newman,) to re-commit will not be sustained. I am opposed to re-committing this section, because it has already been fully discussed and we have taken votes enough upon it to show that the majority of the Convention is in favor of the section as it stands reported.

There is another objection to re-committing, and that is, if the number be reduced as he proposes, it subjects us to the absolute necessity of either districting the State ourselves, for the next five or ten years, or of requiring the Legislature to assemble this month to district the State, both for the old and the new Constitutions. I think that, sir, is a consideration that ought to weigh with every member of the Convention. If we sustain the present number of representatives, fifty in the Senate and one hundred in the House, the same Legislature that districts the State under the old Constitution this winter can do it also for the new Constitution, so that there will be no necessity for our wasting several weeks in the extra labor of apportioning Senators and Representatives among the several counties in the State.

Some gentlemen appear to be very anxious for the reduction of the number of Senators and very willing to increase the number of Representatives in the House. I see no reason, sir, for a small Senate and a large House of Representatives.

I do think as my friend from Owen (Mr. Dobson) on yesterday attempted to prove, that in reducing the Senate to thirty-three or four members, that it will make that body an aristocratic branch which the democratic republican branch of the House could never control. Some gentlemen appear to lay great stress on the fact that New York and other States have a small number of senators. Now, sir, for myself I care not what number of senators the State of New York may have fixed upon. I am not governed in regard to this point by the number of senators they may choose to select. I choose to be governed by my own sense of propriety. And let me say to those gentlemen who look so much to New York, Ohio, and other States of the Union, for guidance in the discharge of their duty here in regard to this subject, that there are many very good reasons as regards this State why we should not have a small number of senators. There are but fifty-six counties in New York, while we have ninety-one counties; and if the doctrine contended for by gentlemen be true, that each county has separate and distinct interests, there is a manifest propriety in the State of New York having a less number of senators than would be appropriate in this State. But can any gentleman say that Ohio county should be represented as fully in the Legislature with its hundreds of polls as Wayne county with its thousands? That the county of Ohio should be entitled to the same influence in the deliberations of our government as the county of Wayne? I deem these reasons sufficient, sir, to explain my position, and hope that the section will be passed, as it has been engrossed, and that no motion will prevail for referring it to a committee with instructions.

Mr. HADDEN moved to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Is it in order, Mr. President, to move a series of instructions as a substitute for the instructions already pending?

The PRESIDENT. That depends upon whether the author of the instructions already pending, will accept them or not.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I move, then, as an amendment to the amendment, that the Senate shall consist of fifty, and the House of one hundred members; provided that, after the year 1860, the House may be increased so as not to exceed one hundred and twenty in number.

It must be evident to every member of the Convention, that, upon this question, there must be concession. Every gentleman must concede something. Now I, for one, represent a small county, and I would be glad if the proposition of the gentleman from Lagrange, (Mr. Howe,) giving each county a Representative, would be adopted; but I fear, if his system of a large representation of both branches, be adopted, we shall have a strong vote from the larger counties, against the adoption of the new Constitution. Again, if we adopt the reduced system of representation, you would virtually deprive the small counties of Representatives, as they would have to be attached to large counties for Representative and Senatorial districts. Thus they would be deprived of a voice in the councils of the State. When you come to them and ask them to adopt this Constitution, with such a provision in it, they will scoff at you, and say that nothing would induce them to adopt a measure that would deprive them of the privilege of representation, which they have hitherto enjoyed.

I have offered this proposition, also, with the expectation of meeting the increase of population in the newly settled counties, and for the purpose of making a compromise between the smaller and the larger counties. We may not district the State again in ten years, and in the course of that time, the northern part of the State will have more than doubled its population; and then, under the reduced system, the southern portion will be largely in the minority.

Mr. PETTIT. That is what the north has hitherto been suffering under, viz.: the majority composed of the southern portion of the State.

Mr. EDMONSTON. The south have suffered something, too, in regard to this matter. The southern counties have been tied up in knots, as it were, for the purpose of representation. So the north has not been the only sufferer. I ask it, then, as a matter of compromise from the strong counties, that they leave it in the hands of the Legislature to district the Representatives throughout the State. Unless we do that we shall get into difficulty. The discontented portion of the counties of the State will come up and poll a strong vote against the new Constitution.

Will any gentleman say that one hundred Representatives are too many to represent a million of souls? I think not, with any degree of fairness. I noticed that the gentleman from Hendricks, (Mr. Nave,) who advocated the reduction principle, appeared to speak as if the whole State rested upon his shoulders—he said that the people of Indiana demanded the reduction. Where, I would ask, did the gentleman get his information from? Has he visited every portion of the State, and inquired what was the will of the people on the subject? The amount of it is, he takes the broad ground that Hendricks county reflects the will of every county in the State. I could take the position, sir, following his example, that the gentlemen does not reflect the will of his own county;—but I will not take that ground, although I could take it as fairly as the gentleman takes the position he has assumed. To prove his position, he reads an extract from a message, delivered by Governor Wallace, in 1840, in which the Governor recommended a reduction of the number of Representatives. But what does this extract prove? It proves directly the reverse of the position of the man from gentleHendricks, as any gentleman can readily perceive. For that was the time when economy was very strictly regarded and exercised. We all recollect that that was just after the great crash of the internal improvement system, when the people were staggering under the enormous debt which they had incurred, and surely, if there was any period when a saving could have been made, it was at this time. But what was the result of the recommendation, which I, have no doubt, was honestly and patriotically made by Governor Wallace, at that time? Why, the Legislature refused to adopt the recommendation. Did the gentleman ever see those members who voted against the reduction called in question for their votes by the people? No, sir; the people held the right of representation in greater estimation than any other right, and were willing to pay for it. Governor Wallace, as I have said, honestly entertained the opinions in his message at that period. But time and experience have doubtless charged them. I do not believe any gentleman is desirous of holding him to an accountability for those opinions. And I further believe that, if the gentleman himself is interrogated in regard to the opinions he holds now on the subject, they will be found to differ considerably from those he entertained in 1840.

The people, sir, have not desired, nor do they desire, a reduction of representation. They say they want a voice in the body sent here to make laws for them:—and the expense of that representation is with them, as mere dust in the balance. The right which is held most sacred in the estimation of a free people, is the right of representation.

I am willing, sir, as a matter of compromise, to let the representation stand as it does at present, at fifty members in the Senate, and one hundred in the House; leaving it discretionary with the Legislature hereafter, in accordance with the wishes of their constituents, to increase the number in the House to one hundred and twenty. It must be evident to every gentleman, that we must have a compromise in this matter, and it appears to me that the measure I have proposed is the most feasible one that can be adopted.

Mr. RARIDEN. I have not taken part in the discussion of this subject hitherto, although I had thought a good deal about it before I came here.

The first inquiry that presents itself to mind is, what is the cause of the vicious legislation we have been compelled to endure for the last eight or ten years? The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) attributes it very justly to local legislation; but what has induced that legislation? It arises from the number of Representatives here, who individually have felt that they were charged with local interest which it was their duty to take care of and advance in every possible way. This has been the cause of so much vicious legislation, the representation of local interests in the Legislature. Although there is nothing in the present Constitution to justify it, yet it follows local representation as a consequence. We have no occasion to make special provision in the Constitution in order to put a stop to the evil; we need only to change the character of the representation here. We should reduce the number so that members cannot represent local interests, and it ceases. I propose, then, to make a proposition which I think will remedy the evil; and which, it appears to me, has nothing selfish in it.

I propose a ratio so large as to break up every Senatorial district in the State—the district of Wayne among the rest. And I further propose that the ratio of population for the Representatives in the House be about one-third of that for the Senate.

In regard to the necessity of every county having a representative: I deny that it is the case generally that such a system would redound to the interests of Indiana. I see, sir, no representation of any local interest on this floor. We come here as representatives of the general interests of the State of Indiana. We represent the entire population of the State, and no measure should be adopted to advance the interests of any local portion of the population. This being the case, we should endeavor, in all matters of difficult settlement, to agree to a compromise, so as to render the measures we may adopt acceptable to all the people of the State.

I conscientiously believe if local interests had not been so powerfully represented at the time of the adoption of the system of internal improvements, the debt incurred by the State would not have been one-half as great. Each county pressed its claims for a portion of improvement, and in many cases where it would be of no possible utility. What gentlemen are desiring to maintain here, or at least a large number of them, I am aiming to break up. Wayne county, sir, has no interest adverse to the general interests of the State of Indiana. If it had it should never be countenanced.

The gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) inquired of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) whether corporations and associations organized with a view to carrying on internal improvements in the county ought not to have representatives in the Legislature? I answer no, they ought not. If a work set on foot by corporations cannot sufficiently entitle itself to the general affection of the people of Indiana from its utility, it is clearly evident that it ought not to be continued. Special representatives would endanger their interests much more than if they leave them in the hands of the people generally.

Now, sir, suppose we make a ratio of one Senator to every six thousand polls in the State. This would break up every Senatorial district in Indiana, so that it would be almost impossible that a Senator could be the representative of any special local interest. And that is my object—to do away with the representation of local interests.

By this ratio every part of the State would be treated alike, and nobody would have any cause to complain. The ratio of the House could then be fixed at fair representation, say for two thousand polls, and this would give us nearly a hundred representatives. The people then have the representation entirely in their own hands, and all interests would be treated fairly.

The evil of vicious legislation under which we are now suffering, as I said before, has arisen from local legislation. Heretofore a representative could not make himself acceptable to the people of the county he represented, unless he had some local measure in which they were interested passed.

This has brought disrepute on the State, and produced confusion in our whole jurisprudence. There is scarcely a county in the State living under the same universal and uniform code of laws. All are living under codes of laws that in some points are different.

It is my desire to break up this system of legislation, and with it the log-rolling by which it was ever sustained; and I think the proposition I have presented will have this effect. Because, sir, combinations of local interests, which have heretofore been made, cannot, under this arrangement, be entered into with any degree of success.

I move then, sir, to strike out the whole of this section and insert the following in lieu thereof:

“The representatives for the Senate shall be fixed upon a ratio of six thousand polls, and for the House of Representatives upon a ratio of two thousand polls.”

The PRESIDENT. The amendment of the gentleman from Wayne is out of order at present.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. Mr. PRESIDENT: This subject has been under consideration for several days. I have listened attentively and said nothing. I need not say that I have fears that justice will not be done to the district I represent. I live in a small county, but have the honor to represent in part a respectably large county; between these two counties there is now a good understanding, and my particular wish is (if the counties shall determine to district the State, to which I am opposed) that my district may remain as it is. It strikes my mind that there is a manifest propriety in the doctrine that each county should have a representative in the popular branch of the General Assembly. I have heard no argument to change this opinion. It has been stated, sir, that taxation and representation should go hand in hand. Well that is an axiom which no one will dispute; but does this proposition mean that property or people shall be represented in proportion to quantity, or number? I take it neither; but that organized counties or States, under the control of the legislation of a power claiming authority to tax them, ought to be represented in the body which sets up and exercises this authority. Sir, this was the doctrine set up and maintained by our revolutionary fathers. Was it right? And if it were then right, is it not just and proper now? But the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) thinks that one senator can represent six thousand taxable polls, as well as two or three. I hope that in view of this fact gentlemen living in large counties will show their generosity towards the smaller counties. This they ought to do, unless they assume the position that they possess more capacity to legislate for the small counties, than those counties do to legislate for themselves. This I leave for gentlemen to decide who have the power to decide it. The other day when the gentleman from Wayne introduced resolutions approving of the compromise measures of the last session of Congress, he supported them boldly and ably, and voted for them; but at least two of the representatives from the same county voted on the other side. Now they could not all represent the people of Wayne county, undoubtedly not. Sir, it is true that a representative before he takes his seat in either branch of the Legislature, solemnly swears that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and of this State, and discharge the duties of a representative of the State of Indiana. Not a word in the obligation about counties or local interests. This is the business of a representative beyond all manner of doubt. But who will deny that there are always local interests in the several counties requiring and deserving the special attention of one who may know from personal observation their merits. Although by our action here we may relieve the General Assembly of much legislation, in respect to local matters, yet we cannot dispense with it entirely. And in conclusion permit me to repeat that I hope Switzerland and Ohio counties may not be separated in the formation of senatorial districts.

Mr. KENDALL of White. Hitherto, Mr. President, I have refrained entirely from taking part in the discussions that have taken place in this body, having been a silent, though not inattentive member of it, and I experience considerable diffidence in deviating as I now do, from my usual course.

This, sir, is a question in which my constituents take a deep interest. There is no topic perhaps that is brought forward in the new counties for consideration that excites more feeling, or gives rise to more discussion than the right of representation. They look upon it as the only evidence of their political importance and consideration. During this discussion the inquiry has been made again and again why one person may not be as capable of representing two, three, and four counties, as well as of representing one, and it is asserted by some gentlemen that two or more counties can have their interests as well cared for by one representative as though each county had a representative. This assertion does not agree with my own limited experience and observation on this subject. Take for example my own representative district which is composed of four counties, and see how they are represented in the Legislature. The arrangement these counties have entered into in regard to representation is this: One county sends a representative one year, another the next year, and so on, each having a representative once in four years. A necessary consequence growing out of this is that the representation upon all local questions that arise, will represent the wishes and will of the people of his resident county, regardless of the opposing interests of the residue of the district, and the result is that these counties are no more represented in your Legislature three years out of the four, than if they were a part of the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

An increase of the number of representatives is objected to on the score of economy, but I think as the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) has correctly stated, that the people would rather economize in any other particular, than by reducing their representation. As citizens have no higher privilege than that of suffrage, so counties have no higher privilege than that of representation and participating in the State councils. I think further that it would be much more reasonable to assert that the large counties of Marion and Wayne, for instance, could be effectually and sufficiently represented by one representative, than that four counties could be so represented; for in the latter case, there is often a conflict of interests, each county having a separate and distinct interest from all other counties, whilst in the large and populous county there is a unity of interest. I hope, therefore, that this fact will be borne in mind by those delegates representing the larger counties of the State that have two or more representatives, and that they will not exact too much from the new counties which are rapidly increasing in population, but will be disposed to give them a fair and indeed liberal share, in the representation of the State. It is asserted that representation and taxation should go together, but this principle bears heavily upon the new counties. We have a burdensome State debt which these new counties had no agency in creating, and yet they, unrepresented in the creation of it, are to share in the taxation necessary to discharge the interest on an indebtedness from which they have derived no benefit. I trust that a liberal system of representation will be settled upon, so far as the new and weaker counties are concerned. Representation in these new counties has hitherto been kept at a great distance as it were from the people, and I am persuaded that they are possessed of no right which this Convention might be disposed to abridge that would excite among them as much angry resentment as this right of representation. I am satisfied that nothing will do so much to prejudice the success of any Constitution that may be submitted to them, as the diminution of their political importance. However wholesome otherwise its provisions may be, however advantageous some, if not all of its amendments, the feeling proper for its favorable consideration will not be conciliated, if this reduction be insisted on. They will prefer to retain their present position under the old Constitution to any promised advantages, coupled with such sacrifice. I hope, therefore, that if no greater rights of representation are extended to them that their situation will not be rendered less desirable, and that the provisions of the present Constitution, if more liberal terms cannot be granted, may be allowed to remain in force.

Mr. STEELE. Perhaps it is necessary, after the various votes that have been taken upon this subject, that I should give the reasons for the manner in which I have voted. I first voted to reduce the number of representatives and in favor of sustaining the section reported by the committee, because I believed that a reduced number could perform all requisite legislation. I found, however, that the Convention did not intend to sustain that system, and I then went on and voted for a section providing for a continuance of the present number of representatives in the Legislature. I refer to the section now before us. No argument, sir, has as yet convinced me that it is my duty to vote for the instructions to this section, the amendment to the instructions, or for the re-commitment of the section. I believe, that, to consider either of these propositions is but a waste of the time of this body, and that it will be going over ground we have already traveled over. It appears to me it will not be very much to our credit, and that our action will appear very trifling, so far, if we do not sustain what we have already agreed upon without any reference.

I can say, sir, with the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) and the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) that I believe representation ought to be based upon numbers. That has been my opinion all along. But, while I thus believe, I would state that I think this section, providing for fifty senators and one hundred representatives, will meet with the approval of the people probably more fully than any other that can be presented. As far as the question of reduction of representation is concerned, the people take but little interest in it, if any. When we take into consideration the small reduction proposed to be made by this motion to re-commit—only fifteen Senators—and that the actual expense will not amount to three thousand dollars in two years—as we are to have biennial sessions—it appears to me to be a very small item to waste our time in discussing.

Mr. SMITH of Scott called for the previous question, but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. KELSO, who said: I desire to say a word or two in reference to this matter, before it is finally disposed of. I would first inquire of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) whether he will not modify his amendment—which, being to the original section, has not yet been acted upon—so as to fix the number of senators at thirty-five, and the number of representatives at one hundred and sixteen, instead of one hundred and fifteen.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. Certainly; the difference is in no wise material.

Mr. KELSO. It is understood, then, that the gentleman from Jefferson has modified his amendment as I suggested. I desire to say a few words with reference to his proposition as it now stands.

And first, sir, with reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dubois, (Mr. Edmonston,) proposing fifty senators and one hundred representatives, and after 1860 to increase the number in the House to one hundred and twenty, if necessary.

Now, sir, that kind of amendment is but of little or no use whatever. The smaller counties would be benefited but little by a two-third or three-quarter ratio. The county from which I come would suffer nothing until you get above twenty-five hundred polls. The county of Ohio, taxed for representative purposes, would not be benefited if you reduced her ratio to one-half.

Now, sir, the question is: What sort of compromise shall be made? It is very certain; if we are to be governed entirely in both branches of the Legislature by any basis of representation, that population is the proper basis. I have already, sir, appealed to the Convention to make population a basis of representation; but that appeal has been disregarded, and I shall not attempt to bring it forward again. I have only to say, that, if we fix upon any basis, population is the true basis. But I have only to say that one hundred and sixteen representatives and thirty-four senators is about as good a system of representation as we can fix upon. The counties must be attached for representative purposes, and the State must, therefore, be districted by this Convention; or if not, it becomes the duty of the Legislature to district the State.

There are three leading interests in this State—agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing. Each county has at least one of these interests within its limits, some, two of them, and a few, all three. But these interests do not necessarily come in conflict with each other; and there will be no difficulty in attaching counties for representative purposes, provided care be taken to attach counties for representative purposes whose interests run in the same channel, as far as practicable. I would prefer, even to this, the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) to take, as a basis for senators, six thousand polls, and for representatives, two thousand polls; if, for the only reason, that it would indirectly reduce the number of senators. But if we are to take the number as it now stands, in the aggregate of one hundred and fifty members, I think it would certainly be more even-handed justice to take the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, of thirty-four senators and one hundred and sixteen representatives—thus making the total of one hundred and fifty, for which so many gentlemen strenuously contend.

Gentlemen suppose that nothing but fifty Senators and one hundred Representatives will satisfy the people. Sir, any number will satisfy the people. Thirty Senators and sixty Representatives will satisfy the people better than fifty Senators and one hundred Representatives; and, sir, if even that proposition was submitted to the people, they would as certainly reduce as they lived to vote. It is not the feeling of the people that we bring here with us. The Legislature that fixed the present number of Representatives in both branches at one hundred and fifty members, did not represent the feelings of the people. And, sir, we, as members of the Convention, by fixing the representation at as large a number as is practicable, stand a fair chance of getting into the Legislature, those of us who have not been there, and those who have, of getting there again. I, who have never had anything short of a hard race to get into the Legislature at all, am willing to fix upon six thousand polls as a basis of representation for Senators, and two thousand for Representatives. Or I am willing to reduce the number of Senators to thirty, and the number of Representatives to sixty or ninety. I will run the risk, and I apprehend that other members ought to be willing to do the same thing.

I argue, sir, that to reduce the Senate would be one of the most popular steps this Convention could take. I am satisfied that the people can be made to understand what is to their interest, and that, too, with but little trouble. The large counties will suffer nothing by such an arrangement as regards the Senate, and I am sure they will have equal influence in the House.

My friend from Johnson (Mr. Ritchey) asserts that a small Senate will become an aristocratic body. I ask him how a body of thirty men, in the discharge of these duties as Senators, will become more aristocratic than fifty men? What is there to induce such a result? They come here as Representatives of the people; and with a higher degree of personal responsibility than a body of fifty men would have—and the more responsibility rests upon them the greater the care they will take to discharge their duties faithfully and honestly.

If population, sir, is to be the basis of representation, let us fix upon the smallest possible number, so that as population increases, the number of Representatives may also increase. This is the true policy to adopt.

I concur with the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) in one thing, and that is if we are to be governed by general laws, as is proposed, that local interests should not be suffered to interfere in the action of our Legislature; that an individual from the county of Marion can as well represent the interests of the county of Vigo, as a resident of the county. One man can as well represent two thousand people as one thousand. Their interests, if not entirely the same, can be represented by the will of the majority. Besides, I apprehend there are honest men enough out of the county of Vigo to represent her interests fairly.

In common justice, sir, to all parts of the State, I do not think we should fix upon the number of representatives in both branches of the Legislature we need at once, and not make provision for their further increase. If we fix the number of Representatives at one hundred, the northern portion of the State will—as its population is rapidly increasing—soon be in advance of the southern and eastern portions of the State—so that they will deprive us of the equality which belongs to us now. I therefore maintain, sir, that territory is the proper basis of representation for the House, and population for the Senate. This is only reversing the system which has been adopted by the General Government. They take territory for their Senate, and population for the House. To be sure, this system would not do exactly strict justice to the small and newly settled counties; but the population of those counties will soon be swelled to the size of the largest counties that are now in the State. Those counties which are now small in size, and which have been long settled, and which cannot reasonably expect an increase of population, will be greatly the sufferers, for they must unquestionably lose the small share of representation which they now enjoy.

I do insist, sir, that if we would allow to each county a Representative, and apportion the Senate upon the basis of population, much nearer even-handed justice would be done. The Senate is but a mere conservative body, calculated to act as a wholesome check upon the more popular branch of the Legislature, to prevent over hasty and improvident legislation; it also has a salutary influence over the executive branch of our State Government. Then why require fifty members to constitute that body, when one half that number would answer every possible purpose that the fifty members could do. By such an arrangement, those small counties would always have a voice in one branch of the Legislature subject to be checked by the Senate, provided they should go astray.

I should be glad to see the representation thus arranged.

There is no good reason, none can be offered against such an arrangement, with the single exception that I made the other day, and that is where the election of a United States Senator comes on once in four years; in that case the small counties would each have a vote, and the larger counties would have less votes in proportion for that office.

And now, sir, I ask, is that question of sufficient importance to drive the Convention to an arrangement of this matter, that must and will do great injustice? Is it necessary to disfranchise the smaller counties, that the large ones may choose a United States Senator, because, forsooth, there are more people in a large county than a small one? I cannot so regard it. I do not think, sir, that the bare fact that once in four years, and then in two years—or in other words, twice in every six years—an election of a United States Senator will come on before the Legislature, is of itself a sufficient reason to so arrange our representation as to eventually deprive the smaller counties of a representative voice in either branch of the Legislature.

I cannot and I do not believe the people of Indiana wish to see any such system of inequality established among them. But on the contrary, I am of opinion that if the question was left to the people themselves they would be decidedly more liberal in their disposition of it.

I hope, sir, the section will be re-committed—as much untrammelled as possible, with instructions—and let it be so arranged as to do common justice as near as can be done.

Mr. COOKERLY. I represent a county, sir, that stands first in population and the number of polls it contains, among the counties of the State; and the people of that county are unanimously in favor of a reduction in the number of State Senators. This is the sentiment of the people in the county I represent; and I believe it is also the sentiment of a large majority of the people of Indiana. I have voted, sir, in accordance with that sentiment. And now, sir, when we come to consider the proposition and learn the number of representatives as it now stands, I am ready to go with gentlemen in distributing the number of representatives as much as possible amongst the people of Indiana. I go then for the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) to fix the number of Senators at thirty-four, and the number of Representatives at one hundred and sixteen: this will give every county containing two thousand inhabitants a representative. This I consider right and proper, and when we come to vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) I shall vote for it with a hearty good will.

Mr. RITCHEY. The gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) inquires how the Senate is more aristocratic with thirty, than with fifty members. The gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) made it plain enough the other day, without my having to explain it. There are some thirty large cities and towns growing rapidly in wealth and influence at different points in the State. If we have a Senate of only thirty members, sixteen making a majority, these cities will control this majority and thus make it an aristocratic body. But, sir, if the number of Senators is kept up to fifty, there are not twenty-five towns that have sufficient power to control a majority of that body.

While up I would make another remark in favor of continuing the present number of Senators and Representatives. I would be willing to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Dubois, (Mr. Edmonston,) but I fear it could not be carried. I am willing then to stand to the proposition for fifty Senators and one hundred Representatives in this way—because I believe it takes away the agitation excited in the different counties whenever an apportionment of the State takes place. Whenever this occurs, demagogues in the different counties of the State get up and advocate reduction of representation, and therefore I wish to fix upon a certain number of Representatives for both branches, and that the number be permanent. By the section before us, it is provided that the Senate shall not exceed fifty, and the House one hundred members, but I trust it may be so modified as that it shall provide there shall be fifty Senators and one hundred Representatives. If this is fixed, one stimulant to constant political excitement will be done away with entirely.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. Some gentlemen have said that the proposition contained in the amendment I have submitted, has already been voted down, and that its further consideration ought not to be pressed upon the Convention. In this statement they are mistaken. We are now for the first time about to vote upon a proposition which, while it gives to the two branches of the Legislature one hundred and fifty members, reduces the Senate and increases the House, so as to make the former consist of less than a third of the number of members in the latter body. I have proposed this change for two reasons: First, that every county in the State, so far as the same is practicable with a due regard to the proper basis of representation, may have a separate representative in the popular branch of the General Assembly. Secondly, that by making a greater disparity of members in the two Houses, we may give to the Senate a more conservative character than it will possess under the section adopted by the Convention. I should be glad, if it were possible, that we could secure to every county in the State a representative in the General Assembly, but it must be apparent to every one that such a provision is impossible in this State now, without an utter disregard of population as the basis of representation. When our population becomes more equally distributed throughout the State, such a provision will be both practicable and proper. But, sir, I consider it a matter of the first importance that the Senate should be reduced in numbers. We have now, I believe, a larger Senate than any other State in the Union—larger by eighteen members than the great State of New York; larger by seventeen than the maximum provided for the Senate of Pennsylvania, and by fourteen than the maximum of the Ohio Senate. Certainly the example of these great States is worthy of our consideration. I take it for an established fact that the two Houses of the General Assembly will not reduce the numbers of their respective bodies below the maximum allowed in the Constitution, and therefore, that for all practical purposes we might as well say that the Senate shall consist of fifty members, and the House of one hundred, as to say that they shall consist of not exceeding these numbers respectively. I do not recollect an instance where such bodies ever consented to a reduction of their numbers.

My amendment virtually proposes that the Senate shall consist of thirty-five members and the House of one hundred and fifteen. Some gentlemen have repeated that the Senate should be placed at thirty-four members, and the House at one hundred and sixteen. I have no objection to that modification, and will cheerfully consent to it to accommodate the views of those who desire to make the change. Estimating the number of Senators at thirty-four, each Senator would represent, in round numbers, six thousand voters; and giving to the House one hundred and sixteen members, each member would represent one thousand seven hundred voters. No one county in the State would have a Senator under this apportionment, and that is precisely what I desire. I wish, as far as practicable, to prevent any Senator from having the same constituency as any member of the House. Let two or more counties unite in the election of a Senator, and then his action, instead of being governed by a single county, will be controlled by the wishes of the majority in his district. My object is to make the Senate in part, what the theory of our Government is, as it should be, a conservative body.

It has been stated here, that, if you reduce the Senate to the number proposed, you will make it an aristocracy. This argument, in my mind, is simply absurd. That body an aristocracy which receives all its power from the people, and has every four years to lay down its power at the feet of the people! That body an aristocracy which can enact no law without the consent of the members of the House, who are elected every two years! The Senate has no positive power without the corporation of the House. It has a negative upon the action of the House. It may say that such and such laws shall not be passed, but it cannot say that such and such laws shall be passed. And let me ask you, sir, what is the great evil in our legislation? Is it that we have too much or too little? The great complaint is that we have too much legislation—that our laws are subjected to too many changes. Reduce the Senate, and your Senators will be selected for their age, their experience, and their general information. They will have time to consider deliberately those propositions which large bodies are apt to act upon hastily and inconsiderately. Every Senator will act under high responsibility; he will have to regard the interests of a larger section of country, and a more numerous constituency than any member in the House of Representatives.

Mr. TAYLOR remarked that he felt considerable interest in relation to this question. The gentleman who had just set down, had stated that it mattered but little about the number in the Senate, if there was a large body of Representatives in the House. Now he (Mr. T.) considered that as no measure could be passed without the co-operation of the Senate, that it was as important that the Senate should be kept pure and guarded against improper extraneous influences, as it was that the House should be thus preserved from corrupting influences. If the number of Senators was reduced so that a majority of sixteen could control the Senate, there was no doubt, in his opinion, that three or four influential men would direct its entire proceedings. The less the number of Senators to act upon, the greater would be the influence of a few able men upon the body. When men of talent were placed in a body of fifty men, they were far less likely to exercise a controlling influence than in a smaller body; there were too many to listen to them, and too many to hold consultations with. It must be evident to every one, that a man of capacity could control a few men easier than a large number. For one, he greatly preferred increasing the number of Representatives in the House than reducing the Senate, because, to retain the present number of Senators, would make the Senate a purer body, and place it beyond the power of in-door or out-door influence to control it. There were times of popular excitement upon great questions, when, under the influence of which, a small body might be overawed, whilst a large body, if firm and united, could withstand all extraneous influences. He preferred, then, that the Senate should be composed of fifty members, and the House of one hundred.

If the proposed reduction was to be made merely on the score of economy, why not come down to ten Senators and thirty-five Representatives? If economy was to be the rule, such a system of representation would far better accord with it. He was opposed to any reduction.

Mr. DOBSON remarked that he was opposed to any reduction in the Senate. The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) had presented a proposition which reduces the Senate fifteen and adds that number to the House, which would make the Senate to consist of thirty-five and the House of one hundred and fifteen. I do not accuse the gentleman of improper motives, yet it looks very much like a bid for the small counties. Now, if gentlemen from the small counties will look at the thing right, they will see that what they gain in one branch, they loose in the other, so it amounts to nothing at all.

Another gentleman had remarked that the Senate could pass no law. This was true, and neither could the House by itself pass a law. That is to say, it required the co-operative action of both Senate and House to pass a law, and then if the Executive did not approve it, it would be no law. The Senate might refuse to pass a bill that had gone through the House—but if the House and the Executive concurred as to the propriety of its adoption, it could not pass without the aid of the Senate. When the House and the Executive wanted to pass a law, certain interests might control a small Senate, and thereby defeat the just expectations of a majority of the people of the State. I prefer keeping the Senate as it now stands numerically.

Again the gentleman from Jefferson said that he preferred having three or four counties in one Senatorial district, than to have two, the object being to prevent the larger county from swallowing up the smaller one. He thought that it was just as probable that one larger county might swallow up two or three small counties as one—its influence might preponderate over the united effort of the smaller counties.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) and other gentlemen had remarked that they were going to do away with local laws and legislation—a small number of Representatives would subserve the interests of the people as well, and that a gentleman from one county could as well represent the interests of one or more counties as not. To this argument he demurred. When it was examined carefully, it would be found to be an incorrect principle. The true object of this government was not to destroy the power to correct local legislation, but to place it in other hands, take it away from the Legislature and give it to the county boards. Each county generally, had different interests which would be greatly affected by legislation, and therefore they should be represented as fully as practicable. The people of the county of Laporte came mostly from the Eastern States, and were used, for instance, in the land from which they emigrated, to keep their live stock confined within certain limits. Having lived under that kind of law, they naturally wished to enact similar laws where they reside. The very nature, too, of the country, (timber being scarce) would demand such a law to prevent stock running at large. But if it is desired to pass a similar law, to go into operation all over the State, it would materially affect the stock raising interests of the State in the South, where there are wide tracts of land, on which stock is permitted to run at large. Thus it would be seen that general laws could not always protect local interests; local legislation must be resorted to. The object of all gentleman should be to provide laws for the protection of every individual living under it, though not at the expense or injury of others. Different laws were required for the different parts of the State. He hoped the section would be passed, providing for the continuance of the present system of representation. The system of floats, however, he did not approve of.

Mr. WOLFE said, that when this proposition first came up there was a strong manifestation on the part of a majority of the Convention to push it right through, about as it now stood. He then went for a reduction in both branches, but found himself in the minority, so that finally on the engrossment of the present section he voted for it, for the reason that this left the question open, so that the people, through their representatives, could hereafter make a reduction in either branch or both branches. The next vote would have been on the proposition of the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) which would have fixed the number certain at fifty in the Senate and one hundred in the House. He was anxious for a reduction, but was unwilling to reduce the Senate and raise the number in the House. He would in no case vote for more than one hundred in the House; and if the present number had to be retained, for one, he would go for the proposition as it now stood, not to exceed fifty in the Senate and one hundred in the House. He hoped to see gentlemen come up and aid in the passage of this section as it now stood.

Mr. KELSO moved to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered were taken with the following result—yeas 95, nays 24:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Logan, Maguire, Mather, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—95.

Those voting in the negative were, Messrs. Alexander, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Carr, Edmonston, Garvin, Hogin, Howe, Johnson, Lockhart, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Moon-ey, Ritchey, Smith of Scott, Spann, Wiley, and Work—24.

So the pending amendments were laid on the table.

Mr. PRATHER. As I believe the minds of members are fully made up in regard to this subject, I call for the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded by the Convention.

Mr. BORDEN said that he had labored under a misapprehension in the vote he had just given, and he would, therefore, move a re-consideration of the vote seconding the previous question.

Upon this motion, a division having been called for, it was decided in the negative.

So the vote was not re-considered.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the main question be now put?

It was so ordered by consent.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the second section of number twelve pass?

Upon this question the yeas and nays were taken, under the rules, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 73, nays 47:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, and Zenor—73.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Barbour, Borden, Bourne, Bryant, Carr, Coats, Cookerly, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Haddon, Helmer, Hitt, Howe, Kelso, Kendall of White, Logan, March, May, McLean, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—47.

So the second section of number twelve passed, and was referred to the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology.

On motion of Mr. PETTIT—

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section providing that Senatorial and Representative Districts shall be composed of contiguous counties, (where more than one county shall constitute a district,) and no county shall ever be divided for senatorial or representative purposes; provided that a county having a two-thirds ratio shall be entitled to a representative.

The amendment offered by Mr. DUNN of Jefferson, at the last adjournment, was declared to be out of order.

Mr. STEVENSON proposed to amend by striking out the section as it now stood, and inserting the section as reported by the committee, with an addition, providing that the Legislature might authorize the county boards of counties entitled to send two or more representatives to the Legislature to divide such counties into as many districts as they were entitled to send representatives; provided that no township or ward should be divided in forming such districts. Mr. S. said: the amendment I have offered, it will be perceived, is, in part, the section as reported by the committee. I offered an amendment the other day providing that large counties entitled to more than one representative should be divided into districts. The amendment which I now offer differs from that one, inasmuch as it provides that the Legislature shall have the power to authorize counties entitled to more than one representative, to divide these counties by authorizing the county boards to divide them into representative districts. It only gives the power to the Legislature to do this if they shall deem it advisable. It does not render it an imperative duty to be performed by them. Now the original section prohibits the Legislature from doing this even if under circumstances which we cannot foresee it should become ever so desirable. I would like to have the yeas and nays on the amendment.

After some conversation between Mr. BORDEN and Mr. STEVENSON, the latter withdrew his amendment.

The question then was on ordering the section, as amended, to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope we may have the section read again; I must confess that I do not understand it.

The section was accordingly read by the Secretary.

Mr. PETTIT. I shall be opposed to the entire section if that amendment is added to it. I repeat that I am in favor of the "people" basis, and not "two-thirds" of the people, thus giving one county an advantage over another. I do not care whether there are three counties or half a county together; I should prefer single representative districts.

Sir, I will give, in a very few words, my reasons for this opposition. I am opposed to a man having four votes for two representatives, and thereby having four times the influence in the legislative part of the government which another man has. How does it stand? Wayne county, for instance, has four or five representatives, and one man in Wayne county votes for four or five members in the law-making division of the government, while a man in a sparsely settled county has but one vote, and consequently there is no political equality between the people of the different sections of the State. I am therefore in favor of single representative and senatorial districts, giving to each voter the same power and influence in the legislative department of the government wherever he may live. There is neither reason nor justice in saying that a man residing in Wayne county, or Tippecanoe county, or Marion county, or in any of the large counties, should have four times the legislative influence in the government of the State of Indiana, than a man has who lives in Brown, or Jasper, or Benton, or White, or any of the sparsely settled counties. No matter how sparsely settled the county may be; he is a citizen of Indiana, and he has as much interest in being protected by the Legislature as a citizen who lives in a city or populous county. I favored the proposed amendment which has just been withdrawn by the gentleman from Putnam, for I think it would be much better than the section as it now is. I have said upon this floor, that whenever you shall propose a measure to me that will procure precise political equality, then I am for that measure. That when you show me a measure, however specious it may be, through which I can see political inequality, I am opposed to it; and the section, as it now stands amended, savors of political inequality, and not of political equality. Sir, you will disfranchise, in some counties, one-third as many men as you will give votes to in other counties. Wherever the two-third ratio is adopted, you will make two men in one place equal to three men in another place. Now, sir, I contend that there is no political equality in that. Let us have such a basis as shall compel the Legislature to make an equal division of the State. I care not whether counties are divided or not for the purposes of representation. It is so many people that I want represented, and not fields, and fences, and hedges, and ditches, and mountains, and valleys. I shall be compelled to vote directly against the proposition, and I hope that those who think as I do will help me to vote it down.

Mr. COLFAX. So far as the question of single districts is concerned, I agree entirely with the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) who has just taken his seat, and I shall therefore move to strike out the restriction which prohibits the division of counties for representative purposes. For one, I shall vote against the section which contains it, under any and all circumstances whatever. It violates the true spirit of republicanism. It ties up the hands of the Legislature, even if the whole people desired that representatives should be elected by single and separate districts. In large counties, entitled to three or four representatives, it gives to comparatively a few active, interested politicians, the selection, virtually, of the whole delegation. And I shall move and vote to strike it out, believing that in all cases, without exception, from County Commissioner up to Supreme Judge, public officers should be chosen by single districts; and especially that the Representative—the framer of the law—should be brought as near as possible to his constituents.

Experience elsewhere teaches us the benefit of this provision. In the State of New York single districts were for some time resisted, especially by the city, which, under the old system, elected thirteen representatives to the Legislature by general ticket—all nominated by one nominating convention—every voter voting for all. But the change was made. Single districts were at last authorized and established. Every district since has elected its own immediate representative; and those most opposed to that system at the time of its adoption, are now as warmly in its favor as those whose exertions secured it.

Gentlemen must remember, too, that it is not many years since Congressmen were elected in many States by general ticket—all the voters of the State voting for all the members to which she was entitled. At last Congress passed a law that thereafter members should be chosen from single districts, to be composed of contiguous territory, and as nearly equal population as possible. That law was resisted for some time by New Hampshire, Missouri, and Mississippi, but it is now complied with by every State, and is cordially acquiesced in by the whole people. It is not saying too much to declare that it is now the settled policy of the country, and that a departure from it hereafter would not be tolerated. And I would just as soon go back to the old Congressional system, and provide that Congressmen from Indiana shall all be elected on a general ticket, and that every voter shall vote for all ten of them, breaking up our present system of each district having its own immediate representative, as to vote for the present section as it now stands.

I move, therefore, Mr. President, to strike out that sentence of the section which prohibits the Legislature from creating single districts, and insert in lieu thereof the following :

"Counties entitled to more than one representative, may, under the provisions of a general law, be divided into representative districts."

Mr. BORDEN. It strikes me that my friend from St. Joseph is in error in this matter. I do not understand by this section that we cannot divide a county within itself. The provision is that we shall never take a part of one county and attach it to another either for senatorial or representative purposes.

Mr. COLFAX. I am not a very good grammarian, but it seems to me that the plain inference is, that no county shall ever be divided. I desire to strike that out, so that the Legislature may divide if they think fit for single districts.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I think the object of the gentleman from St. Joseph will be better accomplished by striking out the words "for representatives." That will leave it so that counties may be divided hereafter into single districts. I have no objection to the object of the amendment. I am in favor of it, for I think the principle contained in it is correct.

Mr. COLFAX. I will modify the amendment in this way : To strike out the remainder of a sentence after the word "counties" in the twelfth line, and insert :

"And counties entitled to more than one representative may, under the provisions of a general law, be divided into representative districts."

Mr. KENT. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. COLFAX. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, any resulted as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Beard, Berry, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Fisher, Foster, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hardin, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Logan, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tannehill, Todd, Wiley, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—51.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Garvin, Gootee, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Huff, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Moore, Morgan, Murray, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Shannon, Snook, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—60.

So the motion to lay the amendment on the table did not prevail.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. PETTIT desired that the section, as amended, should be read.

The Secretary read the amended section as follows :

"Senatorial and representative districts, where more than one county shall constitute a district, shall be composed of contiguous counties; and counties entitled to more than two representatives, may, under the provisions of a general law, be divided into representative districts : Provided, If any county at an apportionment shall have two-thirds or more of the ratio of representation, it shall be entitled to one representative."

Mr. PETTIT. I thought that the amendment was to strike out that proviso.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to re-commit the section with the pending amendment to the committee on the legislative department.

The question was taken on the motion to re-commit, and the division being called for, it was decided in the affirmative—yes 56, noes 46.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in the order of the day is the following section :

TERM OF SERVICE OF SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES.

The Secretary read the section, as follows :

"Senators shall be chosen for the term of four years, and Representatives for the term of two years from the day next after their general election—except that the term of service of one-half the Senators first elected under this Constitution (or if the whole number be an uneven one, then the term of service of one less than half) shall expire at the end of two years. And for the purpose of ascertaining whose term of service shall first expire, the Senators elect, at the first meeting of the General Assembly under this Constitution, shall be divided by lot into two equal classes, (as near as may be,) and the seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of two years, and of the second class at the expiration of four years, so that one half, as near as possible, shall be chosen biennially forever thereafter. And in case of increase of the number of Senators at any time, they shall be so annexed by lot to one or the other of the two classes, as to keep them as nearly equal as practicable."

Mr. PETTIT moved to strike out the last clause, from the word "and" in the twenty-fourth line to the conclusion. It will be seen that this section is drawn in reference to the second section reported by the same committee, in which they contemplated that neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate should consist of more nor less than a given number. This was drawn with reference to an increase. But the Convention has this morning fixed the number at one hundred for the House of Representatives and fifty for the Senate. [Cries of "no, no, no."]

Well, gentlemen, you may have it "no, no, no," if you please, but I am only telling you what has transpired. These are the numbers already fixed upon. The people may put them at less, but their representatives never will. I may therefore say, practically, that it is settled by this Convention, that the House shall consist of one hundred members and the Senate of fifty members. This latter clause therefore is of no earthly use, and will only incur the Constitution if it be allowed to remain.

Mr. DOBSON. It is very possible that the gentleman is right, when he says that there is no use in this clause. If, however, there is no use in it, it will certainly do no harm. It is not unlikely that before we conclude our labors here, we may provide the manner in which this Constitution shall be amended at some future day; and among other things, it may be provided that the Legislature shall have power to propose amendments. I will not say how we will do it, but keeping that contingency in view it may be possible that this clause may be useful. If, on the other hand, before we conclude these labors, we should find that the clause is useless, the committee on revision and phraseology can recommend that it shall be taken away. It is perfectly harmless as it is, and there is a possibility that it may be necessary. Under such circumstances, therefore, I am in favor of its remaining.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I think I can propose an amendment to the section that will both shorten and beautify it very much. I propose in the first line to strike out the word "four" and insert the word "two," and in the sixteenth line to strike out the remainder of the section after the word "election." That will save a great deal of unnecessary verbiage and make the Constitution much better.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment of the gentleman from Ripley is not in order. There is already an amendment pending, and the gentleman does not propose to amend the amendment.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Pettit to strike out the latter clause of the section, and it was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. Mr. President, I now insist upon my amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Ripley may insist upon his amendment, but the gentleman from St. Joseph has the floor.

Mr. COLFAX. I move to strike out the whole section and insert "Senators and Representatives shall be chosen for the term of two years from the day next after their general election." I ask the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, with the following result—yeas 37, nays 86:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Beard, Bicknell, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hardin, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Maguire, March, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Murray, Nave, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Read of Clark, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, and Wolfe—37.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Lockhart, Logan, Mather, May, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Elliott, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wundelich, Yooum, Zenor, and Mr. President—86.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. BADGER. I propose to amend the section by striking out in the eighteenth and nineteenth lines the words "and for the purpose of ascertaining whose term of service shall first expire." These words appears to me to be a redundancy. The following part of the section is sufficiently explicit without them.

The amendment was agreed to by consent. The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

QUALIFICATIONS OF SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention will now proceed to the consideration of the next section.

The Secretary read the section, as follows:

"No person shall be a Senator or Representative who at the time of his election is not a citizen of the United States, and been an inhabitant of the State for two years next preceding his election and the last year thereof of the county or district for which he may be chosen Senator, shall be at least twenty-five, and Representative twenty one years of age."

Mr. WALPOLE. I move to amend the section by striking out the words "a citizen of the United States and been;" the section will then read, "no person shall be a Senator or Representative who at the time of his election is not an inhabitant," &c.; and also to add at the end of the section, after the word "age" the words "and a qualified elector at the time of his election." My object is to confer upon any elector the right to enjoy office.

Mr. TAGUE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the words "at least" and inserting "thirty and Representative twenty-five years of age." My object is to provide that Senators shall be of the age of thirty years and Representatives of the age of twenty-five years.

The question was taken on Mr. Tague's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. BORDEN said, that on examining the Constitutions of various States of the Union, he discovered that a provision similar to that recommended by the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) was incorporated, and he knew of no reason why it should not be adopted in the Constitution of the State of Indiana. One word in regard to the persons whom the provisions would admit into the Legislature. He believed that before persons not citizens of the United States should be entitled to vote, they should have declared their intentions to become such, and should have resided in the county for a certain time; and he trusted that if they had so declared their intentions, and had so resided in the county, the Convention would permit them—or at least would throw no objection in the way of their taking a seat in the Legislature, provided their fellow citizens should elect them to perform such a duty. He was well aware that objections were urged against aliens taking part in the legislation of the country, and even against their being admitted to the enjoyment of certain privileges; and he regretted to hear gentlemen say upon that floor, that negroes were as well qualified to perform political duties as the Germans and Irish. This assertion he thought was exceedingly illiberal. He could see no reason why, when a person was admitted to the privilege of a voter, he should not be permitted to hold office if his fellow citizens shall deem him worthy of the honor. The Convention had already adopted a provision in the constitution, conferring the privilege of voting for county and township officers upon aliens who have resided a certain time within a county; and if they are qualified to vote at your elections, why were they not as well qualified to serve their county in the Halls of the Legislature, as to discharge the duties of any inferior office? He could see no reason why this distinction should be drawn. And he hoped that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) would prevail.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and a division being called for, there were for the amendment—ayes 48, noes 52.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. KELSO. I move to amend the section by striking out the word "twenty-five," as fixing the age at which men shall be eligible to be a senator, and inserting the word "twenty-one." [Loud cries of "No! no! no!"]

I can't see any reason why a man is not as fit in the Senate chamber at the age of twenty-one years, as he is to sit in the House of Representatives at that age.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALPOLE. I have an amendment to offer. It is to re-commit this section to the committee on the legislative department, with instructions to strike out the words "who, at the time of his election, is not a citizen of the United States," and insert the words "unless he possess the qualifications of an elector."

Mr. COOKERLY called for a division of the question.

Mr. BORDEN demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDENT. The question is first on the motion to re-commit.

The question being taken on the motion, by yeas and nays, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Blythe, Borden, Bryant, Chapman, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Hitt, Hovey, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Taylor, Trimby, Walpole, Wheeler, Work, and Wunderlich—48.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Carr, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hugin, Holman, Huff, Jones, Kendall of White, Logan, Mather, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—74.

So the motion to re-commit did not prevail.

Mr. WALPOLE. Mr. PRESIDENT: I have another amendment to offer. It is to re-commit the section with the following instructions:

"To amend said section, so that white male inhabitants of the State, of foreign birth, that have bona fide resided in this State two years immediately preceding this election, and made a declaration to become citizens of the United States, paid a State and county tax, and possessing all the qualifications required by this Constitution—other than being a citizen of the United States—shall be eligible to an election to the General Assembly."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Hancock that his amendment is not in order, the Convention having just voted down an amendment substantially the same as the one now proposed.

Mr. WALPOLE. I beg to differ with the Chair; the instructions which I have offered are widely different.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Franklin.

Mr. BERRY. I move the previous question. [Loud cries of "No! no! no!"]

Mr. WALPOLE. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will please to send his point of order to the Chair in writing.

Mr. WALPOLE. I desire to be heard, sir. My point of order is, that I had the floor—that I had not yielded it.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Hancock will please to send his point of order to the Chair in writing.

Mr. WALPOLE. I will immediately.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Hancock, that he was not in order in offering an amendment substantially the same as that which had just been voted down by the Convention. Being out of order, he was not entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Franklin will proceed.

Mr. WALPOLE. When I yield the floor, the Chair can hear the gentleman from Franklin. I presume that members are not to be muzzled here at the will of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair undertakes to regulate itself, the wisdom of the gentleman from Hancock to the contrary notwithstanding. If the gentleman is not satisfied with the decision of the Chair, he can appeal to the Convention.

Mr. WALPOLE. The Chair having intimated that it will in future regulate itself to good order, under that promise, I yield the floor without further objection.

The question was then taken on the call for the previous question, and it was seconded.

The question being: "Shall the main question be now put?" it was ordered by consent.

The question then was: "Shall the section be ordered to be engrossed for its third reading?" and it was decided in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention will now proceed to the consideration of the next section.

The Secretary read the section, as follows:

"No person holding any lucrative office under the United States, or this State, shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly: Provided, That offices in the militia, to which there is attached no annual salary, and the office of postmaster, when the compensation does not exceed five hundred dollars per annum, shall not be deemed lucrative."

Mr. HOLMAN moved to amend the section by striking out the words "and the office of postmaster, when the compensation does not exceed five hundred dollars per annum." This would make the section provide that all persons holding lucrative offices should be ineligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly, the only exception being that of offices in the militia.

Mr. DOBSON. The object of this amendment is to prevent postmasters who hold offices not exceeding five hundred dollars per annum from being eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly. I cannot see any good reason why this discrimination should be made in favor of persons holding offices under the General Government. The section stipulates that no person holding any lucrative office under the United States, or this State, shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly, making an exception in favor of militia officers and postmasters whose amount of compensation does not exceed five hundred dollars per annum. By the section, as it now stands, any person holding an office under this State, no matter how small the compensation may be, is precluded from serving his fellow-citizens in the capacity of a legislator. Now, if an individual holding an office under the General Government, worth from four hundred to five hundred dollars a year, is eligible to a seat in the Legislature, why not permit county and State officers to be eligible also? If they are to be eligible in the one instance, they ought to be so in the other. But I object to the principle. I say, no matter what the amount of a man's salary may be, let him be content with the one office.

Mr. BORDEN. I understand that, heretofore, persons have been elected who have held small offices under the post office department, and no objection has been made. I suppose the object of the committee was, to render persons holding situations under that department, worth five hundred dollars a year, or more, ineligible to a seat in either branch of the Legislature. Now there appears to be something wrong in this. We provide that if a man holds the paltry office of a justice of the peace, he shall not serve in the capacity of a legislator, unless he resigns that office. I should propose at any rate that justices of the peace should not be included.

Mr. BRIGHT. The old Constitution provides that no person holding any office under the authority of the President of the U. S., or of the State, militia officers excepted, shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly, unless he resigns his office previous to the election. It will be seen by this, that the militia officers are excepted. Under this Constitution the question arose, whether postmasters held their offices under the authority of the United States, and so were excluded from occupying a seat in the State Legislature. It was decided in this State that they were not officers. The committee decided that offices in the militia, to which no annual salary was affixed, were not lucrative; and that neither was the office of postmaster, unless it exceeded the amount of five hundred dollars per year. If that amount is too large, let the Convention reduce it; but we all know that there are hundreds of petty post offices throughout the country filled by individuals for the mere convenience of the public, without much compensation attached to such offices. Many of these offices are selected more for the convenience of their location, than in reference to any compensation which they yield; and it has been held that these offices are not within the meaning of the old Constitution. The design of the committee was not to exclude those men holding these little offices from occupying a seat in the Legislature; but to leave the door open, inasmuch as many of them were established and kept up more for public convenience than from any profit which they yield.

Mr. DOBSON. I move to amend the amendment in the following way:

Insert after the word "office" in the 35th line the words, "or appointment."

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. This will prohibit trustees in townships from serving as members of the General Assembly. That is carrying the thing too far.

Mr. DOBSON. My doctrine is, that one individual should not hold more than one office at a time.

A MEMBER. That's the right doctrine.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I think there is no good reason why we should make a difference between officers of the General Government and officers of the State Government. If any gentleman holds the office of postmaster, and desires to come to the Legislature, he can resign his office as postmaster. We have a Quarter Master General and an Adjutant General, and we disqualify them, although neither office amounts to more than a hundred and fifty dollars per year. I think that if we reject officers of the State Government in all cases, we ought also to reject officers of the General Government.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was adopted—ayes 47, noes 29.

The question then recurred on adopting the amendment as amended, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WALPOLE moved to amend the section by inserting in the 30th line after the word "State," the words, "nor any person who is or may have been within one year immediately preceding his election either president, director, secretary, or attorney, or other officer or agent of any bank, banking, insurance, or railroad company."

Mr. NEWMAN. I move to amend the amendment by adding the words, "or attorney-at-law." [Laughter.]

Mr. WALPOLE said he would accept the amendment with great pleasure. The gentleman from Wayne, who had a great regard for the legal profession, would doubtless reap much benefit from the amendment, and he (Mr. W.) did not apprehend there would be any difficulty in obtaining his vote for the amendment as thus amended by himself.

Upon the question immediately before the House he had a word or two to say. He would appeal to the gentleman who had acted with him in the Senate as to the probable effect of the exclusion of those persons from the General Assembly. There were railroad companies now chartered for the construction of lines of road which would cost over twenty millions of dollars, of which from five to ten millions were now invested. There were other corporations which had invested about a million more, in addition to insurance companies with a large amount of capital. His object in offering this amendment was, to keep the legislative department pure; that no influence acting upon individuals, independently of the influence of the masses, should be felt within the Legislative Halls of the State.

During the last year, a bill had passed the House of Representatives conferring upon all the railroad companies then incorporated, the power, to incorporate themselves under one general charter, with the liberty to adopt any one charter or parts of charters granted either in the State of Indiana or in other States with which those lines were connected. That bill passed the House of Representatives and went to the Senate; and but for the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Miller) it would have passed that body also.

At that time every railroad influence was brought to bear upon the proposition before the Senate. The "out-of-door" influence was almost irresistible, and only by three votes was that most injurious measure lost—the Legislature at their adjournment having come well nigh passing it.

He did not mean to impugn the motives of Senators, but every man in every office on these lines in the State of Indiana, brought his influence to bear upon the Senate, and it was almost impossible for them not to yield to that influence.

His object, as he had already stated, was to keep the representation of the State pure from such influences; that the masses should be represented, and not the combined influence of railroad companies. The present charter of the State Bank excluded the president, treasurer, directors, secretaries, and attorneys of that corporation from holding seats in the General Assembly; and the same law ought to apply to insurance companies and other corporations. As it regarded insurance companies, there were no institutions in the State which realized more profit than they did. Those profits ranged from fifty to a hundred per cent.; and there was scarcely a winter in which they did not attempt more or less to influence the Legislature in their favor. If, therefore, a man chose to go into the Legislature, let him throw off every influence of office, and attend to that only which is calculated to promote the public good. If he prefers to remain in office, let him confine himself to that, and let others who can go into the councils of the State untrammelled by any interest save that of the people at large, perform the duties of legislators.

When it was found that the new Constitution provided that all corporations in the State should be under one general law, they could imagine thirty banks in the State of Indiana with their united influence obtaining just such legislation as they pleased. And when to that was added the fact that the whole railroad system was to be under one general law, with a capital of twenty-five millions of dollars, it would be seen that they would break down all influence, unless they had Senators and Representatives who knew no rights or interests except those of the public.

The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) had suggested that attorneys-at-law should also be excluded. I accept his modification, and I tell him frankly that I have the manliness to vote for the exclusion of myself, and I ask him to say if he will do the same? It is right that attorneys should not sit in the Legislature. He has had some experience in legislation, and that experience undoubtedly has taught him that it is wrong. I say with him that it is wrong, and I hope he will carry out his opinion by his vote upon this question.

If I can obtain a sufficient number of gentlemen to sustain me in the call for the yeas and nays on this amendment, I desire that they should be taken.

MR. NEWMAN. I have only a single word to say. The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) says that I have had some experience in legislation, and that undoubtedly that experience has taught me the impropriety of lawyers being in the General Assembly. I served in the Legislature during one session, some sixteen years ago, and I am inclined to think that that is all the experience I ever shall have. Let the amendment pass, or otherwise, it will have very little effect upon me, so far as regards this office. As a member of the bar, and keeping an eye to the profits of the profession, I would prefer that no gentleman of the bar should ever be a member of the General Assembly. That is all I have to say on the subject.

MR. KENT. When the proper time arrives I will offer the following as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock:

"That the persons described in the amendment shall not be permitted to visit Indianapolis during the sittings of the Legislature." [Laughter.]

MR. BORDEN. I think the gentleman from Hancock is coming rather a "gum game" over us. I hope the anti-bank party will vote against the amendment.

MR. KELSO. I am decidedly in favor of the gentleman's amendment, for the reason that if we can only get a prohibition in the Constitution now against banks, there will be little danger of our getting banks [laughter] hereafter.

MR. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I offer the following amendment to the amendment to come in after the word "attorneys,"—

"Nor any odd fellows or free masons." [Laughter and applause.]

MR. STEVENSON moved the previous question, which was sustained.

MR. CLARK. I wish to withdraw my amendment, if I may have the liberty to do so.

THE PRESIDENT. The gentleman is too late. The previous question applies to it.

The main question being ordered to be now put,

THE PRESIDENT. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark).

MR. CLARK. I would like to withdraw that amendment.

THE PRESIDENT. It can only be done by unanimous consent. Will the Convention give the gentleman from Tippecanoe leave to withdraw his amendment? [Loud cries of "Consent, consent, consent."]

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Hancock, by yeas and nays, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Foster, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbottle, Hardin, Hugin, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Lockhart, Logan, March, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Prather, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smiley, Spann, Tague, Taylor, Wallace, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, and Wunderlich—58.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Hall, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Morgan, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—67.

So the amendment was rejected.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, after which,

The Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, Dec. 10, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MYERS.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the Auditor of State, containing an estimate of the amount of interest paid on the public debt, and the salaries and contingent expenses of the State agents, &c.

The Communication having been read, on motion by Mr. SMITH of Ripley, it was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THORNTON, from the select committee to which had been referred the resolution directing an inquiry into the best mode of enforcing the payment of taxes on delinquent lands, and giving validity to tax-titles, reported the following, to be inserted in the new Constitution:

SEC. —. Hereafter no purchaser of any land or town lot at any sale of lands or town lots for taxes due to this State, or any county or any incorporated town or city within the same; or at any sale for taxes, levies, or assessments authorized by the laws of this State, or any ordinance or by-law of any town or municipal corporation therein, shall be entitled to a deed for any land or town lot so purchased, until he or she shall have complied with the following condition, to-wit: Such purchaser shall cause to be served by the sheriff, or other proper officer, a written notice of such purchase on every person in possession or occupancy of such land or town lot, at least three months before the expiration of the time of redemption on such sale, in which notice he shall distinctly set forth when he purchased such land or town lot, a particular description thereof, so as to clearly identify the same, the amount of the tax, per centum, and costs necessary to redeem the same, and when the time of such redemption will expire. And in like manner shall cause to be served on the person or persons in whose name or names such land or town lot shall have been listed for taxation, a similar written notice, if such person or persons shall reside in the county where such land or town lot is situate; and if such person or persons do not reside therein, then such purchaser shall cause such notice to be published in some newspaper printed in such county, and if no newspaper be published therein, then in the newspaper published in this State nearest to the county in which such land or town lot is situated, which notice shall be published for three weeks successively, the last of which shall be at least three months previous to the expiration of the time of redemption; in which notice such purchaser shall furthermore state, that unless the same shall be redeemed within the time limited for the redemption thereof, or for other good cause shown to the contrary, he will make a motion to the Circuit Court of the county in which such land or town lot is situate at the next ensuing term thereof, for an order directing the proper officer to execute to him a deed for such land or town lot, according to the provisions of the statute in such case made and provided. Such purchaser, before he shall be entitled to an order for a deed in such case, shall adduce to such court satisfactory proof of his having become the purchaser of such land or town lot for the taxes due thereon, and at the same time shall produce and file his certificate of purchase, together with proof of his having given the notice and complied with the preliminary conditions herein before prescribed, and shall moreover file his affidavit to the same effect, of all of which several matters the court shall cause a record to be made in the order book of such court, and shall also cause the same to be filed among the records of said court, to be carefully preserved by the clerk thereof; and thereupon, unless good cause be shown to the contrary, cause an order to be made, directing the proper officer to execute to such purchaser a deed accordingly for such land or town lot, which shall have the effect thenceforth to vest the said purchaser with a good, valid, and indefeasible legal title to such land or town lot. And it shall be the further duty of such court, upon awarding a deed to such purchaser as aforesaid, to enter upon an order or decree directing such purchaser to pay into the clerk's office of said court, on or before the first day of the next term of said court, a sum which shall be equal to twenty per cent. on the amount of the value of the land or lot so purchased, to be ascertained by recurrence to the assessment of the same, when last listed for taxation, which order or decree shall, from the date thereof, operate as a lien on the said land or town lot, as against the said purchaser or any alienee until satisfied, and if not paid as ordered, may be enforced by execution against said land or town lot, whosoever's lands or possession the same may be; which money, when collected, shall be applied to common schools within the township wherein the said land or town lot is situated: Provided, however, that both the said purchaser, as well as the original owner of said land or town lot, or any person having an interest therein, shall be at liberty to take an appeal, or sue out a writ of error to the Supreme Court, for the purpose of reversing the order of the Circuit Court in awarding a deed in such case.

The section was read a first time and passed to a second reading.

Mr. NAVE dissented from the report of the majority, and desired permission to state his reasons for dissenting. The reasons were first, he said, because he considered it a matter for legislative action.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman propose to make a minority report?

Mr. NAVE. I wish merely to state the reasons verbally, why I dissent from the report.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order for the gentleman to do so.

Mr. NAVE. Then I will submit the following as a minority report:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The undersigned, a member of the select committee to whom was referred the subject just reported to the Convention, by the chairman, (Mr. Thornton,) begs leave to make a counter-report, dissenting from the report of the majority of the committee, for the following reasons: 1st. The subject referred to the committee belongs to the legislative department of the State, and is not properly within the province and action of this Convention. 2d. The several provisions contained in the section reported by the committee, may require amendment, or repeal, hereafter, and, being in the organic law, will, therefore, be beyond the reach and control of legislation; and 3d. It is an assumption of power not within the objects for which this Convention was called into existence, and therefore, a power which the Convention can only limit and circumscribe, in the action of the legislative branch of the Government.

C. C. NAVE.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, the first thing in order being the section in relation to the term of service of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. TODD. I desire to offer a substitute for that section.

The PRESIDENT. It is not now in order. The gentleman should have offered his substitute on the second reading of the section.

The question being, Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were taken and resulted—yeas 116, nays 6—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison; Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mower, Murray, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Elliott, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—116.

NAYS.—Messrs. Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Gootee, Nave, Tannehill, and Walpole—6.

The next section was then read by the Secretary.

It provides that, "No person shall be a Senator or Representative who, at the time of his election, is not a citizen of the United States, and been an inhabitant of this State for the two years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof of the county or district for which he may be chosen. Senators shall be at least twenty-five, and Representatives twenty-one years of age."

Mr. WALPOLE moved to re-commit the section with instructions to amend by providing that "white persons of foreign birth, who have made a declaration of their intention to become citizens of the United States, and who possess the other qualifications contained in the section, shall not be disqualified from holding a seat in either branch of the Legislature."

Mr. WALPOLE. On yesterday, sir, I proposed to incorporate this amendment in the section that is now under consideration. At that time I did not deem it necessary to say anything in support of the proposition, inasmuch as a few days since I made a motion to amend a section, embracing in the amendment the substance of this, viz.: That persons of foreign birth who have made a declaration of intention to become citizens of the United States, and who possess the other qualification specified in the section, shall not be disqualified from holding a county office.

That amendment was adopted by the Convention without a count. By that provision, which has been made a part of the Constitution, it is declared that the offices of sheriff, clerk, auditor, treasurer, recorder, coroner and all other county offices may be held by persons of foreign birth, who have resided in the State for two years previous to their election, and who have filed their declaration of intention to become citizens. It will be recollected that the committee on the elective privilege have reported a section conferring the elective franchise upon persons of foreign birth, who have resided for two years in the State. In looking over the history of the early organization of Indiana, from the time of the establishment of the territorial Government up to the adoption of the present Constitution in 1816, foreigners, persons who were not naturalized citizens of the United States, were not only permitted to exercise the elective franchise, but were actually entitled to hold and enjoy office, and many were elected to and engaged office. At that time there was a large foreign population in Indiana, a great proportion of whom never became naturalized citizens of the United States. Why it was that the framers of the Constitution of 1816 excluded so large and meritorious a class of the inhabitants of Indiana, from this privilege, I cannot perceive. There is no reason why a man of foreign birth should be excluded, if he is a bona fide resident of the State, and has made his declaration of intention to become a citizen. The reason which exists why a man should become a naturalized citizen, to entitle him to hold office under the United States does not apply to our offices under a State government. The Government of the United States has the power to declare war, to grant letters of reprisal, and to make treaties. But a State government has no such power. The citizen of the United States stands in the same relation to a State government, as the citizen of our State stands in relation to the government of another State.

A man born in Ohio owes no more allegiance to the State Government of Indiana than the man who was born in Germany. He owes no more allegiance to your institutions than a man of a foreign birth. Yet you confer upon the native of Ohio what you refuse to the native of Germany; yet there exist no real cause, other than the spirit of Native Americanism. I hold that it is contrary to good policy to exclude any portion of the white inhabitants of the State from becoming electors.

Foreigners have the right of representation that is contemplated here, and yet you say, though we give you the right to vote, we will not give you the right to hold and enjoy office. Sir, it is a direct attack upon the intelligence and patriotism of the electors of Indiana, to say that they would select a man for office who is not identified with their interests. There is no danger in conferring power upon a foreigner who has made his declaration of intention to become a citizen. I repose entire confidence in the intelligence of the people of this State, so far, at all events, as to allow them to elect whom they please to represent them.

You may be assured that they will elect only such as are intelligent, and worthy of the trust reposed in them. There are now upon this floor four gentlemen of foreign birth—men of high standing. Do you suppose that the State of Indiana is any dearer to them from the fact of their having an oath than if they had not taken it? Certainly not. Men are governed by higher impulses. The law of honor and of conscience is more efficacious than if you swear a man ten times over to support the Constitution of the United States. From that oath the patriotic feeling that governs him does not emanate but from a love for the institutions of the country of his adoption.

I hope, sir, that the section will be re-committed with instructions to extend to foreigners the right to enjoy and hold office—not to transient persons, but to bona fide residents, and you need be under no apprehension that the citizens of this State will send to the Legislature any who are not identified in feeling and interest with themselves. I desire that my position on this subject shall be known, and if I can meet with the sanction of nine gentlemen I should like to have the yeas and nays upon the proposition.

Mr. BERRY demanded the previous question.

Mr. WALPOLE. Will the previous question cut off the motion to re-commit with instructions?

The PRESIDENT, Yes, sir.

The demand for the previous question was upon a division, seconded—ayes 45, noes 35.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being, shall the section pass?—the yeas and nays were taken and resulted, yeas 103, nays 19—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—103.

NAYS.—Messrs. Borden, Chapman, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Holman, Johnson, Kelso, Kinley, Maguire, Miller of Fulton, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Smiley, Tague, Trimble, and Walpole—19.

The following section, on its third reading, was then taken up:

"No person holding any lucrative office under the United States or this State, shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly: Provided that offices in the militia, to which there is attached no annual salary, shall not be deemed lucrative."

Mr. WALPOLE moved to re-commit the section with instructions to amend so as to exclude the President, Directors, or other officers of railroad and banking companies from seats in the Legislature.

A VOICE. Include lawyers also.

Mr. WILEY demanded the previous question.

A division being called for on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were yeas 51, nays 47.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put.

The question being, Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 108, nays 11—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hevey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Elliott, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—108.

NAYS.—Messrs. Carr, Chapman, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, &c., Gordon, Kelso, Miller of Fulton, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Ristine, and Wolfe—11.

Mr. OWEN. I move a re-consideration of the vote taken. I am not in the habit, sir, of making such a motion, and I make it now, for one reason only, and that is, the call of the previous question cut off all opportunity to amend.

Now, I concur in the present section as it stands so far as I believe it was the intention of the Convention to pass it; but I believe it has passed in a shape in which they did not intend that it should pass. The section reads thus:

"No person holding any lucrative office or appointment under the United States or this State, shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly: Provided, That offices in the militia shall not be deemed lucrative."

That will exclude persons who may receive any the most petty appointment, the emoluments of which might not exceed five or ten dollars in the course of the year. I think the section was not intended to have such application. It was designed to extend to postmasters, and that may be well enough. As for offices in the militia, I never heard of any man who mistook them for lucrative. The proviso in the section, therefore, is unnecessary.

I have moved to re-consider the vote for the purpose of offering this substitute:

"No person holding any lucrative office under the United States or this State, shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly: Provided, That the office of deputy postmaster shall be deemed a lucrative office."

Mr. KELSO. Allow me to make an inquiry. Suppose the vote be re-considered, we shall still be tied down by the previous question, so that the gentleman will gain nothing by his motion.

Mr. OWEN. I suggest whether the matters that I have stated occurred to the minds of gentlemen who voted for the previous question. I believe they would vote to re-consider the previous question also.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will suggest that the gentleman can accomplish everything that he desires by moving a separate section.

Mr. WALPOLE. I do not believe that there is any necessity for re-considering the vote. I have listened to the argument of the gentleman from Posey, and I think there is really nothing in it. The objections that he has raised have no weight with me whatever. The provision is, that no person shall be elected to a seat in the Legislature who holds an appointment under the State Government or under the General Government. He says that the trustees of a seminary would be excluded. Such an appointment is not derived either from the State Government or the General Government, but from a corporation. So that objection falls to the ground. It has nothing in it, so far as regards the holding of office under the General Government or the State Government is concerned. I believe that the section is right, and the example that the gentleman has cited satisfies me the more of its correctness. He says that the Government may appoint an agent to transact business which will occupy but two days, and hence such officer should not be excluded. But suppose there is no provision of law to compensate the agent for the service; suppose the State appoint an attorney to transact business for which no specific compensation is fixed, and the Legislature be applied to to determine upon the compensation, would it be right that this agent should go into the Legislature and participate in its action in regard to his own compensation? The gentleman states an instance of the trustees of the State University. They derive their pay from the State. The amount is subject to be increased or decreased at the will of the Legislature. I ask you whether a gentleman holding such an appointment ought to be sent to the Legislature of Indiana? We should not multiply offices in the hands of one man. I shall oppose the re-consideration.

Mr. READ of Clark. I would suggest to the gentleman from Posey that he can accomplish his object to-morrow when the section comes up on its final passage.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would inform the gentleman that the section has finally passed already.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I would be one of the last to pile office upon office on the same individual. That is radically wrong, and ought not to be allowed under the Constitution. But persons accepting small appointments—not offices—under the State or United States Government, mainly of an honorary character, but to which there may be attached some pay which will meet expenses, and in some degree loss of time, ought not surely to be disfranchised, so far as holding a seat in the Legislature is concerned. That is running the thing quite into the ground.

Suppose the case of trustee in the Smithsonian Institute—ought the holding of such a post to exclude a man from the Legislature?

Once in my life I had the high honor of holding an appointment from the United States Government. I traveled some three hundred miles in order to fulfill its duties, and back the same distance. When I came to receive my pay it amounted, all told, to $84. I had expended, besides loss of time, between $120 and $130. Ought the holding of such a lucrative appointment to have excluded me from a seat in the Legislature?

As for the exclusion of Professors in Colleges, to that I assure gentlemen I make no objections.

Mr. DOBSON. I think that the section is, perhaps, just about as the majority of the body want it to be, and just about as it ought to be. There should be, perhaps, some definite expression as to what sort of appointment should disqualify a man for being elected to the Legislature. But the idea that I wish to see carried out is that when a man comes into the Legislature he shall come with no other papers in his pocket than his certificate of election. If he has got a little appointment let him resign it before he presents himself for election. I object to a man's holding two appointments at the same time, because the duties imposed upon him by one appointment are very apt to interfere with those of the others. And I would go a step further, and prohibit the Governor from appointing a member of the Legislature to an office under the State government. I want to keep the stream of legislation as pure as possible, as free from all extraneous influences as practicable. There are individuals enough in the State who do not hold office, to supply representatives in the Legislature. I want, as far as possible, to disconnect the legislation of the country from all extraneous influences whatever. I could go still further, and prohibit members of the Legislature from filling offices created during their term of service in the Legislature. I would be glad to see the proposition of the gentleman from Hancock ingrafted in the Constitution. But as the section is passed I hope the vote will not be re-considered.

Mr. WATTS. It appears to me that we are simmering down this thing to a very low ebb, when we say that if a man is entrusted with office it shall disqualify him from filling a seat in the Legislature. It appears to me that it is rather an evidence of his capacity and integrity that he should receive an appointment. The case that has been instanced by the gentleman from Monroe, however, rather staggered my belief. It appears to me that a gentleman who receives an appointment where the salary is only eighty dollars, and pays out one hundred and twenty dollars for expenses, shows an incapacity that ought to exclude him from the Legislature. [A laugh.]

Mr. READ of Monroe. He might not happen to know the compensation which he was to receive until the duty was performed.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the section was passed, and it was decided in the negative.

So the vote was not re-considered.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the section which provides that "The sessions of the General Assembly shall be held biennially at the Capital of the State, commencing on the first Monday after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three, and on the same day of every second year thereafter, unless a different day or place be appointed by law. But, if in the opinion of the Governor, the public welfare shall, at any time, require it, he may, by proclamation, call a special session."

The section having been read,

Mr. MORRISON of Marion moved to amend by inserting the words "at Indianapolis." [Cries of "No! no!"]

Mr. MORRISON. I want to show gentlemen why it is necessary to insert these words.

It will prevent any attempt being made by future Legislatures to change the seat of Government. If gentlemen will refer to report No. 17, line No. 38, they will see it is there provided in what cases the seat of Government may be changed. There is ample provision there for changing it in the case of an epidemic or other unforeseen occurrence, at any time. It declares that it may be changed on the happening of certain contingencies. If the Convention think with me, that that provision is sufficient, without leaving it in the power of the Legislature to change the seat of Government at their caprice—if they agree with me in the opinion that there ought to be some stability and certainty as to the place where the seat of Government shall be established, there certainly can be no impropriety in so stating in this place. And in connection with this amendment, I move further to strike out the words "or places," wherever they occur, so as to make the section consistent. My object is to make the seat of Government permanent and certain, subject only to change in such cases as are provided for elsewhere.

Mr. BERRY moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved to amend the section by striking out the words "after the first day," and also to strike out "1853" and insert "1852."

My object, said Mr. F., is simply this: It is provided here that the General Assembly shall meet on the first Monday after the first day of January. If the month comes in on Monday, the Legislature, of course, will meet on the second Monday of the month. By striking out the words "after the first day," it will read: "commencing on the first Monday of January."

A MEMBER. Suppose the month commences on Monday.

Mr. FOSTER. Never mind about that. [Laughter.] In regard to the other part of the amendment—striking out "1853," and inserting "1852"—it appears to me, that, if the new Constitution should be adopted, the first session of the General Assembly should not be put off for two years. Now, the presumption with me is, that the people will adopt the Constitution, if they do at all, during the summer of next year; and the first election under the new Constitution will take place in October of next year. Why, then, the first session of the Legislature should be put off for two years from January, which will be some fifteen or sixteen months after the first election that will be held under the new Constitution, I cannot conceive.

In my opinion, the General Assembly should convene as soon as possible after the adoption of the Constitution. It does appear to me singular gentlemen should propose that their meeting should be put off for two years. These are the reasons which have influenced me in offering this amendment.

Mr. NILES. I desire to submit an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe, if it be now in order. I propose to strike out in the — line, the words "after the first day," and to insert after the word "on," the words "Thursday after," so as that the sessions of the Legislature shall commence on the Thursday after the first Monday in January. [A voice—"make it Wednesday."] I don't know that I should have any great objection to Wednesday, though I am inclined to think that Thursday would be the better day.

I will make a single remark in reference to the propriety of the amendment which I propose. It is undoubtedly true that the public interests would be equally subserved by the Legislature meeting on Thursday as on Monday. No public interest, then, can stand in the way of the proposed change. It is also undoubtedly true, that, under the present system of convening the Legislature on Monday, the preceding Sunday is always a day of bustle and confusion. It is devoted to exchanging salutations, electioneering, and holding caucuses, and in a manner wholly in conflict with the prevalent feelings and opinions of our people. Now, sir, though I do not think it proper to mix up much of theological opinions in a Constitution, I do hold that a decent respect for the opinions and feelings of a large majority of the people of the State, if nothing else, should forbid our imposing upon the members of the Legislature a kind of necessity for spending the Sabbath in such a manner.

Within a very few years, a person can start from his home in any part of the State, on or after Monday, and be in Indianapolis before Thursday; and I apprehend there are few persons who would not prefer spending Sunday quietly at home, after the manner of our people, than to be in the excitement which attends the convening of the Legislature. I have another reason for proposing Thursday after the first Monday in January—that it will enable members of the Legislature to remain at home during what are called the holidays. The observance of the holidays among ones friends, has almost become interwoven with our social habits, and I wish to see the good old usage respected. It is well known that little work is done by Legislative bodies, though nominally in session, between Christmas and New Years. I see every reason in favor of the change, and can conceive of no objection to it whatever.

Mr. BRIGHT. The proposition, as I understand it, is to strike out the words "after the first day," so that the section will read thus: "Commencing on the first Monday in January." Now, the design of the committee, in fixing the time named, was, that the meeting of the Legislature should occur after the first day of January, so as not to interfere with the holidays.

As to the other objection, that is, to the postponement of the first meeting of the Legislature, under the new Constitution, if this Constitution be adopted, it is more than probable that there will be some legislation necessary under the old Constitution, and therefore, it might become necessary, after its adoption, to have a called session of the Legislature, to make the necessary provisions, under the old Constitution, to carry the provisions of the new Constitution into effect.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would suggest one thing, and it is this: That the act under which this Convention is called, declares that the Legislature shall provide for submitting the new Constitution to the people for their ratification or rejection. Well, sir, I think it highly probable that the new Constitution will not be completed before the adjournment of the Legislature, so that you will be obliged either to convene the Legislature for the special purpose of making provision for submitting the new Constitution to the people, or you must wait for the meeting of the Legislature a year from this time.

Mr. TAYLOR said that he saw no reason why the Legislature that was to meet in a few weeks, might not, with great propriety, go on and pass a prospective act, providing that the Constitution which the Convention should frame, should be submitted to the action of the people sometime during next summer. They could do this as well as the succeeding Legislature, and without the delay that would be attendant upon waiting for the action of the succeeding Legislature.

In regard to the day upon which future Legislatures should meet, he had only to say, that he thought it would better suit the views of the people, and be to the mutual benefit of all concerned, for that body to meet on Thursday, in place of Monday. He considered it would be more agreeable to the Representatives themselves, and more in accordance with the wishes of a large portion of the people of Indiana, if the members of the Legislature could avoid traveling upon the Sabbath, which many would doubtless have to do, if that body met on Monday. He was no great stickler for the Sabbath, but he thought, also, if they could do it, they might just as well save their legislators from electioneering on Sunday—as it was well known that it had been their custom to hold a caucus for officers, on the Saturday or Sunday evening prior to the opening of the session, on Monday. He hoped, therefore, that Thursday would be fixed upon as the day of meeting for the Legislature.

Mr. DOBSON said that he thought the difficulty in regard to the meeting of the Legislature, in 1853, could be obviated by striking out in the third line of the section, all after the word "January," and inserting "immediately succeeding the adoption of the new Constitution." If this proposition met with the approbation of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster,) he would move it as a substitute for that gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BORDEN remarked that there were two questions to decide; and first, as to the day of the week on which the Legislature should meet. He believed, as far as he had heard the opinions of members on this point, that they were in favor of changing the day of meeting, from Monday, to Tuesday or Wednesday. Thus the members would have a day or two before the meeting of the Legislature, to make such arrangements as they might deem proper, and would not be compelled to infringe upon the Sabbath, or violate the feelings of the religious portion of the community. As it was now, the Legislature, meeting on Monday, the whole of the Sabbath, immediately preceding that day, was devoted to electioneering and visiting from house to house, much to the annoyance of those who were anxious to observe that day.

In regard to the other question, as to the year of the next meeting of the first Legislature, under the new Constitution, he had only to say that he was in favor of the proposition reported by the committee. The next Legislature, which was soon to assemble, must pass a law, providing for the submission of the amended Constitution to the people, for their approbation or disapproval. He supposed that the vote upon the ratification or rejection of the Constitution, would take place in August next; and that after that, a session of the Legislature, under the old Constitution, would be held, for the purpose, among other things, of making provision for the holding of the first election under the amended Constitution. He was also of opinion that the first election, under the new Constitution should be held in October, 1852, and that the proper time for the meeting of the first Legislature, under the new Constitution, was fixed in the report of the committee, which was in January, 1853.

He thought that ample time should be afforded for the discussion and examination of the provisions of the new Constitution, by the people. The merits of those provisions could be fully discussed before the people, by the candidates for office, during the canvass preceding the August election of '51. It was one thing to make a Constitution, and another thing to satisfy the people in regard to its merits, and nothing but a full and fair discussion would accomplish the latter object. Where there was such a discussion had, the people would settle down in favor of the Constitution, and would probably allow it to remain for many years, without desiring any change in its provisions; but, where it was adopted without that mature discussion and consideration, which would be calculated to enlist the public mind in its favor, the people would soon be prepared to change the Constitution, which was certainly not to be desired.

Again, if the Constitution was submitted to the people at the spring election, there would be but few votes given upon the question. There were few persons who attended the polls at the annual spring election, in April or May, especially in the southern portion of the State, and, although the Constitution might be such as to meet with the general approbation of the people, yet there was a chance, at that period of the year, of its being rejected.

The same objection would apply to a special election, ordered in June or July, as it had been intimated would be ordered—as he presumed there would be less votes given at the polls at a special election, than there would at the annual spring election, on the first of April or May.

He trusted the section would pass as it was, only changing the day of the meeting of the Legislature from Monday, to Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. PETTIT said, that he took pleasure in saying that, for once—if never before—he agreed with the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster,) who made the motion. He trusted it would not be the last time. He thought that the amendment was a very necessary one, and the arguments advanced by the gentleman in its favor, he concurred in heartily. He was in favor of commencing the session of the Legislature on Monday, for the reason that, hitherto, this had been the custom, and the people had become used to it. It was an old and a familiar usage; besides, he believed, that, to do a good week's work, it was always necessary to commence Monday morning, and this rule applied to legislative action, as well as any other kind of actions. He desired that the Legislature should meet the first Monday in January; and he was equally willing, that, on the first day of the year—say the first of January—they should meet and commence their labors with the new year.

If, continued Mr. P., the objection raised by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) that, by the Legislature's meeting upon Monday, the religious observance of the Sabbath will be desecrated; then, for the last thirty-four years, have the devotional feelings of the people living at the seat of Government been disturbed. By meeting on Monday, the Legislature is but doing that which is done by Congress, by the Legislature of Ohio, and nearly all the State Legislatures in the Union.

What, sir, is the truth in relation to this matter? Do not the members almost invariably make their calculations to get here on Saturday evening, so as to make their appearance at church or in the streets on Sunday. Those who have been members of the Legislature know that that is the fact.

The other gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Taylor) has stated, that, by the Legislature's meeting on Monday, the Sabbath would be desecrated by members meeting in caucus and electioneering for officers. Now, sir, it is a known fact that these caucuses are held on Saturday evening almost invariably. I prefer, sir, to adhere to the old usage on this subject.

A few words with reference to the period when the first Legislature, after the adoption of the Constitution, shall meet—whether in the year 1852 or '53:

The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright) is of opinion that the Legislature, under the new Constitution, should not meet until January, 1853; and he further says that it will be necessary to have one session of the Legislature, after the adoption of the new Constitution, under the old Constitution. Now, I deny the possibility of such a thing. When the new Constitution shall have been adopted—the very moment the people, by their action, breathe life into it—it becomes the supreme law of the land, and under no other law can the people of Indiana live. If ever it is to go into effect, it will during the next summer; and I hope that it will be at as early period as practicable. I am opposed to having this Constitution voted upon at a general election, when there is always a scrambling of many political partisans for place. I desire to have the calm and unbiased judgment of the people upon it. I desire that the Constitution we frame should be submitted to the people at a separate election, and not mixed up with anything else. And when will that be done? It is well known to the members of this Convention that it is proposed to change the time of holding the general election from the first Monday in August to the first Monday in October, and I have not heard a dissenting voice in regard to this change. I have no doubt it will be made. Now, it is probable that we shall get through with our labors here by the first of February, at the farthest, though I solemnly believe we shall be through by the middle of January. If the Legislature is in session at the time we get through with our work, they can appoint the day when the election shall be held which is to decide the fate of the Constitution; otherwise we can fix the day. That it will be adopted, there can be no doubt of; and this assertion is not a presumptuous one. I say, whatever shall come from the hands of this Convention, in the shape of a Constitution, will be ratified by an immense majority. The election will then be held, and returns made of the number of votes polled in the different counties, either for or against the Constitution, by the proper officers, to the Secretary of State's department. It will then be the duty of the Governor to issue his proclamation, stating the number of votes and the adoption of the Constitution. And from the moment the Governor issues that proclamation, the Constitution will be in force, and that will be before August next.

How then, sir, are you going to hold another session of the Legislature under the old Constitution? The old Constitution, like the old law of the Israelites, will have passed away, when the new Saviour, or, in other words, the new Constitution, comes, not to destroy the law, but to fulfil. We will live under the new Gospel dispensation. So soon, then, as this new Constitution goes in force, the general election comes on under it in October following, and members are elected to the new Legislature. For these reasons, sir, I shall vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster,) and I trust it will be adopted.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I have another reason, sir, to present, which has not as yet been presented, why we should begin the sessions of the Legislature under the new Constitution in 1852. We have, sir, determined to hold biennial sessions. It is known to all the delegates that we elect our United States Senators every two and four years. We elect a Senator this winter, and another in 1854; and a Legislature ought to be in session at the time of the election of our Senators. If the Legislature assemble, in 1853, and every two years thereafter, we will either have to elect a Senator one year in advance, or the Governor call an extra session to elect him. If we fix the time of the meeting of the Legislature at the year 1852, and every two years subsequently, it will be in session just at the right time to elect United States Senators.

By reference to the fifteenth section of the article calling this Convention together, it will be observed that it becomes the duty of the Secretary of State, so soon as the same is recorded in his office, to deliver to the Governor of this State a certified copy of said amended Constitution, who shall, on the meeting of the General Assembly of this State at its next session, lay the same before them; and it shall be the duty of the said General Assembly to pass all laws necessary and proper for submitting the same to the qualified voters for their approval and rejection.

If this law remains in force, it will be impossible to submit the new Constitution at any time during the ensuing summer to the people; but it will be a very easy matter for the Legislature, which is soon to assemble, to amend the law so as to provide for submitting the amended Constitution at the earliest convenient day.

I desire to see it submitted sometime during the next summer; and if adopted, the first session of the Legislature, under the new Government, should be in 1852.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe said that he did not doubt but that his colleague understood the subject of caucuses better than the gentleman from Laporte. After a caucus was held on Saturday evening, there should be a day of rest when gentlemen could attend church and quiet their minds in some degree; he, therefore, thought it well enough to leave the day as it had already been fixed upon—say Monday.

He did not think, however, that his colleague's argument was true as to the year when the Convention should meet. The gentleman did not seem to suppose that the Legislature elected under the old Constitution could hold a session after the adoption of the new Constitution. It was true when the new Constitution was adopted the old one would be abrogated, but there was nothing to hinder the Convention from providing that the Legislature under the old Constitution should meet one year after the adoption of the new.

The committee thought it absolutely necessary that there should be two annual sessions after the session of the Legislature which would shortly commence. They will be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the new Constitution, and to provide for the transition from the present to the new one, if it shall be adopted. The committee thought it unsafe to provide that the first biennial session should commence before 1853, lest the new order of things should be hurried upon the State indiscreetly. The Legislature elected under the old Constitution will be as certainly the Representatives of the people as if they were elected under the provisions of the new.

It is, perhaps, impossible to foresee and provide for all contingencies that may arise. At all events, in a matter of so much importance, it is wiser to give time for deliberation, and opportunity to remedy omissions, and to correct mistakes. It is even possible that this Convention may not complete its labors before the ensuing Legislature may have adjourned, and in that event it would scarcely be possible to provide for the election of the members of the Legislature under the new Constitution to meet in 1852.

Mr. READ of Monroe. Is the question upon the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles)?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. READ. Well, I greatly prefer Thursday as the day of the week for the meeting of the General Assembly. That day will best comport with the feelings of the people of the State on the subject of the observance of the Sabbath. These feelings ought to be respected in establishing the fundamental law of the land. The business of organization, appointing committees, and getting ready for work, can be done, so as to make a fair commencement on the Monday morning of the ensuing week. All will be done which would be accomplished in the full week.

As for caucusing, if that is a necessary prefix to the meeting of the Legislature, I do not see why Wednesday evening would not be just as good for that purpose as Saturday evening. It is not, of necessity, a Saturday night work. Besides, there is the danger, when the caucus is on Saturday night, that the electioneering will be on Sunday.

Mr. NEWMAN observed that he considered the first meeting of the General Assembly to be elected under the new Constitution should be held as early as practicable. It should be recollected that there were a great many changes to be made in the organic law of the State, and it was not to be expected that the Legislature that met this winter would do much in the way of altering the general laws of the State. Therefore, it would seem to be important that as soon as the new Constitution may be adopted, and the time should have elapsed for the election of the members of the two Houses, that in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, they should convene for the purpose of adapting the general laws of the State to the provisions of that Constitution.

It was well known that the people had particular habits of doing their business, and he would suggest that it would be much more in conformity with their interests if the time of the meeting of the Legislature was fixed on the first Monday in December instead of the first Monday in January. If the Legislature was to meet in January, its sittings would probably extend to the first of March, before which time a large number of Representatives would be desirous of being at home to attend to their spring business. The first session of the new Legislature would probably occupy ten or twelve weeks, owing to the amount of business to which they would have to attend under the new Constitution; and unless they met in the first part of December, the members would be greatly embarrassed, doubtless, in their business operations. In order to remedy this evil, therefore, he would move the following amendment, viz.: To strike out the entire section—which motion would be in order, as no motion of that kind had been made, and substitute the following in lieu thereof:

"The sessions of the Legislature shall be held biennially, commencing on the first Monday in December, unless a different day be fixed upon by law, and if in the opinion of the Governor the public welfare shall require it, he may by proclamation convene the two Houses at such time and place as he may name."

He had left this amendment open for the change of the time and place of meeting of the Legislature in case a possible state of affairs should arise when in consequence of disease, rebellion, or invasion, it should become necessary to remove their sessions from the capital.

The PRESIDENT. The question must be first taken upon the questions now pending before a motion can be made to strike out and insert.

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from LaPorte, (Mr. Niles,)

Mr. FOSTER said, that he was happy to find that the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) concurred in his views in regard to this subject. It was true he seldom did so, but he had only to say that as they now agreed—so far as the concurrence of the gentleman was concerned—it was better late than never. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Tippecanoe had superseded him (Mr. F.) in some of the arguments he (Mr. P.) had advanced, but he had only to say that when a gentleman of his superior intelligence concurred with him, it was some evidence that he was right in the position he had assumed. He would barely remark, in addition, that it was his opinion also that if the Legislature met on the first Monday of January, it would be in accordance with the established usage of some other States.

In regard to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Newman,) continued Mr. F., of changing the time of the meeting of the Legislature to the first Monday in December, I have only to say that I think he is mistaken in supposing that by meeting in January, the pecuniary interests of the members of the Legislature will be interfered with. It has been heretofore the case, and doubtless it will be so hereafter, that a large portion of the General Assembly are agriculturalists. Now everybody knows that this class of our population have at the end of the year gathered in their crops, killed their hogs and taken them to market, and generally arranged their business. The assumption is, that generally the Legislature will not sit more than six weeks, but of course the first session of the Legislature under the new Constitution will be much longer. Suppose they were to remain until the end of March, it would not interfere with the home duties of the member—for we all know that farming operations hardly ever commence before the first of April. I, therefore, think that the first Monday in January will be a more appropriate time for the meeting of the Legislature than the first Monday in December.

In regard to the proposition of the first Legislature under the new Constitution, meeting in 1853, I must say, I cannot for a moment give my consent to it. I have not the smallest doubt, sir, that this Convention will have to fix the day upon which this Constitution shall be voted upon by the people; because I consider the Legislature have no authority to fix it. Some time in June would be a proper time to fix upon, as then all the farmers will have got their corn planted and harvest will not have commenced. If we select the month of June, this will be anterior to the general election in August, as I think it should be, to blend action upon the new Constitution and the election of State officers together at one election, I consider would be a great and egregious mistake. Another thing in relation to this matter. The General Assembly will meet in the course of a few weeks, and they will make some provision for the apportionment of Senators and Representatives under the old Constitution, which provides that an apportionment shall be made every five years. I would take occasion to remark that a proposition somewhat analogous, has been under consideration by the committee on apportionment. This committee proposes to frame a section providing that the apportionment of the next General Assembly under the old Constitution, shall be the apportionment according to which the next General Assembly shall be elected under the provisions of the new Constitution. This will supersede the necessity of districting the State again, for if we do not adopt this provision, this Convention will have to district the State in like manner as it was districted by our former Convention. There will thus be the same system of districting under the new and the old Constitution. If the Constitution should be adopted in June it will supersede the necessity of an election in August, and in October the election would take place, and the people would elect representatives fresh from the people with the power to carry out all the provisions of the new Constitution. I cannot see how the members of the Legislature under the old Constitution, after taking an oath to support it, can act in obedience to the provisions of the new Constitution. This appears to me to be contradictory, and such briefly are my views in relation to this subject.

Mr. KELSO. I am in favor of the amendment to the amendment decidedly. I would remark here that the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) it appears to me, in one breath is a great stickler for old usages and customs, and in the next breath he is for reform, and nothing but reform; for instance his radical proposition with reference to the Grand Jury system; and now no day but Monday will do for the Legislature to meet, because, forsooth, such has heretofore been the custom.

I favor the proposition of the Legislature meeting on Thursday instead of Monday, for what I consider very good reasons. I care as little, personally, for the observance of the Sabbath probably as any other man here, and I will not tell you a lie about it. But while I may not care anything about it, there are thousands of men in this State as good and perhaps better than I am, who do care a great deal about it. I feel then it is our duty to respect the feelings of that portion of the citizens of our State.

If we fix upon Thursday as the day of meeting for the Legislature, inasmuch as the remotest portion of Indiana is not more than three days journey from the Capital, we will give our representatives ample time to start on Monday and be here in season for the opening of the session.

I favor, also, the idea of the Legislature meeting on the first Thursday after the first day in the month. The first day of each month will of necessity occasionally fall on a Monday, and it is a notion with many persons that new year day should be kept as a holiday; and as we can just as well as not allow to them that privilege, and do no wrong thereby, I am in favor of the Thursday after the first day of January.

There is yet another reason. In this country the 8th of January is as much thought of as the first, and the meeting of the Legislature should take place the Thursday between, and they will just about have time to organize the three last days of the week, and such as wish can celebrate the anniversary of the glorious victory at New Orleans, achieved January the 8th, 1815; and we will thus compel no man to legislate on the first day of the year, which has been one of our greatest holidays from time immemorial, or to labor on the glorious eighth day of January, and at the same time have an appropriate day of meeting.

Now as to whether the Legislature shall meet in January or in December, I do not care particularly; the one or the other time will equally suit me; nor do I think the people will not be greatly advantaged in their interest, by a decision in favor of January over December, or vice versa.

It has been said, that the Legislature now about to meet may disregard our proceedings here, and proceed on their action without reference to our operations; or that they may pass laws which will operate injuriously upon what we are about to do.

Now, sir, I assert that they cannot control our action—they cannot shorten our sessions—they cannot force us to sit in different parts of the State—they cannot compel us to pursue any certain line of policy they mark out; but they may pass laws, good and legitimate, which will be in force and effect until this Constitution is adopted, and other laws made under that Constitution. In making laws they will probably consult our action; at any rate it is best so to frame the provisions of the new Constitution as not to drive the Legislature to do anything that will operate against our action.

I am distinctly in favor of submitting this Constitution to the people at a separate election, where it may go, disconnected with any other issue, to the people. The first general election next fall, we shall elect members of Congress, members of the Legislature, and some other officers, and I do not want to see this Constitution submitted to the people at a time when it may be bartered and traded off for offices or political preferment.

I am of opinion, sir, that the Legislature should meet in 1852, for I see no necessity for putting off the meeting of the Legislature for a year unnecessarily. I shall vote for the amendment to the amendment, and if it carries with the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) I shall feel myself at liberty then to vote for the entire amendment.

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,)

Upon a division—ayes 56, noes 33—

The amendment was concurred in.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) as amended.

It was concurred in.

Mr. HENDRICKS offered the following amendment to the original section:

“But the Governor shall specify in his proclamation calling each special session of the Legislature, the object thereof, and at such special session no matter shall be acted upon beyond that specified in each proclamation.”

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. PETTIT. I do not think it wise or necessary to adopt this amendment. Its adoption may make it necessary for the Governor to call two, three, or even more extra sessions. Emergencies may arise between the issuing of his proclamation and the meeting of the Legislature under it, for further legislation, and the Legislature being in session cannot take cognizance of them, as it would be an absolute impossibility that they could have been anticipated. Therefore the Legislature must be dissolved, go home, and return again under a new proclamation. I do not think it either politic or wise to adopt the amendment.

Mr. COOKERLY moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays being demanded on this motion, they were ordered and taken with the following result—yeas 49, nays 68:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Allen, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Fisher, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hitt, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Maguire, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Watts, Wiley, and Mr. President—49.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Carr, Chandler, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Foster, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogin, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Niles, Owen, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—68.

So the amendment was not laid on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have but very little to say, sir, on this subject. If there is any one thing desirable in government it is to have the laws under which we live stable and uniform. One of the prominent causes of the calling of this Convention was the uncertainty of legislation and the fluctuation of the laws of the State.

We have, sir, agreed by a large vote to have biennial sessions of the Legislature; and if we adopt this amendment and give to the Governor the power of calling extra sessions of the Legislature whenever he sees fit, it will defeat this very action of ours in limiting the meetings of the Legislature to every other year. I wish, for one, to have consistent and permanent laws. To have a stable and uniform laws under which to live is one of the most desirable objects we can have in view in the formation of our Constitution.

I will add, Mr. President, that the Legislature should have stated times for holding its sessions, and there should be no power in the State to call that body together at any other times except when some great emergency, some public necessity, requires it.

And, sir, when the Governor exercises this extraordinary power of calling a special session of the Legislature, is it not right to impose a restraint, and throw a proper responsibility upon him by requiring him to show to the people, in his proclamation, the cause and necessity of such call? And when the Legislature is so called together, is it not right that it should be confined in its action to the matter or subject which is the occasion of such special session?

This will secure the country against an abuse of the power, and against the breaking up of the laws at unusual times, and will secure their stability for at least two years. I hope, sir, the amendment will be adopted.

Pending the question, on motion of Mr. GORDON, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

BIENNIAL SESSIONS.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section which provides for biennial sessions of the Legislature, &c.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Hendricks, that the Governor specify in his proclamation calling a special session of the Legislature the object for which the call is made, &c.—

Mr. PRATHER. Is it in order to move further to amend?

The PRESIDENT. There is an amendment to the section now pending.

Mr. PRATHER. Well, sir, I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

"Nor shall a session of the General Assembly continue beyond sixty days."

I hope, sir, that this amendment will be adopted. It seems to me that if we had had such a rule as this prevailing here from the commencement of this session we should have been through with our business by this time. And as we are about prohibiting the Legislature from passing laws, I think that sixty days is amply sufficient. I would like to have the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Does the amendment of the gentleman from Jennings apply to regular as well as to called sessions?

Mr. PRATHER. It applies to all local sessions.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I desire, in the first place, to say a few words in reference to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Shelby. I object to it for two reasons: first, to its intent, and secondly, to its insufficiency in verbiage to enforce that intent, if the Convention should determine in favor of the proposition.

The amendment proposes, according to the intent of the mover, to confine the action of the General Assembly, during its called sessions, to such matters as may be "specified" in the proclamation of the Governor. This leaves the whole subject to the discretion or caprice of the Governor. The restriction applies altogether to the legislative body; not at all to him. Now suppose, that the Governor should entertain, as I do, liberal views in favor of the representative department; and suppose that the exigencies of the times should require him to call a special session of the General Assembly to make provision for the payment of the interest on the State Debt, or for any other important object, what would prevent him from adding, at the close of his proclamation, a sentence like this: "and for such other purposes as the public good may require"? A simple sentence like that would render the proposed amendment entirely nugatory. It must be apparent from this, that the verbiage of the proposed amendment will not accomplish the purpose which its drawer had in view.

But if it did, I should object to it, as altogether inexpedient. It is inconsistent with my ideas of republicanism to restrain the representative body to the exclusive consideration of such subjects as may be indicated and prescribed by the Governor. The Convention has already reduced the legislative power at least fifty per cent. by providing for biennial instead of annual sessions of the General Assembly. Close upon the settlement of that, came a proposition for the reduction of representation, which I am glad did not succeed. Now we have the proposition under consideration, honestly intended, I have no doubt, but to me quite as objectionable. If it should succeed it would nearly annihilate the half of the legislative power left under the first decision.

Almost the entire weight of this Convention seems to be directed against the legislative department, as if, in that department alone, originated all the evils of government. I will not deny that this spirit is in accordance with the present sentiments of the people; but I have as little doubt that the Convention, and the people also, are laboring under a mistaken notion as to the true remedy which should be applied to cure the evils of bad legislation. The people generally, I doubt not, are in favor of biennial sessions, because they wish to restrain excessive and bad legislation; but they certainly never designed for a moment to destroy the legislative branch of government; they only wish to reform and correct it. They may, perhaps, upon a specious plea of economy, be induced to declare in favor of reduced representation in a new apportionment. But let every gentleman bring the question home to himself; let the people of the several counties be asked if they are willing to give up their own representative, and the response will be very different from what it now seems to be.

The people are right as to the bad character of our past legislation. No man is more sensible of it than myself—none more anxious to apply a remedy. But biennial sessions, reduced representation, and executive dictation, such as proposed by the amendment under consideration, without other and better Constitutional remedies, will only increase the evil. Satisfied that the people are right as to the object, while they are in error as to the means of accomplishing it, I shall act accordingly. I have no fear that they will not justify me in so doing. I came here upon no other conditions, and I shall endeavor to do my duty conscientiously, and in accordance with the oath I have taken.

I desire to correct and improve legislation, not to destroy the power of the people to legislate. We have been repeatedly referred to New York and the New England States. No local legislation, such as we have had, ever existed in any of them; but it was not because of such obstacles as are now proposed here. Their system of legislation is different; they permit localities to legislate for themselves, under general laws, as we must do before we can effect useful reform. Unless we do that, all the changes yet proposed here will only make the matter worse. Let us adopt that feature of their Constitutions, and require from members of the General Assembly strict accountability and responsibility, as can easily be done, and we shall accomplish a thousand times more than we can expect from destructive measures. These remedies are simple, but they will be effectual, and having adopted them, we may safely trust the action of the Legislature to the guidance of enlightened public sentiment.

Having razed the legislative department one-half, by the institution of biennial sessions; having decided, notwithstanding the rapid progress of the State in wealth and population, not to increase, even prospectively, the number of representatives; having determined to confine the Legislature hereafter to the enactment of general laws, I repeat the hope, sir, that the Convention will not take the step now proposed, giving power to the Governor alone to say what the Legislature shall or shall not do, whenever it becomes necessary to call an extra session.

Mr. BIDDLE. I am so much surprised at the vote refusing to lay the amendments of the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) on the table, that I cannot be silent. I look upon the amendment as a bad one. I had no idea but that it would be laid on the table. I think the Convention has not maturely considered its effect. There is much force in what was said by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Chapman,) that this Convention is progressing in a wrong direction. Let us look at it for a moment. It is proposing to restrict the special sessions of the Legislature to such measures as shall be recommended by the Governor in his proclamation.

Now what is the purpose of assembling the Legislature in special sessions? A special session is called upon an extraordinary occasion of some great infringement of popular right; some financial disaster, threatened invasion, declaration of war, or some other unforeseen difficulty in the State. Well, sir, this proposition requires that on all these important measures the deliberations of the General Assembly, when thus called together, shall be restricted as to all important, useful purposes, by the will of the Governor. What is the object of calling the Legislature together? It is that the representatives of the people may consider of those circumstances which authorize the calling of them together. Shall the Governor then be empowered to prescribe to them what they shall do and what they shall not do? Sir, that would bring the legislative power to the feet of the Executive. It is most undoubtedly a retrograde movement. It is going back two or three hundred years, to the times when the Crown of England granted charters to its favorites to govern the colonies; and it was thought a great condescension of majesty when the people were allowed a counsel even of its own appointing, to advise with the Governor.

This measure, Mr. President, proposes to call the representatives of the people together to register the edicts of the Governor. What else is it? Put such a provision as this in your Constitution and it will be sufficiently obnoxious to induce the people to go against the whole instrument. Now, sir, pass this provision, declaring that the Legislature shall do nothing but what it is the pleasure of the Governor to prescribe to them before they meet; give him, in addition to this, a veto which will require a two-thirds vote to overrule, and grant him the pardoning power, then who will vote for the Constitution? No republican, sir!

I recommend gentlemen to pause. If there is a power in the State that should be kept free, above all others, it is the Legislative; and if there is a power to be restricted, it is the Executive. This measure reverses the republican maxim. It is shackling the power that belongs to the people of every free State. Sir, I will not detain the Convention with another remark upon the subject. It is the worst provision that has been introduced into this body.

Mr. RARIDEN. I would like to hear the amendment read.

Sir, either the gentleman or myself utterly misapprehends the force of this amendment. I understand the object of it to be to throw the responsibility upon the Executive in the case of calling a special session, and that the public may know the merits of that call. He is to indicate the subjects upon which they are called to deliberate, and upon those subjects they are just as free to act as if they were not specified at all. They will be as free from influence in acting upon them as in acting upon any subject in their ordinary sessions. The object of the provision is to throw the responsibility of the exercise of the executive power in calling the Legislature together, upon the Executive. He is an officer who is set apart to superintend the public interest, and he is to be held responsible for any extraordinary expense that may be brought upon the people by any act of his. He is by the specification of the objects for which the Legislature is called to hold a special session, to show the necessity for such call. If, in his opinion, there is a necessity so urgent as to justify the expenditure of the public money that is involved in the holding of a special session, he is to call such session and to indicate the object for which it is called, that the people may determine whether his action be right or wrong. He does not designate the course that they shall take. He does nothing of the kind. He merely indicates the subjects, that in his judgment require their deliberation. And they are as free as they ever were to take such course as their wisdom may dictate. For my own part I conceive that it is a provision that is eminently necessary. If we cannot trust the Governor so far to superintend the affairs of the State as to give warning to the representatives of the people of the difficulties that the State has to encounter, and to take upon himself the responsibility of incurring the expense of a special session, we had better abolish the office of Governor altogether. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BORDEN. I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Shelby, for the reason that I think the Convention is determined to establish biennial sessions. It seems to me that if we do not adopt such a provision as this we had better rescind the provision for biennial sessions. If we intend to carry out the principle of allowing the Governor to convene the Legislature at his pleasure, I think we should require him to specify the purpose, leaving it to the community to judge whether he acts right or wrong.

We should take into consideration that the first session of the Legislature after the Constitution goes into effect, will have to be a longer session than the sessions afterwards. In case you go into a revision of the statutes your session must necessarily be longer. Suppose the Legislature should appoint commissioners to draw up a revised code to be submitted to the Legislature for their consideration, the session must necessarily be prolonged; therefore, some provision must be made for this matter. But I rose chiefly to call the attention of the Convention to a provision that I have to offer as soon as it shall be in order. It is that for one, two, or three years after the new Constitution goes into effect the sessions of the Legislature should be annual. For this reason it would be almost impossible to get along with the business of the Legislature for two or three years unless they have annual sessions. One gentleman who sits near me, and with whom I have conversed on this subject, informs me that he is in favor of annual sessions, but that he will go against the proposition of mine, because he wants the people to see the inconvenience that will arise from biennial sessions, and he believes that they will then be inclined to go back to annual sessions. I, therefore, tell the friends of biennial sessions that some system like this will have to be adopted. I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Shelby, and with a proper modification I shall be in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Jennings.

Mr. CHAPMAN. So far as I am concerned, I have no such motive as that suggested by the gentleman from Allen, to influence the vote which I shall give on this subject. I do not oppose the proposition for any such reason, but simply because I regard it as a further attempt to bind the people at the will of the Governor. I have no disposition to act unfairly in regard to the matter of biennial sessions; and although I have protested against the change from the beginning, I am willing that the people shall try the experiment fully. I have been influenced throughout by the belief that I am right in the abstract principle, and I am now fully certain in my own mind, that few years will roll round before the majority of the people will become satisfied of the inutility of the change as a measure of reform.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. WOLFE proposed to amend by inserting the following:

"That no member of the General Assembly shall, after the first seven weeks of any session, receive more than one dollar and fifty cents per day, except the first session after the adoption of this Constitution."

Mr. NAVE moved that the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan be laid on the table.

Mr. WOLFE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I will ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. NAVE. Certainly, if the gentleman desires to speak.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I wish to move an amendment.

The PRESIDENT. There is an amendment to an amendment pending.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Perhaps the gentleman will accept my amendment as a modification of his own. It is a proviso:

"Provided, That the charge for board shall not be higher than one dollar and fifty cents per week." [A laugh.]

Mr. KELSO renewed the motion to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 86, nays 38—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbolt, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hugin, Holman, Hovey, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Elliot, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Zenor, and Mr. President 86.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Beeson, Bright, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cookerly, Crawford, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Smiley, Tague, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum —38.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

The question recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from Shelby.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and they were taken with the following result—yeas 60, nays 65—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Chandler, Chenoweth, Colfax, Crawford, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Foster, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Helmer, Hendricks, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Shannon, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Elliot, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—60.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Clark of H., Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Fisher, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harboit, Helm, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Maguire, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Zenor, and Mr. President—65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORDEN offered the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

“Provided however, That the General Assembly may meet annually until the year 1855, if they shall determine the interest of the State requires it.”

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELSO moved to amend by adding a proviso to the effect that there shall be no legislative action on any subject that is not specifically referred to in the message of the Governor to the Legislature, at the commencement of such special session.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman that a similar amendment has been already voted down.

Mr. KELSO. This is not the same amendment, sir. It is quite another thing.

The PRESIDENT. It appears to be substantially the same.

Mr. KELSO. It is substantially a great deal better. Does the Chair decide that it is out of order?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Switzerland that it is precluded by one of the rules of the Convention.

Mr. KELSO. The propositions are about as different as any two propositions well can be.

Mr. WALPOLE. One word as to the right of the Chair to determine this question. I maintain that it is not for the presiding officer to determine that a proposition has been already decided upon. That is a question for the House to determine.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark, with all due deference to the gentleman, that the Chair has decided no such thing.

Mr. WALPOLE. The authority of—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will defer his remarks for a moment. It is not the province of the Chair to decide an amendment out of order on account of want of congruity. But where an amendment is clearly out of order according to an existing rule of the Convention, it is the imperative duty of the Chair so to decide. The gentleman was very anxious to get a cut at the Chair before the Chair had decided the matter. The Chair suggested to the gentleman from Switzerland that the proposition was substantially the same as one already offered.

Mr. WALPOLE. The Chair seems to be rather sensitive.

The PRESIDENT. Not quite so much so as the gentleman from Hancock. If the gentleman had kept his seat we should have got along a great deal better. The question is on the amendment of—

Mr. WALPOLE (interposing). Well, sir, I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I hope we shall not have a “higher law” practiced here.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will send up his point of order in writing.

Mr. WALPOLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELSO. There has been no point of order decided.

Mr. WALPOLE. I understand the Chair has decided your motion to be out of order.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has decided no such thing.

Mr. WALPOLE. Does the Chair take back its decision?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair takes back nothing.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland.

Mr. KELSO demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I will remark, that by this amendment the Governor is required to prescribe, identically, the business that the Legislature is to do. I care not whether this is done in the proclamation calling the Legislature together or in the message of the Governor after they assemble. It is equally improper in either case. When the Legislature comes together, I think they will have discretion enough to act in reference to all subjects necessary to be acted upon, without being directed to by the Governor.

Mr. KELSO. Gentlemen seem to be remarkably apprehensive of throwing too many restrictions around the Legislature. Now, sir, if we are going to ingraft the proposition that we shall have biennial instead of annual sessions, let us also adopt a provision to prevent the Governor from having it completely in his power to direct annual sessions to be held in contravention of the law. If the Legislature is to be accountable to any body, let them not be accountable to the Governor but to the people. I want to see a provision adopted, that when the Governor shall deem it necessary to convene the Legislature out of season, he shall put on paper, in some shape, the cause that has induced him to call them together.

The yeas and nays were then ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 53, nays 75—as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Borden, Carter, Chandler, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Shannon, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Elliott, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, and Wunderlich—53.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Fisher, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Helm, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Maguire, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—75.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. KELSO. I have one other amendment to offer. It is this: "Provided, that no such special session shall continue longer than twenty days."

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded by the Convention.

The main question was ordered to be put. The question being first on the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland,

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 53, nays 73—as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Beeson, Borden,

Bowers, Bracken, Butler, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Crawford, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Farrow, Foster, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, Logan, March, McClelland, McLean, Milroy, Moore, Mowrer, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, and Wunderlich—53.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbolt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—73.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the motion of the gentleman from Wayne, to strike out the entire section and insert the following :

"That the sessions of the General Assembly shall be held biennially, on the first Monday in December, unless a different day be fixed by law."

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then being : That the section, as amended, be engrossed for a third reading,

It was read, as follows :

"The sessions of the General Assembly shall be held biennially at the Capital of the State, commencing on Thursday after the first Monday in January, 1852, and on the same day every second year thereafter, unless a time or place be appointed by law ; but the Governor shall have the power, at any time, by proclamation, to call a special session."

The section, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Convention then took up the eighth section of report No. 12, upon its second reading. The section provides that each House, when assembled, shall choose their own officers, (the President of the Senate excepted,) be the judges of the qualifications and returns of their own members, determine the rules of their proceeding, and sit upon their own adjournment. But neither House shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which they may be sitting.

Mr. BORDEN moved to insert the word "election" before the word "qualifications." This, he said, was the usual form, but it had, by some means or other, been omitted.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I can see no necessity for the amendment. "Each House shall be the judge of the qualifications of its members." That is quite sufficient.

Mr. BORDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest to him, that, although a man may have all the requisite qualifications, yet he may not be duly elected.

Mr. WALPOLE. I will state to the Convention the view that the committee took of this matter. The object of omitting the word "election" was this: The question as to the legality of an election of a member of the General Assembly in case of a contested election, should be left to be determined in the county where the election took place, and not be made a political contest in the Legislature. If there is any contest, let the question of legality be left to the Circuit Court.

Mr. BORDEN. I now see the object of submitting it. It is to leave the decision to a county board.

Mr. WALPOLE. I did not say to a county board.

Mr. BORDEN. Well, sir, some tribunal in the county. It seems to me that this will be an innovation upon the usual course of proceeding in such cases, which should not be rashly made. I trust the House is not prepared to adopt such a principle.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was, by ayes 37, noes 46, rejected.

Mr. MOWRER moved to strike out so much as relates to the President of the Senate.

Mr. EDMONSTON. All I have to say in relation to this amendment, is: that if it be the will of the Convention to abolish the office of Lieutenant Governor, it will be proper to strike out what is proposed to be stricken out: but we do not yet know whether the Convention will agree to abolish that office; and, if it be not abolished, these words ought to remain.

Mr. MOWRER. I will state to the gentleman, that that is precisely my object. I desire that the office of Lieutenant Governor shall be abolished.

Mr. READ of Clark. I have just drawn up an amendment, and it is to strike out these words. My friend over the way has saved me the trouble of moving that amendment. I am in favor of such an amendment, and one for abolishing the office of Lieutenant Governor, and letting the Senate elect a President, as the House of Representatives do.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. I shall vote in opposition to the proposition to strike out. One of the considerations which induced the calling of this Convention was, that every officer of the State should be elected by the people. Not only the Governor, but every other officer, being the immediate servant of the people. And as this proposition, aiming at nothing else than the abolishing of the office of Lieutenant Governor—upon what principle I cannot tell—and that the President of the Senate shall stand in the place of the Lieutenant Governor, and supply the place of the Governor, in case of his decease, I am opposed to it. Our object is that every officer shall be elected by the people. What is the purpose to be accomplished by abolishing the office of Lieutenant Governor? Is it upon the principle of economy? What is the expense of that office? Perhaps seventy-five dollars a year. Is that a sufficient cause why we should lay aside such an important officer? I cannot vote for such a proposition.

The question was taken upon the motion to strike out, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the engrossment of the section for a third reading.

Mr. HELMER moved to strike out the word "their," and insert "its."

Mr. BRIGHT. The section is grammatically right as it stands. If, however, there be any imperfection in the phraseology, it will be the duty of the committee on revision to set it right.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. It is good Jefferson county grammar and I go for it. [A laugh.]

The amendment was not agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

QUORUM.

The Convention then proceeded to consider the section which provides that two-thirds shall constitute a quorum to do business; and two-thirds being in attendance, if no organization is effected in five days, no compensation shall be paid to members after that time, until an organization is effected, on its second reading.

Mr. PRATHER moved to strike out the word "five" and insert "two."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. KELSO moved to strike out "five" and insert "three." That, he said, would meet the views of those who had voted to fix Thursday, after the first Monday of January, for the meeting of the General Assembly.

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move to strike out all after the word "members." My object in making this motion is—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman that there is an amendment already pending, and the question must be taken upon it first, unless the gentleman proposes to amend the amendment.

The yeas and nays were then taken upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland and resulted thus—yeas 62, noes 66—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Bascom, Beeson, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carter, Chandler, Coats, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Jones, Kelos, Kendall of Wabash, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, and Wunderlich—62.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Borden, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hendricks, Hogin, Howe, Johnson, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—66.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. RITCHEY moved to amend as follows:

"Strike out all after the word 'days,' and insert 'a plurality of the votes of the members present, shall elect any officer of either House.'"

[Cries of "no, no," "agreed, agreed."]

Mr. RITCHEY. I think if gentlemen will reflect for a moment, they will see that this will be more effective, while, at the same time it will not be liable to the charge of injustice. As the section now stands, it provides that if the House fail to organize for five days, the pay of the members shall cease. Now, you know, and every one knows, that when parties become factious and excited, feelings exist, as was the case at the organization of the present Congress of the United States, members might remain in their places for days together without accomplishing anything. The mere stoppage of their pay could not accomplish the desired object. But if the amendment that I propose, be adopted, they will be enabled to effect an organization. That is the method that Congress adopted. We have their example to guide us. The House of Representatives of the United States balloted for days together without being able to elect a Speaker, and would have continued under the same embarrassment if they had not adopted the remedy that I now propose. It proposes that balloting for a certain length of time—a reasonable time—after balloting for five days, for instance, a plurality of votes of the members present, only, shall be required to organize the House and to elect any of their officers. If gentlemen will consider this matter, I think they will agree with me in the propriety of the amendment which I propose.

Mr. BORDEN. I wish simply to ask a question, and it is this: whether, if this provision be inserted, members may not retire and permit the officers to be elected by a few votes?

Mr. READ of Monroe. The difficulty in the organization will be that it is not known who are members. That is precisely what occurred in Ohio.

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. COLFAX. I move to strike out "two-thirds," and insert "a majority," and I desire to say a few words in support of the motion. The section as reported by the committee requires (continued Mr. C.) two-thirds to make a quorum in each House. This is holding out an inducement for gentlemen who may be disposed to resist the passage of a law, to break up the quorum. I know it is not often that you will find eighty members in their seats, and if you require sixty-nine members to form a quorum, and ten or fifteen members only choose to leave their seats, the quorum will be broken up. That is a thing that has been done in this Hall. I desire to adopt such a rule as they have in Congress, that a majority of the body should constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. [Cries, "no, no"—"consent."]

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to strike out all after the words "members."

Mr. BARBOUR. I will remark that I do not think that men who come here to do their duty as legislators ought to be punished, because the House will not organize within a certain specified time. Men who desire to do their duty and are doing it, ought to receive their pay for the time they are so engaged.

Mr. WATTS. I hope the motion will not prevail. If the Legislature should be here for five days and fail to organize, it is a sufficient evidence that members are not doing their duty; and therefore they should not receive pay.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The section which provides that each House shall keep a journal of its own proceedings and publish the same, and the yeas and nays of the members on any question shall, on the request of any—of them, be entered on the journal, was taken up, on its second reading.

Mr. DOBSON moved to fill the blank with the word "two."

The object that I have in view, said Mr. D., is this: during the last few days of the session of the Legislature, it has been customary, heretofore, to pass a great many bills, and if you require ten members or more to call the yeas and nays it will be impossible in many cases to procure the yeas and nays, and bills will pass that ought never to be passed. I hope, however, that we shall insert in the Constitution, a provision requiring that the yeas and nays shall be taken upon all bills upon their final passage. I want to put it in the power of two men in the Legislature of Indiana to compel the balance to put their names upon the record, that the people may see how they vote, so that if ninety-eight are compelled to go astray, two will compel them to put down their names, so that the people may see how they vote.

Mr. BRIGHT. I think that upon the final passage of every bill, if the yeas and nays were taken, there would be less occasion for frequent calls of the yeas and nays in the progress of the bill. The Constitution of the United States requires one-fifth of either House of Congress to call the yeas and nays. In the Constitution of Wisconsin I see it requires one-sixth. If the number was larger there would not be such frequent calls for the yeas and nays, and I think we have witnessed on this floor, the necessity for inserting a large number to prevent the too frequent recurrence of calls for the yeas and nays. I therefore move that the motion of the gentleman from Owen be laid on the table.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. I am satisfied, from the experience I have had in legislation, that if we provide that the yeas and nays shall be called upon the final passage of bills, it will not prevent the calling of yeas and nays in the intermediate stages. It is proper that they should be called upon amendments that are salutary and necessary to perfect the bill. I recollect on a certain occasion, when an amendment was pending, if the yeas and nays had not been called, the amendment would not have been adopted, and the bill would have been lost. How often do you find it the case, when the yeas and nays are called that there is no quorum present? And how often does a bill fail merely from the fact that members have not the opportunity to stand up and call the yeas and nays. Just so in regard to an amendment. Men are afraid to show their hands, and refuse to have the yeas and nays recorded. I trust that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. WALPOLE. I cannot, so far as I am concerned, consent to an alteration in the provision of the present Constitution, in regard to demanding the yeas and nays. The argument which the gentleman from Jefferson contemplates, that upon the final passage of every proposition, the yeas and nays shall be required, is not a sufficient reason why the old provision of the Constitution should be abrogated. Every gentleman connected with legislation in Indiana is aware that the most important questions determined are those side questions—questions intervening before the final passage of the proposition. You place it then in the power of the majority to run, rough shod, over the minority, when you make the number required to demand the yeas and nays so large. We find here, that upon some of the most important questions, it is difficult to get ten gentlemen to demand the yeas and nays, and when you require fifteen, which is about one-fourth of the whole number of representatives, you will find it almost impossible to procure the yeas and nays; but when you bring it down to two, you will have the yeas and nays taken, you will make every representative responsible for the vote he gives, even upon the simple question of adjournment. Your Constitution does not provide that the yeas and nays shall be called upon motions to adjourn. I trust that we shall adhere to the long established principle. There is no reason why it should be abrogated. There is no inconvenience growing out of it, but on the contrary, much good to the public. I regret that an innovation has been made by this Convention upon the old established usages, in requiring a greater number to demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FISHER moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I hope, sir, that a higher number will be adopted as the number with which to fill the blank. We have all seen cases of factious opposition on the part of members of the Legislature; we have seen them availing themselves of frequent calls of the yeas and nays for the purpose of embarrassing the body and preventing the transaction of business. I once witnessed a scene of this kind, where four or five men prevented the action of a large majority. One of these four is now a member of this Convention, though not now present. They prevented the action of the majority by constantly calling the yeas and nays until the period had expired when it would be of any use to pass the bill; and inasmuch as that kind of operation may be constantly brought to bear, it seems to me that ten or fifteen members should be required to demand the yeas and nays before they shall be called.

Mr. RITCHEY. I hope the motion to insert "two" will prevail. Sir, if there is anything that will force a man to the discharge of his duty, it is the responsibility that will rest upon him when his vote is recorded. If you require ten or fifteen members to call the yeas and nays and a member believes it will be a little disreputable to him to have his conduct exhibited, he will refrain from calling the yeas and nays. I would like to see it provided that one man should have a right to demand that the votes given upon every important question that comes up before the Legislature, either in the Senate or in the House, should be recorded. Sir, if there is anything that men dread to see, it is to see their names recorded upon the passage of a measure that is not proper to be passed; and when they can screen themselves by voting without recording their votes, they always prefer to do so. There is a difficulty in getting ten men here, as we know by daily experience, to demand the yeas and nays; and if the number were larger, it would still be more difficult to call them. But it appears to me that any two should have the right to demand the yeas and nays, in order to compel each man to assume his proper share of responsibility.

Mr. READ of Clark. I feel a good deal of interest in this subject, having seen so much evil grow out of acts passed by a minority of both branches of the Legislature. I appeal to the old members of this Convention, those who have witnessed the winding up scenes in the Legislature, if they have not seen bills of importance—in fact, the most important of the bills passed during the session—passed by a minority in both houses? And why? The reason is this: the yeas and nays were not taken. And why were they not taken? It required but two to demand the yeas and nays, and even then it was difficult sometimes to get them. But if you require a larger number, the difficulty will be still greater; therefore I think we should not increase the number. I go for the lowest number. I think that two members should have the right to call the yeas and nays, so as to let the action of representatives be laid before their constituents. The passage of objectionable measures by a minority, is of very frequent occurrence; whereas, if the yeas and nays had been called, those measures would not have passed.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I certainly cannot feel the force of the arguments of the gentleman from Clark. I have had some experience in legislation and I have seen the effects that have been produced by the passage of bad measures, but it was not for the want of an opportunity to call the yeas and nays, because it was in the power of two members to do that, but it was because there was not a quorum in the house, and it was necessary that those measures should be passed in order to accommodate the members present. And I appeal to the gentleman from Clark and the gentleman from Johnson, if they have not witnessed scenes in the Legislature that were enough to turn men against allowing a small number of men to call the yeas and nays, when it has been the practice for two members to move to adjourn and call the yeas and nays upon the question, for the purpose of harrassing the majority? Now is there any question upon which the people care anything about seeing the votes of their representatives, that ten members cannot be got to call the yeas and nays? Why it is preposterous to think the contrary. Is it supposed that men will shrink from the responsibility of recording their votes? ["Not at all."] I am in favor of inserting ten, that a factious minority may not harrass a majority to death, as has been the case in the Legislature of this State. I am in favor of requiring one-fifth of the members present to second the demand for the yeas and nays. I appeal to members if much time is not spent in calling the yeas and nays upon questions of no vital interest, upon questions about which the people care nothing, simply to suit the caprice of some gentleman who wishes to show the country how he has voted. I move that the blank be filled with "ten."

Mr. SMITH of Scott. I am satisfied, sir, that the gentleman does not take the right view of the subject. This kind of confusion that the gentleman alludes to, is precisely what I want to get rid of. I want to put it in the power of two men to compel the recording of the yeas and nays. I want no vote to pass without the proper responsibility attaching to every man who votes. Gentlemen talk about the consumption of time and the disturbances that will take place. A hundred side motions may be made, and motions to adjourn to a particular time, and as soon as the question is taken a motion to adjourn again to a different time is made. How are you to make members responsible in such cases, unless you place their names upon the journal? It seems to me the idea is preposterous; and this is not the only important matter. Suppose a question of some importance is brought up and gentlemen skulk behind the bush, because they do not wish to give their names to the public. We have witnessed such instances; and so far as the confusion alluded to by the gentleman from Monroe is concerned, I have seen more confusion where the yeas and nays were not called, because in that case members did not feel the same responsibility. I trust that the motion will prevail, and that "two" will be inserted, and that the number will not exceed that number.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. It appears to me that the reason which has been assigned for increasing the number of those calling the yeas and nays, is based upon the principle of the necessity of giving members the opportunity of recording their votes upon the final passage of a bill. Now on the next page to that upon which we are engaged, there is a provision, one that I have no doubt will meet the approbation of the Convention, which declares that on the final passage of any bill the yeas and nays shall be recorded. That will effectually prevent the passage of any bill when less than a quorum of members are in attendance. As to the case that has been referred to by the gentlemen from Gibson, I promise that it will rarely occur that on a motion to adjourn ten members will be found in either branch willing to waste the time by calling the yeas and nays; and I presume that if we pass some such wholesome provision we shall save a great many hours of time, and a great deal of useless expense in both branches of the Legislature. My short experience has taught me that the calling of the yeas and nays is more frequently for factious purposes than for the purpose of obtaining a vote. And any gentleman who feels himself oppressed or wronged by the action of the majority can readily protest—he can put upon the record the solemn protest against such action, and thus place himself right before the country.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I shall not detain the Convention a moment, sir, but I wish to say a word or two in regard to this matter. I hope the blank will be filled by "two." Now I have myself felt an inconvenience from the operation of the rule that we have here. There have been at least two occasions on which I wished to have the yeas and nays called if I had have been certain that nine gentlemen would have joined me in making the call. But I was reluctant to ask, and the body decided against having them called. Now I have had some experience in legislation, and I think there is no evil arising out of permitting a small number to call the yeas and nays, except such as is attendant upon all rules that may be passed. In my judgment each individual should have the right to demand that the vote should be seconded. I know there are many members who are far more modest than I am, who would be deterred from asking the yeas and nays if nine members were required to join him in the request before he could obtain them. I have no fears that the yeas and nays would be called on unimportant questions.

Mr. RITCHEY. I wish merely to say in reply to the gentleman from Dubois, that frequently at the conclusion of the Legislature here, as you and he both know, a great many members go home. Make what provision you may, therefore, there may be still on the clerk's table a vast amount of business, carried up to be ready fixed for the day of the adjournment. And on that day, we all know, many bills are passed of a most iniquitous character—passed when there is no quorum present. Every one will agree with me that this should not be permitted. I heard last night of one iniquitous measure that was defeated in the Senate, and defeated only by the constant watchfulness of a member who sits behind me, the delegate from Franklin county—he is always vigilant. He had placed himself in a position in which he could demand the yeas and nays. Had it not been for his vigilance the bill would have passed. There are numerous cases in which the necessity for putting it in the power of a single member to demand the yeas and nays is manifest. Every gentleman here must feel that there have been times when such a rule was of the utmost importance.

Mr. BROOKBANK. There appears to be a tolerably wide difference of opinion upon this point. Some gentlemen insist that two members shall have the power to claim the yeas and nays, and some that ten shall be required. I propose a compromise: I propose that it shall require five in the House and two in the Senate.

Mr. NEWMAN. I think that if we are going to adopt a large number there should be a distinction made between the two Houses. I move therefore to amend by inserting the following:

"SEC. —. The sessions of the General Assembly shall be held biennially, on the first Monday of December, unless a different day be appointed by law. And if in the opinion of the Governor the public welfare shall require it, he may, by proclamation, convene the two Houses at such time and place as he may name."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that the question under consideration is on filling the blank. The rule requires that the question be put first on the largest number.

Mr. WOLFE. I move—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Wayne is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NEWMAN. We are all aware that it is difficult to adopt any rule in which there will not be some imperfection. But certainly the error cannot be greater, especially after the provision is adopted, that upon the final passage of all bills the yeas and nays shall be called. The difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Johnson might be obviated. Every gentleman here must feel that there has been time wasted. Members become excited. Now, although it is wrong to become excited, it is the case sometimes, and though I might demand the yeas and nays, and the House reject the demand, it would be no evidence that the House was right. Is it right that the time of the body should be consumed at the instance of two members. I think not. I think there ought to be ten required in the House and five in the Senate. But I am willing to say one-fifth of each House.

Mr. — moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was, upon a division—ayes 46, noes 46—negatived.

The question being first on filling the blank with the number "fifteen"—

Mr. WOLFE. I hope the Convention will consider this matter maturely before they vote. It does appear to me that we should not act hastily in regard to it. It may be considered a very trifling matter, but I have seen the time, sir, when it would be difficult to get ten members to call the yeas and nays upon some very important questions, and I say that we should have such a rule that we can set ourselves right at any time. For, sir, in some cases the same votes would not be given if the yeas and nays were called. I hope that the number two will be retained. I am for preserving the old landmarks. I am always willing to declare the position I occupy by my vote. I am always willing that my acts shall be known by the people. Shall we say to the Legislature that in future, perhaps for fifty years, it shall require ten or fifteen members to call the yeas and nays upon any question, merely because they are directed to be taken on the final passage of every bill? How many important propositions may be voted down without the people being able to know how their representatives voted? I go for the smallest number.

Another motion was made to adjourn.

The Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Would it be in order to move to insert one-tenth of each House?

The PRESIDENT. That number is proposed already.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with "fifteen."

The motion was negatived.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with "ten."

It was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with "five."

The motion was lost.

The question was taken on filling the blank with "two;"

And it was adopted.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 11, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CARY.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. BEESON presented a petition from citizens of Wayne county praying for the abolition of capital punishment, for the establishment of equal rights, and for the reduction of the salaries of public officers to the wages of day laborers, &c., &c.

The petition having been read—

Mr. BEESON moved that it be referred to the committee on the legislative department.

Mr. WATTS. I would suggest to the gentlemen that he ought to vary his motion a little, so as to refer so much of the petition as relates to taking the life of a human being, so pathetically set forth therein, to a committee on that subject; so much as relates to amalgamation to the committee on miscellaneous subjects [laughter]; and so much as relates to the per diem allowance of public officers to the committee on the legislative department. It seems to me that these would be the appropriate references.

Mr. RARIDEN. To what committee would the gentleman refer that part of the petition which relates to the general reformation of the human family?

Mr. WATTS. I would refer that to a committee of which the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) should be chairman. [Renewed merriment.]

The question was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Beeson,) and it was agreed to.

So the petition was referred to the committee on the legislative department.

Mr. FOSTER, from the committee on the elective franchise and the apportionment of representation reported the following amendment to the Constitution:

SEC. —. The General Assembly shall, at their first meeting after the adoption of this Constitution, and every six years thereafter, cause an enumeration to be made of all the white male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years.

SEC. —. The number of Senator and Representatives shall, at the periods of making such enumeration, be fixed by law, and apportioned among the several counties according to the number of white male inhabitants above twenty-one years in each: Provided, The first election of members of the General Assembly, under this Constitution, shall be according to the apportionment made by the Legislature at its session of 1850-51."

The sections were read a first time and passed to a second reading on to-morrow.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington, from the committee on education, reported the following sections:

"SEC. —. Knowledge and learning, generally diffused through a community, being essential to the preservation of a free government, it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to encourage, by all suitable means, moral, intellectual, scientific, and agricultural improvement, and to provide, by law, for a general and uniform system of common schools, wherein tuition, as soon as circumstances will permit, shall be gratis, and equally open to all.

"SEC. —. It shall also be the duty of the General Assembly, (in order to furnish the common schools of the State with efficient and well qualified teachers,) to establish in the State University, a Normal School, wherein students shall be admitted upon such conditions, and instructed in such subjects, as shall be prescribed by law.

"SEC. —. The University Fund shall consist of the proceeds from the sales of the lands granted by the United States for a Seminary of Learning, and of such of said lands as remain unsold, together with such other grants, gifts, and donations as have been, or may hereafter be, made thereto. The principal of said fund shall forever remain inviolate, and the interest and income thereof shall be applied to the maintenance of the State University, in such manner as the General Assembly may direct.

"SEC. — The Common School Fund shall consist of the Congressional Township Fund and the lands belonging thereto:

"The Surplus Revenue Fund.

"The Saline Fund, and the lands belonging thereto.

"The Bank Tax Fund, and the fund arising from the one hundred and fourteenth section of the charter of the State Bank of Indiana.

"The fund to be derived from the sale of the county seminaries, and the moneys and property heretofore held for such seminaries, the fines assessed for any breach of the penal laws of this State, and all forfeitures which may accrue.

"All lands and other estate which shall escheat to this State, for want of heirs or kindred entitled to the inheritance.

"All lands that have been or may hereafter be granted to this State, where no special purpose is expressed in the grant, and the proceeds of the sales thereof.

"All corporation taxes that may be assessed by the General Assembly for common school purposes, as hereinafter provided.

"The several counties of this State shall be held liable for the preservation of so much of the said funds as may be entrusted to them, and the payment of the annual interest thereon.

SEC. — There shall be annually deducted and paid over to the Treasurer of State, for the use of common schools, from the dividends of each company, which may hereafter be incorporated, and of each company which has been heretofore incorporated, in whose charter the General Assembly has received the right to repeal, alter, or amend the same, — per cent. of such dividend, whenever the same shall exceed the amount of six per centum.

"SEC. — The principal of all the said common school funds, shall be and remain a perpetual fund, which may be increased, but shall never be diminished, the interest and income of which shall be inviolably appropriated to the maintenance of common schools, and to no other purpose whatever.

"SEC. — The general Assembly shall invest in some safe and profitable manner, all such portions of said common school fund as have not heretofore been entrusted to the several counties, and make provision by law for the distribution of the interest thereof: Provided, That each county shall be entitled to its proportion of the interest and income of said fund, and if not demanded for common school purposes, shall be re-invested for the benefit of such county."

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. On presenting this report, Mr. President, if I have sufficient strength, I am inclined to say a word or two in explanation of the reason why the report has been delayed so long. The committee on education had several meetings shortly after the opening of the Convention, and determined upon the general principles to be embodied in the report. But in consequence of the absence of some information which the committee desired to have prior to their final action upon the subject, they thought proper to delay final action, and accordingly a resolution was offered calling upon the Auditor of State, who is ex officio superintendent of common schools, for information in regard to the condition and safety, and amount, of the several common school funds; and a communication was received from the superintendent, in a day or two, stating that the information called for could not be obtained in his office, but that he had dispatched circulars to the various officers connected with common schools, and that as soon as he received the information he would lay it before the Convention. The information, however, has not yet been received. The committee on education thought proper, also, to delay their report until after the book committee had reported, so that they might know what system of banking would be agreed on by the Convention. In the last place, sir, it will be recollected by the Convention, that I have not been in my seat for the last three weeks. Three weeks ago today I was seized by an attack of pleurisy, which has confined me to my room until the present hour. I hope that these reasons will be considered sufficient to show why the report has been delayed so long.

The sections were read a first time and passed to a second reading on to-morrow.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The section providing for biennial sessions and for the meeting of the Legislature under the new Constitution on the Tuesday after the first day of January, 1852; and on the same day every second year thereafter, &c., was taken up.

The question being, Shall the section pass? The yeas and nays were taken and resulted—yeas 120, nays 5—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mather, May, Mc-Clelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—120.

NAYS.—Messrs. Biddle, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Maguire, Morrison of Marion—5.

There being three other sections on their third reading,

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, he would like to see the vote taken upon the remainder of the sections together. It would be a considerable saving of time. I move that they all be read, and if any gentleman desires a separate vote upon any section he can indicate it [cries of "no, no"],

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman that it would require a vote the other way, the Convention having decided that the vote shall be taken separately on each section.

Mr. SMITH. Well, sir, I have no great objection.

Mr. PRATHER. I would like to make a suggestion. I discover on examining the report on the subject of education, that it is an important document, and I think we should have an extra number of copies printed. I, therefore, move that five hundred copies of that report be printed.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Secretary then read the section which provides that "Each House shall choose its own officers, be the judges of the qualifications of its own members," &c.

And also the section which provides that "Two-thirds of each House, shall constitute a quorum to do business; and that if no organization be effected in the first five days after the meeting, no compensation shall be allowed to members," &c.

The PRESIDENT. It is moved to take the question on these two sections together.

Mr. BORDEN. If nobody objects, we may as well pass them without the yeas and nays. I suppose the rule can be suspended by general consent.

Objection was made.

The PRESIDENT. It requires a two-thirds vote to suspend the rule.

The question was put: Shall the rule be suspended?

The rule was not suspended.

The question was then taken on the motion that the vote be taken on the two sections together, and it was agreed to.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and resulted—yeas 122, nays 2—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—122.

NAYS.—Messrs. Rariden and Spann—2.

So the sections were passed.

The following section, on its second reading, was then taken up:

"Each House shall keep a journal of its own proceedings, and publish the same; and the yeas and nays of the members on any question, shall, on the request of any of them, be entered on the journal."

Mr. MAGUIRE moved to amend by adding the following:

"And the names of the members demanding the yeas and nays shall also be entered upon the journal."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELSO. On yesterday I voted to insert the word "two" in this section, and I still believe that number to be right; but, upon reflection, I believe that the section can be improved by adding the following proviso:

"That, upon a motion to adjourn, it shall require one-fifth of the members present to demand the yeas and nays to be recorded on the journal."

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick moved to amend by striking out the section as amended, and inserting a provision to the following effect:

"That one-tenth of the members elected in either branch shall be necessary to require the yeas and nays to be entered upon the journal."

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland.

Mr. KELSO. I will modify by substituting one-tenth instead of one-fifth.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. The object of the amendment I have offered is this: It will require ten in the House to call the yeas and nays, provided there shall be a hundred members, and five in the Senate, provided there shall be fifty senators. It appears to me, sir, that it ought not to require the same number in the Senate as in the House to demand the yeas and nays; and I think, from the expression we have had here, ten is a small enough number to demand the yeas and nays upon any question. I appeal to any one who has paid attention to the proceedings of the Legislature, to say whether I am not right. Upon an examination of the journals, I will venture the assertion, that it will be found that the yeas and nays have frequently been demanded upon the most unimportant and trifling questions. It is upon little questions, when members wish to procrastinate the proceedings, that the yeas and nays are demanded. This amendment, if adopted, will require that one-tenth of the members elected shall be necessary to demand the yeas and nays. I think that, upon all questions of importance, a sufficient number of members will be found willing to have their names recorded upon the journal.

Mr. WOLFE. This matter was settled yesterday, I thought, definitely; and I was in hopes that it would be allowed to rest. The gentleman from Warrick refers to the inconvenience of having the yeas and nays demanded upon unimportant questions. His experience differs from mine very much; my experience is the very reverse of his. I know it is right that we should have the yeas and nays, in order to make members accountable for their acts. I want public servants to be responsible to the people.

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman says that his experience is directly the reverse of mine. He desires that it shall appear upon the journal how every member votes. Yet he complains that, under the old Constitution, the yeas and nays are not entered upon the journal, so that the evil of which he complains, his own proposition does not cure. It is true that, upon unimportant matters, in order to procrastinate, the yeas and nays are often demanded. But the evil of which the gentleman complains is remedied by another section, which requires that the yeas and nays shall be taken upon the first passage of every bill; and upon the intermediate questions there will always be found ten members who will be willing to demand the yeas and nays, when it is necessary that they should be taken.

The question was taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Warrick, and it was rejected.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following section, upon its second reading, was then taken up:

"Any member of either House shall have the right of protest, and of having his protest with the reason of his dissent, entered upon the Journal."

No amendment being offered, the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Secretary read the next section, as follows:

"Either House may punish its members for disorderly behaviour, and with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a member, but not a second time for the same cause, and shall have all other powers necessary for a branch of the Legislature of a free and independent State."

Mr. MURRAY moved to strike out the words, "but not a second time for the same cause."

It seems to me, said Mr. M., that if it becomes necessary to expel a member a second time for the same cause, it must be an aggravated aggravation of the offense.

A MEMBER. "The second expulsion will not be for the same cause."

Mr. BORDEN. The only difficulty is in the change of a word. The word "cause" has been inserted in the place of "offense." The language usually employed is, "that a member shall not be expelled a second time for the same offense."

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman insist upon his amendment?

Mr. MURRAY. It seems to me that a man might be guilty of the same cause of offense a second time.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I move to strike out the word "cause" and insert the word "offense."

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Huntington withdraw his motion?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes, sir.

The question being on the motion of the gentleman from Marion—

Mr. BRIGHT. It is always wrong to expel a man for an act which is not an offense. This provision adheres to the language of the old Constitution. Two-thirds of the body may expel a member; not for an offense, merely, but for any misconduct. Misconduct does not always constitute an offense against the law. But he should not be expelled a second time for the same cause. This provision grew out of the celebrated trial of Wilkes, in England, who was expelled and re-elected, and an attempt made to expel him a second time for the same cause. If you strike out "cause" and insert "offense," then a member cannot be expelled, however disreputable his conduct, unless it amounts to crime. That is not what is contemplated.

Mr. KELSO. I do not conceive that the word "offense" is quite so limited as the gentleman seems to understand it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I was going to add, that we have adopted exactly the language of the old Constitution.

Mr. KELSO. As this is the only word that is left of the old Constitution, we may as well strike it out.

The motion was agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The next section was read, as follows:

"Either House may punish by imprisonment, during their session, any person not a member, who shall be guilty of any disrespect to the House by any disorderly or contemptuous behaviour in their presence. But such imprisonment shall not at any one time exceed twenty-four hours."

Mr. DOBSON moved to amend by adding after the word "imprisonment," the words "or fine."

I will just remark, said Mr. D., that one of the last things that I wish to do, is to imprison an individual; but if guilty of any misconduct, I would let the Legislature exercise their discretion whether they would imprison or impose a fine. I am opposed to imprisonment.

Mr. READ of Clark. I would inquire of the gentleman how he proposes that the fine shall be collected, and how disposed of after it has been collected?

Mr. DOBSON. The Legislature will have the power to provide for just such cases. I am for allowing them to exercise a discretion in the matter, as to whether they will imprison or fine an individual who may be guilty of disrespect or disorderly behaviour. When the punishment is by imprisonment, it is never enforced. There never has been an instance, I believe, where an individual has been imprisoned for contemptuous conduct. But there have been instances where, if the Legislature had had the power to fine, fines would have been imposed. I hope the words that I have proposed will be inserted. If they have the power to imprison, they should have the power to fine.

The question being taken upon the amendment, it was rejected.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section providing that when vacancies happen in either branch of the General Assembly the Governor shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies, was then read.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The next section was read as follows:

"Senators and Representatives in all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, shall be privileged from arrest during the session of the General Assembly, and in going to and returning from the same, and shall not be subject to any civil process during the session of the General Assembly, or for fifteen days next before the commencement thereof."

Mr. BORDEN. It occurs to me that the committee have been generally successful in retaining every portion of the old Constitution, which is deemed material. But I think there is a part of this section that is incorrect. By looking at the Constitution of the United States, it will be found that it is provided, that for any speech in either House, a member shall not be questioned in any other place. I think this provision ought to be retained in our Constitution. I therefore move to amend by adding at the end of the section these words: "and for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

Mr. NAVE. I cannot see, sir, the necessity of adopting this amendment. I do not believe that a man, simply because he happens to be clothed with a little brief authority, and to take a position in either branch of the Legislature of Indiana, he should be thereby licensed to slander the whole community. It is a feature in the organic law that I am opposed to. No man should ever be licensed by the Constitution, to slander an entire community, or an individual in the community, without being held responsible for every word that he utters—every sentence that falls from his lips, to those against whom he utters an imputation, in the same manner as if he were a private citizen, in the private walks of life. No man should ever be relieved from an action for slander, which he may utter against any portion of the community, merely because he is clothed with office; but, on the contrary, he should ever be held responsible for everything he utters; and if this were made a permanent rule, it would not be the case hereafter, that men would rise up in a deliberative body and traduce the character or those who are not present to defend themselves. They would then be guarded as to the language they used, and not utter that which is calculated to blight the character and the prospects of any individual. I am opposed to the amendment, and am in favor of the section as it was reported from the committee; believing that it is right that every portion of the community should be secured against the calumny of those who are clothed with a little brief authority.

Mr. BORDEN. It seems to me that the principle contended for by the gentleman, is not correct. We cannot tell what may take place in the future progress of the State. The time may come when influential persons—persons occupying official stations, and prominent positions in society, may have an entire ascendancy over the Legislature, and there may be corruption on the part of officers of the Government. For instance, the banking interest may gain an ascendancy in legislation. I ask you, whether if a man gets up and frankly exposes this corporation, there would not be influence enough to bring him to trial, and perhaps imprison him. It is a well established principle, that the rep-representatives of the people ought to be secured against influences of this kind. Yes, sir, the omission of such a provision in the Constitution would be a departure from a principle that is established in almost every Constitution that has been formed. I think it is highly necessary that these provisions should be retained.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I think that the gentleman from Marion is right in the view that he takes of this matter. It was not canvassed, if I recollect right, in the committee. I think that a representative of the people should be relieved from the assaults that he might be subjected to for being a little too free in debate. A member, it is true, is responsible to his constituents for the manner in which he exercises the powers conferred upon him, and for the faithful discharge of all his duties; but, on the other hand, the public might suffer if he were restrained from exposing corruptions, by the dread of being involved in law suits. I think the amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. BRIGHT. I believe it was the design of the committee to adopt as many of the provisions of the old Constitution as possible.—Indeed to adopt them in all cases where they have not been made the subject of objection before the people of the State of Indiana.

The thirteenth section of the old Constitution, provides "that Senators and Representatives, shall, in all cases except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during the session of the General Assembly; and in going to and returning from the same."

This is the precise language of the provision now under consideration, and it further provides that, "for any speech or debate, in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

This has, I think, by accident, been omitted. The committee have added to this section of the old Constitution, "that they should not be subject to civil process." The provision that has been omitted, I think, ought to be supplied, for reasons that are obvious. It is one that is to be found in the Constitution of almost every State, and in that of the United States, and I know no reason why it should be omitted in the Constitution of Indiana.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to amend, by striking out all after the word "same," in the original section.

It was remarked, said Mr. H., by the chairman of the committee, that the propriety of this provision in the old Constitution, was so apparent, that he presumed no remark was necessary. If its propriety be so apparent, I must be exceedingly dull of comprehension. This right of exemption from arrest upon any civil liability, is a right that is granted, not for the benefit of the member, but for the benefit of his constituents; for the purpose of enabling the Representative to discharge his duty without interruption. But if we adopt a principle of this kind in the Constitution, it not only exempts him from arrest on civil process, but for breaches of the peace. By exempting from arrest on civil process, we are giving a privilege that is not conferred upon any other class of citizens. The judge on the bench is not exempt. Process may now be served upon a citizen, though a thousand miles from his residence.—Why? Because public interest requires it. The effect of this provision will be this: If a court is to be held in April, process cannot be served, returnable at that court, unless served before the member comes to the Legislature, and fifteen days prior to the meeting of the Legislature. Under such a provision, manifest injustice will be done in many cases, to the citizen, who has a just demand against the Representative. For my part, I cannot see the force of the argument which the honorable chairman says is so conclusive to his mind, in favor of this part of the section.

The question was taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, and it was not agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The next section was then read, as follows:

"The doors of each House, and of committees of the whole, shall be kept open, except in such cases as, in the opinion of the House, may require secrecy."

Mr. MATHER moved to strike out all after the word "open."

Mr. DOBSON. I think this amendment should not be adopted. Cases may arise where secrecy is required. It is important at times that those outside of the Hall should not know what is going on in it—they are extreme cases, to be sure, but such cases do occur. I remember one instance when it became necessary to secure funds belonging to the State to a large amount, that the doors should be closed. The fact of the embezzlement of the public funds to a considerable amount, was communicated to us, and immediately the doors were closed, and a bill was passed, and signed by the Governor, before the ink was dry with which it was written, and the rights of the State secured, which could not have been done if those outside had known what we were doing. It has been necessary heretofore, that the Legislature should sit with closed doors, and it may be so again.

Mr. WOLFE moved to strike out the entire section, and insert the following:

"That the doors of each branch of the General Assembly, and of committees of the whole, be kept open, except in such cases as, in their opinion, may require secrecy."

Mr. KELSO. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Sullivan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOLFE. I have no wish to debate the question.

Mr. KELSO. The Chair will permit me to say that I do not regard the rule established by the Chair, as a very correct one. When I offer an amendment, I have only the floor——

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has not established the rule; it was established long before the present incumbent ever occupied the chair.

Mr. KELSO. I am happy to hear it, and I take back my remark. Now, sir, the proposition I believe is to strike out the entire section.

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be on the amendment of the gentleman from Elkhart.

Mr. KELSO. Yes, sir. I have listened attentively to the remarks of my friend from Owen, who is pretty near right in regard to matters generally. I happened to be with him in the Legislature at the time he speaks of, when it was necessary to pass a law with the utmost expedition in order to save certain funds belonging to the State. The doors were carefully guarded, sentinels were placed at them, and a law was passed, but, sir, what was accomplished by it? Nothing at all. I maintain that it is not necessary that we should pass any such provision as this, for so far as secrecy is concerned, there is no such thing known to the legislation of the State of Indiana. Nor should there be. There was a provision put into the Bank charter, and perhaps it was well enough to put it there; that while the Legislature were engaged in electing the officers of the Bank, the doors should be closed. This was done in order to prevent bank influence from operating upon the members of the Legislature. But, sir, the election of bank officers is no part of legislative proceedings, and I should have no objection to an amendment declaring that upon such occasions the doors might be closed, and it would be strictly constitutional, for, in such cases, it is not a legislative act. But I am opposed to the amendment as it stands.

Mr. EDMONSTON referred to the case of Beckwith, who was endeavoring to swindle the State to a large amount. It was necessary on that occasion, said Mr. E., to close the doors of the Legislature while acting upon the case. They were accordingly closed, and we passed an act, and it was signed by the Governor, and Beckwith was caught, whereas it never could have been done if we had gone on with open doors. He was caught, as I said, and some part, I believe, of the money was recovered.

Mr. KELSO. The gentleman is mistaken. The money was not recovered.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Well, that was not the fault of the Legislature. I will venture to say that if they had passed the law with open doors, Beckwith would never have been heard of.

Mr. KELSO. Then the State would have saved several hundred dollars expense.

Mr. PETTIT. The question, I believe, is on the amendment of the gentleman from Elkhart.

The PRESIDENT. It is, sir.

Mr. PETTIT. Then, sir, I shall ask the yeas and nays upon it. I am opposed to the proposition to transact governmental business in secret. I am utterly opposed to secret machinery in the government of a Republic. I think, therefore, that there is no sort of necessity for adopting the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 56, nays 67—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Bowers, Brookbank, Braynt, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Garvin, Hamilton, Hendricks, Hitt, Kelso, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Ristine, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Taylor, Trimble, Elliot, Wheeler, Wiley, Yocum, and Mr. President—56.

NAYS.—Alexander, Allen, Badger, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hugin, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Zenor—67.

So the amendment was not adopted.

The question then being upon the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan, to strike out the entire section, and insert the following:

"That the doors of each branch of the General Assembly, and of committees of the whole, shall be kept open, except in such cases as in their opinion may require secrecy.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The next section was then read as follows:

"Bills may originate in either House, but may be altered, amended, or rejected in the other; except that bills for raising the revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

Mr. STEVENSON moved to amend the section by adding the following:

"Every law shall embrace but one object, which shall be expressed in the title."

Mr. STEVENSON. The object of this amendment is to obviate a difficulty that frequently occurs in the Legislature. When a bill is presented and its friends are not numerous enough to pass it, and they enter into a coalition with gentlemen who desire the passage of some other measure to mutually assist each other in the passage of both combined under one head; and it is intended to prevent another difficulty, which often arises when only a part of the character of the bill is expressed in the title.

Mr. BORDEN. I will remark, sir, that I should have proposed such an amendment myself if the gentleman had not done it. I come here instructed in regard to this matter. I am glad the gentleman has proposed it. We have, sir, a precedent for such a provision. I have in my hand the Constitution of California which contains this provision, "Every law shall contain but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." I suppose the object of it is to prevent the practice of log-rolling, as it has been termed by the Legislature. I am satisfied that the correct course is to adopt the provision. Almost every State Convention that has been called for the purpose of revising their Constitution, has inserted a provision of this kind.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Gentlemen will find that the operation of such a provision will be to embarrass the Legislature exceedingly. I very much doubt the propriety of passing it. I am willing that the contents of every special law should be specified in the title; but I think it will be almost impossible, if we generalize the laws, to express their contents in the title, unless you duplicate the laws. I think it will lead to much practical difficulty.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe said, he doubted very much the propriety of adopting this amendment. He thought it would be difficult to carry it into effect.

Now if it should happen that two or more subjects are embraced in a bill, the whole law would have to be pronounced unconstitutional, and I think it will be found very difficult to confine every bill to one specific object. There must be a variety of things embraced in a bill. There are occasions upon which there must be compromises made. The people of the different sections of the country cannot think precisely alike. Their interests are different, and their views are different; you must arrange your measures so that there may be a majority to act upon them. It is impossible that the government can be conducted upon any other plan. I am not in favor of omnibus bills. But you have seen what has been necessary to be done in Congress, and so it will be in your Legislature.

It will be necessary to make compromises in order to reconcile conflicting interests.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. The provision that we are now about to act upon is one of considerable importance. Gentlemen will recollect that this question has been very elaborately debated. It occupied some five months of the last session of Congress—the object being to ascertain the proper mode of saving the Union. It was contended by Mr. Clay and others that the only possible way in which the Union could be saved was to pass a number of bills together. Mr. Benton and other gentlemen opposed this course, and contended that the Union could not be saved in that way. The measures originally proposed were subsequently passed in connection with each other, although not in one bill, and the Union has been saved. I think the provision now proposed ought to be adopted.

Mr. RITCHEY. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam will prevail. I can see no difficulty that is likely to grow out of its practical operation. It is said by some gentlemen who oppose the amendment, that if we classify the laws it will be impossible to comply with this provision. I can see no difficulty in the operation of the rule. If we have a bill passed classifying the subjects, we can have a general head for each particular class of subjects. Suppose the Legislature pass a bill upon the subject of incorporating railroad companies, it will be very easy to class them all under one head.

Mr. READ of Monroe said, he wished to assure the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Stevenson) how cordially he was with him in the present proposition. That gentleman is now on the high road of reform.

If there had been a single reform principle introduced into the lately made Constitutions, this of requiring a majority of all the members to pass a law, is one of the most valuable in preventing irresponsible legislation. When the ayes and noes are required to be entered upon the journals for the passage of every bill, and when a majority of all the members must give their assent thereto before it can become a law, there will be safe and careful legislation. When there must be a majority to pass all laws bolting and other means of escaping responsibility will be prevented. Every member will be obliged to act and to show how he acted. It is the only effective way of keeping full houses.

Mr. BRIGHT. The title of a bill is no part of the law. An act will have its full force and effect without any title whatever. The title is the last thing generally that is thought of. One objection which I have to the amendment is, that many subjects are sometimes necessarily embraced in one object. We cannot specify the various subjects that will necessarily be connected in any given object. All the difficulties which have been suggested by gentlemen will be overcome, it appears to me, by requiring the passage of the bill by yeas and nays. If we adopt that system representatives will be more careful in attending to the reading of bills, and more careful in voting upon their provisions, than has heretofore been the case. The evil of careless legislation will, I doubt not, be overcome by the provision to which I have referred. I think it will be a more effectual remedy than that proposed by the gentleman from Putnam. Who is to decide whether a law embraces two or more objects?

A MEMBER. "The courts will decide."

Mr. BRIGHT. Then the validity of every act will depend upon that which is no part of the act. It will depend upon the title which is appended to the act, not upon the act itself. I think we had better leave this matter as it has heretofore been. Leave it to the Legislature to embrace as many subjects or objects as they please, taking care, however, that those subjects shall be duly considered, and that they shall not be adopted without the yeas and nays being recorded. That I think will be a sufficient remedy for all the evils that are apprehended.

Mr. DOBSON. I think the gentleman from Jefferson, although generally right, is wrong in regard to this matter. The bill and the title should correspond.

Mr. BRIGHT. The title is no part of the bill.

Mr. DOBSON. The title of a bill should be clear and explicit. But under the system of log-rolling, which prevails in the Legislature, it has become, in fact, like a nick name, conveying no true idea of what it purports to indicate. It is no indication of what the contents of the law are. I hold that the title of a bill ought to be correct; that a law should not sail under false colors. It is a duty we owe to the people that every law that is passed should be expressed in plain and simple language, in order that the people may understand it; and it should have its proper title—like a finger-board—so that the people may know where it leads to; or like a sign, so that a man may know its object. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam will be adopted.

Mr. READ of Clark. I am in favor of the amendment. I think that much evil has grown out of legislation under our former rule upon this subject. One word in reply to the gentleman from Jefferson. He says that the title of a law is not the law itself. That we all admit, although my friend over the way says it is a kind of a sign-post. I will ask the gentleman from Jefferson this question: Suppose you adopt the amendment which provides that a bill shall contain but one subject, and suppose that a bill shall be passed containing two subjects, will not that bill be unconstitutional? Look at your statute book and you will find many bills, the titles of which run thus; A bill for the relief of Richard Roe, and for other purposes. Well, sir, the "other purposes" may be the establishment of a railroad or a canal. I think we ought to remedy this in some way. Common sense dictates that the title of a bill should express precisely and distinctly what follows in the sections of the bill. I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. HALL. The abuses practiced under our present system of legislation, by incorporating various measures in one bill, is a subject which the people have taken under their consideration; and among other resolutions that have been adopted by them in reference to it, is this one: that special legislation should be prohibited in the State Legislature—that no act should embrace more than one object, and that that object should be expressed in the title—that upon the final passage of every bill in either House the yeas and nays should be entered upon the journal. The provision which requires that no act should embrace more than one subject and that that shall be expressed in the title, I think is one which ought to be adopted by the Convention. And I am in favor, therefore, of the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam.

Mr. OWEN. I am in favor of the amendment. Gentlemen say that nothing is to be effected by it. It will, without doubt, prevent incongruous subjects being grouped together in the same bill. Of this I remember a remarkable example, that came under my own knowledge, while a member of the State Legislature. There was a bill introduced by a member, whose name it is not necessary to mention. The title of the bill was to appropriate a portion of the three per cent. fund, coming to a certain county, "and for other purposes." It was read a first and second time, by its title, as a local bill: on its third reading, some member asked for the reading of the "other purposes;" and it came out that the last section contained a provision divorcing a man from his wife. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. I have heard much complaint—and there is undoubtedly some ground for the complaint—as to the manner in which legislation has sometimes been conducted in this State. I have a distinct recollection of a case somewhat similar to that referred to by the gentleman from Posey, where a section was inserted in a bill, otherwise unobjectionable, appropriating the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars for a private and local purpose. The bill had a general title, to which was added the words, "and for other purposes." The bill passed both branches of the Legislature, most probably without having been read through in either. It was discovered by the vigilance of Governor Noble, and sent back to the House in which it originated with his veto. On the question of its passage a second time it received but the single vote of the member by whom it was introduced. This and other cases to which reference might be made, shows the necessity of some measure to prevent their recurrence. The object of the gentleman from Putnam is, therefore, in my judgment, correct and laudable, but I would suggest whether it would not be better to say that the objects, instead of the object, of a bill should be set forth in the title. It may be convenient and proper sometimes to embrace two or more objects or subjects in the same bill. There can be no objection to doing so if the title shall be so worded as to set forth all the purposes of the bill. The intention of the gentleman, no doubt, is to prevent the insertion of provisions not at all indicated by the title of the bill. The intention, as I said before, is a good one, and I think should be carried out; but that can be done without circumscribing the Legislature so that they shall be compelled to embrace but a single object in a bill. If deception be prevented, that is all that the gentleman has in contemplation, and I should think that might be accomplished by requiring that the objects or subjects of a bill shall be clearly defined in the title.

Mr. NAVE. There is one question that has not yet been introduced into the argument. It is this: If we declare in the organic law that every law passed by the Legislature of Indiana, shall embrace but one subject, and that subject shall be expressed by its title, and if the Legislature should in some act, introduce two subjects, would not that be a violation of the Constitution?—and if a violation of the Constitution will it not entail a curse upon the country in lieu of a blessing? It will be a question for the courts to determine whether more than one subject is included in any one act, and if more than one, it will be unconstitutional, and therefore a nullity.

Mr. GIBSON. I move to amend by striking out the word "object," and inserting the word "subject;" and I will remark that it makes a very material difference. I will venture to say that if the word "object" be retained, there will not be a law passed within a dozen years, that will be constitutional.

Mr. READ of Clark. I presume the gentleman from Putnam will accept the proposed amendment as a modification.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I think we had better vote down this proposition, for it is one that will cost us a good deal of trouble. Instead of restricting bills to one subject, you will have to branch off into collateral subjects. If you turn to the revised code, you will find an epitome of every act set forth between the title and the body of the act. If this be done, there can be no deception. But for fear the law might be unconstitutional, I would duplicate it: call one the title and the other the law. This will prevent all mistakes.

The question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam, the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. GIBSON. This is an important matter, and I think we ought not to act upon it hastily. I move that it be postponed until Monday next.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam; and they are—yeas 105, nays 21—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Tood, Trimby, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—105.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Blythe, Bright, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Conduit, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Howe, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Spann, Taylor, and Walpole—21.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then being on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved to amend by providing that if any subject is embraced in a law, and not expressed in the title, the law shall only be void so far as such provision is concerned.

I desire to say a few words in explanation of this amendment. Gentlemen, in endeavoring to avoid one difficulty, sometimes run very naturally into another. How easy would it be for a person opposed to the passage of an act, to defeat it, by heaping up provisions, and accumulating amendments. My object is that, where the provisions embraced in a law are not expressed in the title, such provision shall be void; but the fact of its being in the law shall not render void the whole act.

The question being taken, the amendment was, upon a division—ayes 55, noes not counted—agreed to.

Mr. RARIDEN. I would like to hear the section read.

The Secretary read the section as amended.

Mr. RARIDEN. I want to strike out the latter part. The words, "it shall be expressed in the bill," is sufficient. It is not to be supposed that a legislative body will be acting fraudulently all the time. It is proper that the title should fairly indicate the substance of the law—that it should be an index to its contents. But I do not see the propriety of the latter clause of this section: that so much of the law, as is not fully expressed in the title, shall be void. I move to strike out the latter part of the section.

The PRESIDENT. It has just been inserted.

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, let it go; I will not fight about it.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BORDEN. When the proposition of the gentlemen from Posey, in regard to the rights of married women, was up some days ago, I voted in favor of its adoption. In accordance with the request of several friends, I have consented to move to re-consider the vote that was taken on its passage; and I will observe, on making the motion, that I do not make it because I am opposed to the principle of the section as it stands. On the contrary, I am in favor of it. But some gentlemen are apprehensive, that, if that section be allowed to stand, it will create opposition to the Constitution. For the purpose, then, of enabling the friends of the section to perfect it, and to give its opponents an opportunity to set forth their objections, I now submit the motion to re-consider.

Mr. RARIDEN. Is the motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, sir, I am not going to make a speech on the subject. I have thought of it, however, very seriously, and of its effects, and have endeavored to prepare an amendment, the object of which is to carry out practically all that is contemplated, as I suppose, covertly, in the article itself. I have prepared a section very carefully; and in order that every gentleman may see what will be the practical results of such a provision—for whatever may be done for the benefit of married women, ought to be done in the right way to carry out the purpose of the Convention—I will read it; and it will answer for the speech I might make.

The object is to carry out the idea of separate property between husband and wife. The object is to put them upon a perfect equality as regards the property and personal rights that they may possess at the time of the marriage, or that they may acquire thereafter:

If the wife is to have a separate property and a separate existence, it is proper that she should be armed with all the artillery of the law to protect her in the enjoyment of that property, and the maintenance of her rights over it. The courts of justice must be kept open for the protection of her separate rights. She must be allowed to maintain an action for wrongs or trespasses committed upon her person or property by her husband or others, and this remedy in her own name. You will see that it is the object of the first provision to give her the right to banish the husband from all participation in her property, so that if any usurpation be attempted on his part, she shall have the right to have set apart for her use half of what the husband may be seized of—or any other person for him—excluding, however, what he may hold by way of advancement from his relatives. It is proper to possess the wife of every legal means of redressing wrongs committed upon her by her husband or others. I have read this to show the length it will reach. It will require a great deal of legislation to carry out the rights that will be vested in women, and to protect her in the enjoyment thereof. I dislike the idea of placing it in the Constitution. I will go any length with the gentleman to amend and perfect the law of descents; but a provision which dissevers the sacredness of the marriage relation, I never can consent shall be introduced into the organic law, and make man and wife mere partners in business, in no way bound for each other, or to each other, as the proposition contemplates them.

Mr. NILES. I rise, sir, not to make any remarks upon the main question, but merely to suggest the propriety of postponing this motion to some day certain. The Convention is now earnestly engaged in going through with the sections upon the legislative department; and I am convinced that were this motion to be taken up to-day, debate would not be tolerated. I regard the section relating to the rights of married women, which it is now proposed to re-consider, as of more overruling importance than any other section upon which we shall be called to act. On looking into the proceedings of the New York Constitutional Convention, I see that a proposition of a similar character was at first adopted, but it was subsequently re-considered and rejected. I can but express my earnest hope that this motion may be taken up under such circumstances, that the Convention will be in a mood to listen to some of the reasons which I think may be urged against the section. I therefore propose that it be postponed until, say, Monday week.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "Next Monday."

Mr. NILES. I move, then, that it be postponed until next Monday.

The question being taken upon the motion to postpone, it was, upon a division—yeas 56, nays 48—decided in the affirmative.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the orders of the day.

The question being on the seventeenth section of the report of the committee on the legislative department,

The section was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"Every bill shall be read on three different days in each House, unless, in case of emergency, two-thirds of the House where such bill may be depending, by a vote of yeas and nays, shall deem it expedient to dispense with this rule; and the vote on the final passage of every bill shall be taken by yeas and nays, and entered on the journal. Every bill having passed both Houses, shall be signed by the President and Speaker of both Houses."

Mr. DAVIS of Madison. I move to amend the section by inserting after the word "House," in the eighty-third line, the following:

"And before the second reading of any bill, the same shall be printed, and a copy thereof laid upon the desk of each member."

My object in presenting this amendment is simply that the hasty and inconsiderate legislation, which has heretofore characterized this State, should be arrested. The first step taken in order to prevent hasty legislation is, that each bill should be read on three different days, and that the yeas and nays shall be taken on its final passage. Now, unless members have the bill before them, they may be completely in the dark as to its provisions. It is impossible that any man of ordinary capacity can understand the provisions of many bills by merely hearing them read; and we all know, that, in their progress, they may be so altered and amended as entirely to change their character. This Convention, at the very commencement of its deliberations, found the necessity of having each proposed alteration of the old Constitution printed and laid upon the table of each member; and I apprehend that the same rule ought to be observed in the Legislature, especially when we remember that all future legislation is to be of a general character.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I have a substitute for that section, which includes the proposition of the gentleman from Madison, (Mr. Davis,) and which I hope will receive the consideration of the Convention. I desire that it may be read.

The substitute proposed by Mr. C. was read, as follows:

Sec. —. Every bill shall be read at least once in each House; and free discussion allowed thereon. Any bill shall be printed for information, whenever required by one-third of the members of either House; but the vote on the final passage shall not be taken until the third day after the introduction of any bill. None of the foregoing rules shall be suspended, unless, in case of emergency, two-thirds of either House shall deem such suspension necessary; and all votes upon such suspension shall be taken by yeas and noes and recorded.

The vote on the final passage of every bill shall be taken by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the journal; and it shall require the votes of a majority of all the members elect of either House to pass any bill. Every bill having passed both Houses, shall be signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House.

This substitute, which I propose in lieu of that reported from the committee, I regard as involving a matter of great practical moment. I trust, if the Convention is not now ready to adopt it, that the subject will be laid upon the table, until the substitute can be printed for the better information of members. I have no personal interest in this subject, beyond that of any other citizen, but it is one upon which I have heretofore bestowed much reflection, and I must be permitted to say, that I cannot but believe, if the rules which I propose are approved and adopted, they will prevent much of that objectionable legislation, which has induced a majority of the people of the State to pronounce in favor of biennial sessions of the General Assembly, instead of annual.

I will not go over that ground now, sir. I alluded to it at an early period of the session of this body, when the question of the reduction of representation was under consideration. I will only repeat, that whether your sessions are biennial or annual, or whether your representation be liberal or restricted in numbers, you will find such changes of far less consequence, as remedial to bad legislation, than proper constitutional rules, founded on the results of experience and progressive improvement.

We all know, from our experience in this body, that the old rule, requiring that a bill shall have three separate readings on three several days, is of but little real use, inasmuch as it is almost impossible for us fully to comprehend all the bearings of a single section, or proposed amendment of a few lines, except after repeated and careful readings; while, at the same time, we have the printed original before us. How much more difficult must it be to arrive at a correct understanding of a bill of many sections? Without printing, a member must either be guided by the representations of members interested in the passage of a bill, or he must resort to the Clerk's desk and investigate it, if he can get the chance, for himself.

The old rule has long been obsolete, and was omitted in the New York Constitution four years ago. For many years it has been practically discarded by most of the State Legislatures and by Congress. It originated in Parliament, probably long before the introduction of printing, and at a period when a majority of members could neither read nor write, and were obliged to depend on the reading by clerks for information. No man would think of competing with the magnetic telegraph by a horse-back express; and as little should we endeavor to enforce this old parliamentary rule imperatively, now, that it is comparatively useless, and when better ones are presented.

The amendment proposed to the old rule, by the committee, is, that it shall require a two-thirds vote by ayes and noes, in order to suspend its operation. That would only add to the evil, and make the old rule the more obnoxious. Universal usage, in every legislature, for many years, has proved its inefficiency, and that is the great reason why it has generally been suspended by common consent. My position is, that we should adopt more efficient and practical rules, and such as are worth enforcing. None others are worthy of a place in the Constitution.

My proposition requires that a bill shall be read in full at least once, and free discussion allowed thereon. This does not preclude as many more readings as the body may require and direct. Secondly, that, if it should be desired, I give to one-third of the members the right to require the printing of a bill for full information and investigation. Thirdly, I propose that no bill shall be passed until the third day after its introduction, and I thus retain the time for deliberation which it was doubtless the original intention of the old rule to secure.

These rules need seldom or ever be suspended; but in case of emergency, they may be suspended by a two-thirds vote, by ayes and noes. The cost of printing may possibly alarm a certain kind of gentlemen, but I am sure that dispensing with the mere useless formality of three full readings by the Clerk, will save time enough to pay for the printing at five times its present cost, and will be far the best economy in every point of view.

In addition to the rules above recited, I add two others, not liable to suspension in any case: the one requiring a majority of all the members elect to pass a bill; and the other that all such votes shall be by ayes and noes, and recorded. These are of paramount importance in my opinion, and of far greater utility in abating hasty and bad legislation, than even a division of your legislative body into two Houses—much greater than the supposed remedy of biennial sessions and a reduced representation, which only detract from the power to legislate, while they insure no reform whatever.

I believe the desire of the people to be to reform and not to destroy the legislative body, and to that end I present the result of my reflections in the substitute which I offer, and ask for it the consideration of the Convention.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, he thought that both of the propositions of the gentlemen who were last up had merit in them, but he thought it was hardly proper that the Convention should lay down rules for the government of the legislative body. He would hardly think that the Convention would say that the legislative body should have bills printed, if they themselves did not want to have them printed. If they desired to have any bill printed, they had both the power and the right to order its printing, and why, therefore, the necessity of making such a provision in the organic law? He thought that there was sufficient in the section as it stood to prevent hasty legislation, and that there was no necessity for the proposition either of his friend in front of him (Mr. Davis) or of his friend from Marion (Mr. Chapman).

Mr. THORNTON said that he had had some experience in legislation, and if there was one thing that he deprecated more than another it was that of hasty legislation. He was disposed to favor the proposition of his friend over the way, (Mr. Davis,) which, he understood, required that all bills should be printed prior to their last reading. He had prepared an amendment to meet that difficulty, because he was fully satisfied that it was impossible for the Legislature fully to understand a bill comprising several sections without having an opportunity carefully to read it. This was fully proved by the experience of the Convention. Many of the reports from the various committees had been so radically amended that it not unfrequently happened that the Convention did not vote understandingly. He thought, therefore, that the bills as prepared for a third reading should be printed; at least that the rule proposed by his friend from Marion (Mr. Chapman) should be adopted. He would go for the printing of all bills, because seeing that legislation for the future was to be of a general character, the bills would not be so numerous, and they would unquestionably embrace more important subjects than much of the legislation that had hitherto characterized the State. He understood that it was the purpose of the Convention to repudiate everything like local legislation; and, therefore, no subject could be brought to the consideration of the Legislature except that which would affect the interest of the State in general. It would, therefore, be a matter of great convenience when legislators were called upon to give a vote which was to be indicated by yeas and nays, that they should have the bills before them. Under the present arrangement they had to sit and listen, and if their hearing was not very accurate they would often vote in the dark. He would tell what happened in the Legislature some years ago. In the year 1835 a gentleman proposed a bill for the purpose of appropriating a part of the three per cent. fund of Vermillion county. That was the title of the bill; but it was afterwards amended by the addition of the words "and for other purposes." He (Mr. Thornton) went to the clerk's table and undertook to read the bill, when a loud call was made that it should be read by its title. The bill passed through both Houses, and nothing arrested the mischief but the veto of Governor Noble. And what did they suppose was in that bill? Why it appropriated seventy-five thousand dollars of the money of the State instead of the three per cent. fund. I will not name the member who attempted to perpetrate this fraud, but an attempt was made to expel him, and he doubtless would have been expelled had there been a quorum present when the motion was made. Viewing, therefore, the necessity of being acquainted with the provisions of bills before being called upon to vote upon them, he felt disposed to favor the proposition of the gentleman from Madison (Mr. Davis;) but he thought the proposition of the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Chapman) was still better, and ought to be adopted by the Convention, as he was clearly of opinion that it was calculated to prevent many of the evils of hasty and inconsiderate legislation.

Mr. READ of Clark. Notwithstanding the argument of the gentleman from Marion, I cannot vote for this amendment. I know that we have too much hasty legislation—too much legislation at any rate; but if you print every bill that may be introduced you will have an enormous printer's bill to pay for very little purpose. It is well known that not one-tenth of the bills that are introduced are ever passed; and that they sometimes come in in such an extensive shape as to embrace from one to two hundred sections, costing the State some two or three hundred dollars each to print them, and then but few of them are adopted.

I am in favor of having every bill upon its third reading read by sections, but I cannot vote for the printing of every bill, because it would incur an enormous expense to the State.

Mr. WALPOLE. It is objected to the proposition of the gentleman from Madison that the printing of all bills would greatly augment the expenses of the Legislature. The section under consideration contemplates three several readings of a bill. When a bill is introduced, if it be of such a character as ought not to be considered, it is objected to and laid upon the table; but if it should pass to a second reading, the House determining that they will entertain the proposition, is it not proper that one-third of the body, if they should desire it, should have the bill printed so as to enable them better to understand it? The gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read) made a strong argument if our legislation were going to remain as it was under the Constitution of 1816. But according to all that we can now see there is to be no special legislation—every thing is to be of a general character. There will be no acts of incorporation for rail roads here, or rail roads there, or plank roads in this place, and canals in that. Legislation is all to be general. This being the case, why should we not have symmetry and congruity in the acts of the Legislature of Indiana? And how can you have it unless each bill is printed and laid upon the tables of members, so that they may have an opportunity of reflecting upon its provisions. The great difficulty in construing statutes in our courts is owing to their incongruities; and that arises from the fact that bills are not printed and arranged in their proper order. Now there is no doubt that we will adopt a provision in the Constitution that there shall be no special legislation. It is all to be of a general character, and if one-third of the members of the Legislature should desire that a bill should be printed, why not have it printed? The gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) says that if a majority of the members desire to have a bill printed they can so order it; but the object of this provision is to protect the minority in order that they may not be led into error. Now, sir, let any gentleman ask himself the question, what condition would we have been in to-day if none of these reported articles had been printed? Could they have told from the reading what are the exact provisions even of the section now under consideration? Most certainly not. All that they could rely upon would be their verbal recollection. So it is. Here is a bill read. One gentleman at his desk imagines that it means one thing, another that it means another, and relying only upon their recollection of its verbal phraseology they must make endless mistakes as to its meaning. Now, in legislation, a mistake of this kind may be fatal to the best interests of the community, and ought to be avoided if there be any means by which it can be avoided. I think the proposition would tend much to prevent these mistakes.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. Davis, it was rejected.

Mr. PETTIT. I believe it is in order to move to amend the original section. I move to amend in the eighty-third line by inserting after the word "bill" the words "or joint resolution."

The amendment was adopted by consent.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson moved to amend the section by inserting in the eighty-third line, after the word "read," the words "throughout by sections."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN proposed to amend the section by inserting after the word "journal," in the eighty-seventh line, the words "and a majority of all the members elected to each House shall be necessary to pass every bill."

Mr. KELSO moved to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered and taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger,

Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bowers, Bright, Butler, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Harbolt, Helm, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, Mather, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Mow-rer, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Snook, Spann, Tannehill, Taylor, Walpole, Watts,
Yocum, and Zenor—58.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Berry, Borden,
Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Carter,
Chandler, Chapman, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Farrow, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Shaannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley,
Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague,
Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wallace,
Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—69.

So the amendment was not laid upon the table.

Mr. KELSO. The question will now be upon the amendment. Now I simply ask the attention of the Convention while I say this much before the vote is taken. In a House of Representatives consisting of a hundred members, it is not extravagant to suppose that five might, at almost any time, be absent from the House. Then upon a close vote upon an important bill—no matter how important or how urgent the necessity for its being passed—you completely prevent its passage by this provision and block the wheels of legislation. Now if two-thirds of the popular body may proceed as a quorum to do business, why will you, by such a provision as this, prevent them from doing a single thing? There is no necessity for it, because when a majority of the members forming a constitutional quorum have agreed that a bill should pass, why ought it not to be a law?
With a provision of this kind, a few members might, at any time, by absenting themselves, defeat an important bill without incurring the charge of voting against it. We have practiced upon the principle of a majority governing for thirty-four years, without a single instance of inconvenience, and I see no reason why we may not continue to do so. Sir, if this provision is ingrafted upon the new Constitution I think it will be one of the very worst that can be adopted.

Mr. RITCHEY. The gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) says that if we pass this amendment we will in certain cases stop legislation. That is the very thing that I desire to effect. I hold that if a measure cannot command the votes of fifty members of the Legislature, it ought not to be imposed upon the people of the State. I believe that the people have a right to demand that a majority of those sent to represent their interests should give their sanction to every thing that is to become law.

I hold this to be one of the most important reforms that has yet been presented to our consideration; and I would as soon see any other measure fail as that this should fail. And, sir, I would even go further, and say that I do not think the Convention will act wisely in adopting any proposition which will not command a majority of the one hundred and fifty delegates on this floor. I hope the amendment will prevail, for I do regard it as embracing one of the most important principles that has yet been presented to our consideration.

Mr. KELSO. It is well known to every gentleman here that one-fourth, and perhaps one-third, of all the most important amendments that have been made to the Constitution, have been adopted by less than seventy-five votes.
And is there anything wrong in that? It is impossible to expect it. In a body of a hundred men it is impossible that they can always all be present, or that a majority of the whole number can always be of one mind on an important measure. Nor is it reasonable to require that fifty members should vote for any measure when you permit two-thirds to form a constitutional quorum. We have said that two-thirds of the number shall form a constitutional quorum to do business. Now what business are they to do if they are not to make laws? Are they to come here from day to day and wait for the absent members? Is that doing business? Perhaps half a dozen of them may be sick and unable to come. Now I hold that what we mean by "doing business" is the ordinary legislation of the country; and if two-thirds of each House may form a constitutional quorum to do business, why make it necessary that fifty-one in the House and twenty-six in the Senate should vote for a measure before it can pass? There is no necessity for such a provision whatever that I can see. It is only calculated to retard legislation, and create great additional expense and trouble without any corresponding good. For that reason I hope it will not be passed. I shall ask the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. READ of Clark. The argument of the gentleman from Switzerland strikes me as having a great deal of force in it. I think this proposition would result in much delay and expense. One great object to which our attention ought to be directed, is to guard the finances of the State. In order to do that, I will offer the following amendment to the amendment: "Provided, that any bill or joint resolution for the appropriation of money, or creating any debt against the State, or for the payment of money in any way whatever, shall not pass unless such bill or resolution shall be voted for by a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the Legislature, and said vote shall be spread upon the journals of each House."

Mr. BORDEN. The gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) has remarked that a great portion of the measures which have been passed upon by the Convention, have passed by a less number of votes than a majority of the whole body. That gentleman should remember, however, that the Constitution has to be passed upon by the people before it becomes the organic law, and I take it for granted, that any measure which does not receive fifty votes out of a hundred ought not to pass. I believe that in all the States in which they have revised their Constitutions, during the last five or six years, they have adopted a provision of this kind.

Mr. HOVEY. I wish to make a single remark in connection with those made by the gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Borden). Any law that cannot receive more than one-half the votes of the Senate, must be of doubtful policy and should not be adopted.

If the members of the Senate and House of Representatives should absent themselves, both those bodies have full power to compel their attendance and if any law should be demanded by the people, that power would assuredly be exercised. I shall, therefore, vote for the amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. The gentleman who last addressed the Convention, thinks that if a measure is not of sufficient importance to elicit a vote of the majority of all the members elected, it ought not to pass. Now, if the gentleman from Posey will reflect for a moment, he will find that the most important measures we have passed upon in this body, have been passed by less than a majority of all the members. If this amendment is adopted, we shall be placing the representatives of the people in leading strings, so that they cannot do what the people sent them to do. It is well-known that it is almost impracticable to have a full house upon any measure that is passed. Have we been full here all the time? Are we full now? Why, sir, there has scarcely a single vote been taken when the whole number of members has been present. Now, suppose that four or five members should be suddenly taken sick, when any great measure was under consideration, this provision would completely tie up the hands of the Legislature. Men who are in favor of a proposition are as liable to be taken sick as those who are against it; and by adopting this rule you would virtually, in many instances, make a man vote against his own proposition. Sir, if you require fifty-one men to pass any measure, you may rely upon it, that you will never see any measure of importance passed. There would be absentees enough—some from necessity and others from choice—to prevent it. Besides, this is giving too much power to the members of the Legislature themselves, for they can at any time give a kind of half opposition to any measure, by merely stopping in the lobby while the vote is being taken. This would be a hard rule, and one which I think would work badly. If the Convention should think otherwise, of course I must submit; but I think the rule would be both unwise and improper.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. Without meaning to impute a want of perception on the part of other gentlemen, or, without claiming for myself any acuteness which is not common to all mankind, it does strike me that gentlemen who are opposed to this amendment are laboring under a delusion. What is the proposition? Plainly that a majority of the representatives elected by the people, and paid to come here and attend to and transact their business, should be required to pass a law which is to be binding upon them, and which is to affect their interests. Fifty-one, out of the number of one hundred men in one house, are required to sanction by their votes the passage of a bill, and twenty-six in the other house. What is the proposition on the other side? Why, sir, that thirty-four men in one House, consisting of a hundred members, may pass a bill, which seventeen members of another House, composed of fifty persons, may sanction. And thus, Mr. President, here are fifty-one persons out of one hundred and fifty, authorized to pass any and all laws, however important. Sir, we are to pay a hundred and fifty men to come here and attend to our business, and fifty-one of them may do it, leaving the ninety-nine to do as they please. If such a such a proposition is not absurd in the estimation of other gentlemen, I can assure them it appears to me to be peculiarly so.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I have only a word or two to say in reference to this matter. In the first place we say that two thirds of the House of Representatives shall form a quorum to do business. Two thirds of a hundred men will be sixty-seven. In the next place, by this amendment, if it is passed, we say that fifty-one men out of the sixty-seven, shall be required to pass any proposition. Does not every gentleman see that there is an absurdity here? How often do you get a full House? This is the ninth session that I have had the honor of serving the people of my country at this Capital, and I do not believe that at any time, on a call for the yeas and nays, has there been a full House. Now what is to be the result of this? You say that fifty-one members shall be required to pass any measure, and as that will rarely, if ever, happen, you simply require the Legislature to come here and spend the people's money in doing nothing but talking. And yet gentlemen call this democracy! If this be democracy, God deliver me from such democracy! If you say that sixty-seven shall form a quorum, why then let them go on and do business. On the other hand if you require a majority of the whole body to pass a law, you may as well tie up the hands of the Legislature at once, and say that it shall require a unanimous vote of three-fifths of the Legislature to pass any law. What is the use of saying that you will have sixty-seven for a quorum, and yet say that you will require fifty-one to pass any measure? If that is your democracy, I have nothing to do with it.

Mr. NEWMAN gave notice that on to-morrow he would move that no measure should pass the Convention which did not receive the sanction of a majority of the whole body. The formation of a Constitution which was to be the basis of future legislation he regarded as a matter of much more importance than the passage of any measure which might be brought before a Legislature, and if it was right and proper that a majority of all the members elected to the Legislature should vote for a measure, it was unquestionably more right that all the members of that body should vote upon any proposition that might be brought before it, and which, if adopted, was to become the supreme law of the land for all time to come.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I dissent from the argument of the gentleman from Wayne. I am perfectly willing to require that it should take a majority of all the members elected, to pass the Constitution when it is completed, and I know that it will get it. But we are here now for the purpose settling the rules which are to govern the Legislature for a long time to come. We are endeavoring to fix these rules so plainly, definitely, and honestly, that under them every man will understand what is right in the community, and that the people shall be protected from anything and everything like corruption. Now I hold the argument of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper) as a good one, and it might have been carried further. Suppose, for instance, that a banking company comes to the Legislature and wants a charter. They know that there are twenty-five votes in the Senate that they can rely upon, but these twenty-five would not give them a majority. All that they have then to do, is to procure the absence of one member, and they can then do everything they desire to do.

Again, take the argument of the gentleman from Dubois. He says that we will virtually tie up the hands of the Legislature, and stop the wheels of government, unless we permit a majority of a quorum to act. If we permit them to act, we do so that they may begin incipiently—that they may start the business. They can go on and pass bills to a third reading in every instance. There are doubtless a great many gentlemen who might find it very convenient to serve the people in the halls of legislation until they have passed one or two bills, in which they are interested, and then go home and leave the rest of the business to be transacted by those who choose to remain behind; and thus while they are absent, a great measure may come up, and the people may be swindled by a dereliction of duty on the part of those who ought to do the work. I hold that this proposition is strictly democratic, and that to require a mere majority of a quorum to pass laws, is approaching too much to the one-man power.

Mr. ———. I move to postpone indefinitely the amendment under consideration.

Mr. READ of Clarke. I am opposed to the motion to postpone the subject indefinitely. The amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn provides that no bill shall pass except by the sanction of a majority of all the members elected to both branches of the Legislature. My amendment is that no bill appropriating money shall be passed without a clear majority of all the members elected; and I think, if that provision were adopted it would be sufficient.

Mr. NAVE. I have heard several objections urged to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, none of which, however, have struck my mind with that degree of force which seems to have impressed the minds of other gentlemen. The object of having representatives is that the wishes and interests of the people may be attended to. And if a hundred men are necessary to represent the various interests of the State, is it not important that before any law is entailed upon the people by these men that at least a majority of them, should vote in favor of the passage of such a law? It seems to me that nothing in the world can be more reasonable. If a majority of the hundred men do not vote in favor of any law, it is evidence that the people's representatives are not in favor of it, and that it ought not, therefore, to be imposed upon the community. Sir, if you authorize a hundred and fifty men, assembling in your Capitol to make laws for your State, and then determine that a majority of a quorum of each House may pass the laws, you put it in the power of the minority to rule, which in my opinion is anti-democratic; because, I hold that in every community the majority ought to make the laws.

Sir, as has already been said, under the present proposed provision, that a quorum shall be enough to transact business in each House, seventeen Senators could pass a law in that branch of the Legislature and thirty-four in the other, making a less number than I think could ever be designed by the framers of the Constitution, to pass laws for the government of the people; and for one I am opposed to any less number than fifty-one in the one House and twenty-six in the other, ever having the power to pass laws by which I or my constituents are to be governed. Gentlemen say that members want to go and attend to other business, and that they cannot always attend to the business of legislation. Why, sir, the very object of this amendment is to keep them from attending to other business. If they cannot afford to attend to the business of the people for the compensation of three dollars per day, but must practice law in the supreme and district courts, why, then, let others attend to the people's business who are willing to do so. [Applause.]

Sir, I say that men ought to come here and do that for which the people sent them here; and if they will attend to the people's business as they ought to do, you will not see them passing laws one year, which they are obliged to repeal in the next, but your Legislation will be of a fixed and permanent character, while at the same time it will be such as to suit the desires of those for whom it is made. [Applause.]

Mr. TAGUE expressed himself in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

Mr. KELSO rose to reply to a remark of the gentleman from Hendricks, (Mr. Nave,) who seemed to be much affected at the idea of any one being a legislator, who was competent to obtain a practice in the supreme or district courts. Now if this doctrine were carried out to its legitimate extent, and none were sent here as legislators except those who had not capacity enough for such practice, why, their legislation, he thought, would be of a poor character. He maintained that the people would choose the best materials which they could get, of which to compose their Legislature; and he would ask, whether, if a man offered himself as a candidate, who happened to have brains enough to attend to other business besides that of legislation, the people should not have the right to choose him? He thought that they might do so without being obnoxious to the charge of acting inconsistently with their own interests. It did not follow as a matter of course that because a man could not get any other kind of business under heaven, he should therefore go into the Legislature. In regard to the amendment, he could not agree with it, for he believed it to be entirely useless.

Mr. BRACKEN. I have not been very troublesome to the Convention in the way of speech making, but I feel that I ought to say a few words upon this question. The notion which I have of a democratic government is a government in which the majority rules, and even in a whig government too. That I understand to be the essence of the doctrine of both of the great parties. If that is so, and we send a hundred men to legislate in the lower branch of the Legislature, fifty-one of that hundred will be a majority; and if it requires a hundred men to legislate upon any matter involving the interests of the State, it appears to me, as a matter of common sense, that fifty-one measure. One gentleman thinks it strange that gentlemen should advocate the principle that if a man has not brains enough to obtain a practice in the Supreme Court, that he ought to be sent to represent the people in the Legislature; but we advocate the principle that if a man receives the pay for doing the people's work, he ought to come here and do it, and not be receiving pay for neglecting the interests of his constituents. If the people are mistaken about the honesty of a man, and they find that he will not do their work, let the matter be known; so that they may judge of how to serve him on the next occasion that he offers himself as a candidate for office.

Now, Sir, if there be any one principle that is settled in regard to our legislation, it is that a majority should rule. But, if we take a mere majority of a quorum, then in the lower House thirty-five members may pass a law, and eighteen in the Senate, and thus you would have legislation done by little more than one-third of all the members elected. With such a provision gentlemen could always be induced to dodge a measure, so as to prevent its passage. But let it once be known that you require a majority of the whole number of members to pass a bill, and my word for it, members will be here to attend to their duty. There are ninety-one counties in the State, and there are to be a hundred members in the popular branch of the General Assembly. Do the people want to pay a hundred men to come here and do their work, and then to have it done by only one-third? The proposition is preposterous.

Now, one word in reference to what fell from my friend from Clark (Mr. Read). He says that if money is to be appropriated, it should be appropriated by a majority. Sir, there are many things that are dearer to the people than money—their lives, their liberty, and a variety of social rights. And are they to be decided upon by one-third of those who are sent here for this purpose? If it is a democratic doctrine, to say that the majority shall rule, let it be so; and if it is not, then we may just as well throw up the whole business of legislation, and permit factious minorities to rule the State.

Mr. MURRAY. It seems to me that this proposition can easily be reconciled with the provision that a majority of a quorum can meet to do business; because, when a bill comes up for its final passage it can be laid over, and not be made the subject of the final action of the Legislature, unless a majority of the whole should agree to it. With this view of the case, I think the two propositions are perfectly reconcilable.

Mr. EDMONDSTON. I have only one word to say in reply to my friend from Rush, (Mr. Bracken,) who seems to take great pride in his constituents. In one breath he says that a majority shall rule, and in the very next breath he says that they shall not rule. Now he votes for the proposition that two-thirds of the members shall form a quorum to do business, and then he says that a majority of that quorum shall not do business.

Mr. BRACKEN (interposing). I said that they should not pass laws.

Mr. EDMONDSTON. Is not that doing business? In the name of God, what other business have they to do?

Mr. BRACKEN. Two-thirds of the members may come here and organize, and compel the balance to come here and attend to the people's business; or if they do not, why then expel them and let others come in their places.

Mr. EDMONDSTON. No, sir; we have said that a quorum shall do business. And what is that business? Is it to proceed to the work of legislation, or is it to send the Sergeant-at-arms all over the State to hunt up the absent members? If gentlemen do not attend to the business of legislation, as the people expect them to do, and if a quorum should pass laws which are inconsistent with the public interest, then let the constituencies of the delinquent members call them to account. But it appears to me that, as we are now proceeding, this Convention is taking upon itself to settle forever hereafter, both what the people and the Legislature shall do. Now I would ask the gentleman from Johnson, (Mr. Ritchey,) if ever he saw a revenue bill pass by a majority of the whole house? If he has seen anything of the kind, he has seen more than I have seen. Those bills are generally passed at the end of a session, when you can seldom have more members than a quorum present; and if you adopt this amendment you will do nothing more than prevent all such bills from being passed; and the members will go home, and the result will be that the Governor will have to put the State to the expense of calling an extra session, or the wheels of government must be stopped.

Mr. RITCHEY. I wish to say, in reply to be gentleman from Dubois, (Mr. Edmondston,) that it is true that revenue bills have heretofore been the last that have been passed, and that a great many members of both houses have usually returned home before the passage of such bills. I ask if there are any bills which can be more important than those, and whether the argument of the gentleman from Dubois does not favor our position? If you require a majority of the whole number to pass those bills which are necessary for carrying on the government, then the members, instead of being in such haste to get home, will stay and pass these bills.

Now with regard to this question of democracy, it appears that doctors differ a little. The doctrine which the gentleman from Dubois contends for is, that one-third of the representatives of the people should govern; whereas, the doctrine that I contend for is, that nothing shall have the sanction of law in the State of Indiana which a majority of the people, through their representatives, have not sanctioned. Now if the gentleman from Dubois prefers that one-third of the representatives of the people should rule the whole, he can have it so; but that is not the democracy which I profess. I want that democracy which insists on the right of the majority of the people of the State of Indiana to pass laws for themselves, through their representatives; and that no minority, either through corruption on the one hand or the neglect of duty on the other, shall have the power to pass laws in our State.

Mr. RARIDEN. The representatives of the people, in my view of the matter, represent the State of Indiana; and whenever a quorum—the constitutional number—are ready to speak the voice of the State, they ought to speak that voice. Now it is a matter of very little importance to the whole State of Indiana, whether the county of Wayne is represented or not. It is a matter of convenience alone, to that county. Two-thirds of the members would be as potent in their action; and, indeed, I would not say but that the interest of the State would be as secure in the hands of one-third of the representatives as in the hands of the whole of them, if we could only have the right kind of men. This is a matter which does not involve any principle; nothing beyond the mere responsibility of the members elected. It is altogether a matter between them and their constituents. Wayne county, or any other county, has a right to be heard; but if Wayne, or any other county, sees proper to elect a man to represent them who is not qualified to guard their interests, then it is the fault or the misfortune of that county which may be placed in such a position. It is utterly impossible that in any legislative body you can have the whole number of members present all the time, and to attempt to enforce their presence all the time would involve a large expenditure of money, or you would have your representative body composed of men of but indifferent talents. Now how is this provision going to affect the vitality of legislation? We have already a provision in the Constitution that two-thirds of the members of either house shall constitute a quorum, and it would be a silly Constitution without such a provision. When a number of members are assembled competent to make laws for the State, what is it to the State if they are not all there? Do gentlemen go upon the ground that the interest of the State is not secure unless the whole number of members are present? Or is it that one county or another, whose representative may not be present, is wronged by the action of the Legislature? If their representatives are not present it is their fault and their loss. I, sir, am in favor of leaving such responsibility to be settled between the absenting members and their constituents. I fear that infinite harm and delay would be the result of the principle involved in the amendment.

Mr. DOBSON said he was in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) if for no other reason than that he believed it to be correct in principle. It would be a proper provision, too, in another regard; that it would prevent members from absenting themselves from the house and neglecting the people's business; and if they would not attend to that business, then the Legislature should have the power to expel them. The anxiety of the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) on the subject, had reminded him of another reason why he ought to go for it. Had this rule been in force in past sessions of the Legislature, the county of Ohio would never have been born, and some fifty thousand dollars would have been saved to the State. That was so managed that one or two gentlemen who were opposed to it were unsuspiciously invited out to take a glass of beer, and before they returned Ohio county was born. If the rule proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn had been in force that county would not have been created, because a majority of the whole number never would have voted for it. Many similar instances of the benefit of such a rule might be cited, and he hoped that it would be adopted by the Convention. In regard to a quorum proceeding to do business, he thought there was much business which they might transact, but they should not proceed to take a final vote on any measure.

The question was then taken on the motion to indefinitely postpone the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, and the yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, were taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Barbour, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Bright, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Harbolt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Lockhart, Logan, Mather, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Mowrer, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Spann, Tannehill, Taylor, Walpole, Watts, and Zenor—47.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—80.

So the motion to indefinitely postpone did not prevail.

Mr. BADGER. I move to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The question being taken on the motion to lay the amendment of Mr. Read upon the table, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. KELSO. As the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn is now subject to be amended, I propose to amend it by adding the following—

"And that no man shall be held to be duly elected to a seat in either branch of the Legislature unless he has received a majority of all the votes cast in the county or district for which he was elected."

I have no idea that the amendment I have offered will pass, but it certainly gives to those gentlemen who are so full of democracy, an opportunity to show their hands. Now let those gentlemen that have been born, and suckled, and fed, and raised upon democracy, and nothing else but democracy, come up and show themselves. [Laughter.] Sir, if we are to require fifty-one members out of a hundred, to pass any law, then, if there are two thousand voters in any county or representative district, let the man who is to be returned as elected, be required to have at least one thousand and one of them. If he is to be one of the fifty-one members who are to constitute the majority, let him stand the test at home, and see if he will obtain a majority there. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FARROW. I would offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland. I know it is not in order to propose it now, but the gentleman, perhaps, will accept it. It is—

"Provided, That there shall not, at any time, be more than double the number of candidates in any county or district, that are to be elected in such county or district."

Mr. KELSO. I am obliged to the gentleman from Putnam for his amendment, but I think it unnecessary. I believe the people ought not to have any more candidates than they want, [laughter,] and that number they will undoubtedly have.

Mr. BRACKEN. I would just observe to the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) that I do not recognize his right to speak for the democracy, because he has not been long enough in their ranks to become thoroughly acquainted with their doctrines.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Kelso, and it was rejected.

THE PRESIDENT. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

Mr. KELSO. I do not wish to debate any further the merits of this amendment, but I desire to say one word in reply to the last remark of my friend from Rush (Mr. Bracken). No matter what he may have to say about my right to speak for the democracy, I just tell him that I can teach him his A B C's both about the democracy, and about legislation, and, perhaps, about moral honesty, too. [Loud cries of "order, order."]

The question being taken on the amendment, it was adopted—yeas 78, nays 40—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hadson, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—78.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Barbour, Beeson, Blythe, Bright, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Gordon, Gregg, Harbolt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Lockhart, Mather, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Mowrer, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Robinson, Spann, Tannehill, Taylor, Walpole, Watts, and Zenor—40.

Mr. MARCH proposed to amend the section after the word "rule," in the 86th line, by adding the following:

"But the reading of a bill by sections, on its final passage, shall in no case be dispensed with."

The amendment was adopted, and the section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

INDIANAPOLIS, IA., Nov. 9, 1850.

Mr. DEFREES—Sir: In your report of the debates and proceedings of the Convention I find some errors, of either the stenographer or printer, which, if convenient, I would be pleased to have corrected. On page 36 I am made to say, I "derived" the intimation, &c. It should be, I "denied," &c.

Again, on pages 42 and 43, will be found a resolution offered by me, which was referred to the committee "on the organization and functions of the standing committees." Among several errors I will mention two: the ninth proposition should read, "the power of impeachment and removal from office," and not as printed—"the power of impeachment and the qualifications to vote and hold office." And the seventeenth should read, "county boards," and not "county roads." On page 107, Mr. Stevenson's resolution requiring a majority of all the members elected to pass a law being under consideration, the reporter has entirely misconceived my meaning. I said, "in regard to the correctness of the position taken by gentlemen that it shall require a majority of all the members elected to pass a law, I think there cannot be much controversy." Again. I did not use the word "proper" purposes, but "private" purposes; intending to convey the idea that in voting money out of the treasury for private objects, it should require two-thirds of the members to pass the law.

I have noticed several other errors in the debates and proceedings, but have not the time at present to point them out.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.

JAMES W. BORDEN.

THURSDAY, DEC. 12, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. —.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE PRESIDENT rose and said:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONVENTION: I have been requested to present, and take great pleasure in presenting to your consideration, a petition presented to me by the highly gifted and accomplished Miss MARY E. ORCHARD, on behalf of the pupils in the Indiana Asylum for the education of the Deaf and Dumb. In presenting to you this petition permit me to remark that in it is contained unquestionable evidence of the usefulness and utility of the institution. They are now demonstrating, not only in this petition, but by public exhibitions, that this institution has been eminently successful in cultivating the better portion of our nature—the intellectual portion—thereby calling forth, and cultivating the talent of that unfortunate class belonging to our race, which must, perhaps otherwise have remained like treasure hidden in the earth.

This, I say, is a source of high gratification to the philanthropic and the benevolent throughout the State. There individuals not only acquire the necessary knowledge to qualify them to take a position of usefulness in society, but to enjoy themselves and to enjoy the society which surrounds them. It may be said then, in a qualified sense, that the deaf now hear, and the dumb speak. I present this petition for your consideration, believing that it will receive at your hands that attention to which its importance justly entitles it. [Applause.]

The petition was then read by the Secretary, as follows:

To the Honorable Members of the Constitutional Convention

We are aware that the present Convention, before whom we have the honor of appearing, is the most important which has ever assembled in this Capitol, and comprises in its ranks the most talented of the people of the State. Under these circumstances we feel overwhelmed with a sense of our incapacity; but we would crave your indulgence, and hope that your kindness will excuse the imperfections of our present address, as but a few years have passed since we first learned to communicate our thoughts to others.

We feel that the blessings which education has bestowed upon us, are far greater than the power of language can express; and it is to pray that these blessings may not be withdrawn from us and others equally unfortunapatrian, prompts us to address you at this time.

The pages of history contain the records of all classes of men; the plebian and patrician, the noble and the slave, are alike remembered. But who shall tell of our history in years gone by? The mute and the blind have gone down to the grave, leaving no record to tell that they had been. It is true, that, among the latter, many eminent individuals have been found, even as early as the days of the blind Grecian Bard; but, of the multitudes who have passed in darkness through the world, where shall we find the history? We would, however, hope that the dark clouds which hung over us have passed away, for teachers have been given, who, with words of wisdom, have imparted to us new life, and whose instructions shed light and joy on our path.

To us, who are mute, the world is no longer a joyless dwelling place. No more do we look upon the blue vault above us, with all its shining hosts, merely as an image of external beauty; for science has revealed suns and systems innumerable, in the vast regions of space; and in every star that shines, we see a world. And while thus our teachers have unfolded to our eyes the wonders of creation, and opened the mines of knowledge, affliction has been forgotten in the thought, that the treasures of wisdom and learning belonged to us, as well as to the more fortunate; while the Blind, in the intellectual joys to which they have attained, forget the darkness which envelopes outward things.

But what has hitherto been the condition of those whose lot it is to pass through life bewildered in the mazes of a disordered intellect? What heart does not feel for them, and what a tale of suffering does their history unfold!

Like the demoniac of Scripture, their dwelling has been among the tombs, being destitute, afflicted, tormented. The wild beast of the desert has not been shunned with greater dread, or treated, in captivity, with more severity than those on whose minds the lamp of reason sheds no ray. We rejoice to think, that they, too, have been succored by the angel-hand of benevolence, and rescued from oppression and misery. In the home which has been provided for them, their wounded spirits have found peace.

It is to ask that these blessings be extended to us all, by the renewed beneficence of our fellow-citizens, that this address is now presented to your honorable body—and we have been emboldened to make it, by the kindness and generosity which has always marked the conduct of our Government towards us.

And, in conclusion, we would say, that, although we can offer no suitable recompense yet, while we live, our prayers shall ascend unceasingly for our benefactors; and we trust to meet them in that world of joy and bliss, where our thanks shall reach their ears without the aid of an interpreter; there shall no eye be dimmed, neither shall any mind be darkened.

[Signed]

MARY ST. C. BELCHER,

MARY E. ORCHARD, and 67 others.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved that the petition be laid on the table and printed; and that it be entered upon the Journal at length.

Mr. PETTIT. It ought to be referred.

Mr. SMITH. I move then, that it be referred to the committee on education.

Mr. PETTIT suggested the committee on the public institutions of the State.

Mr. SMITH modified his motion accordingly.

Mr. WOLFE. I move that the petition be spread upon the journal of debates, that it may go out to the public.

Mr. BROOKBANK. I hope that a copy of the memorial will be sent to the Governor of each of the several States of the Union.

["Consent."]

A MEMBER. "In order to do that it should be printed."

Mr. BROOKBANK. I move, then, that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT. How many copies shall be printed?

SEVERAL VOICES. "Five hundred."

Mr. MOWRER. Before the question is put on the motion to print, we had better determine what number shall be printed. I think that there should be more than five hundred.

Mr. WATTS. I would suggest to the gentleman who made the motion, to refer the petition to a committee—that, as it is a matter which interests the whole State, every portion of the State should be represented on the committee. I suggest, therefore, that it be referred to a select committee of one from each Congressional district.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that it is unusual to refer a document to a committee, and at the same time order it to be printed.

The question is: Shall the petition be referred to the committee on the public institutions of the State?

Mr. NILES. I am hardly willing that the petition which has just been read should be passed by without one word of response from this floor to its sentiments, or to the remarks which have fallen from the Chair. I could have hoped that the duty which I now assume might have been performed by some one else; and I should not have risen, except at the last moment, to take it upon myself.

The petition is no less beautifully expressed than true in sentiment. No memorial could come before this body, from any portion of our fellow-citizens, which would be more certain to meet a cordial and unanimous response. It comes from those whose lips would never have been unsealed but for the enlightened liberality of the State. Towards their education, it has been our privilege as citizens to contribute our mite. And in the satisfaction which we all experienced at the exhibition last evening, we had an opportunity to learn something of the truth, that it is even more blessed to give than to receive. By supporting the asylums for the education of the deaf and dumb, and the blind, and the hospital for the insane, we are only carrying into substantial acts something of that spirit of genuine benevolence which is beginning to characterize the present age. We cannot fail to recognize in these institutions, scattering rays from the early twilight of a better day for humanity. And, as suggested by an allusion from the Chair, I can but add, that, in sustaining them, we imitate—afar off, and in an humble way—the conduct of Him whose life on earth was devoted to active usefulness—who restored the deaf to hearing, the dumb to speech, and the blind to sight, and at whose command the lunatic went forth clothed and in his right mind. Blessings shall rest upon those who founded these institutions, and we may share in the blessing by helping to make them perpetual. But, sir, though we shall, as we ought, give them permanence by a provision in the organic law, it is delightful to know that they rest on a surer basis than any paper Constitution—the affections of the people. It is a delightful contemplation, that there is not a man within the limits of the State whose heart does not go with his hand in paying the tax necessary for their support. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. I would suggest the propriety of withholding the publication of this petition until the report of the committee is made, so that the petition and report may go out together. I move that it be withheld from publication until we get the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT. Is the motion to lay on the table and print withdrawn?

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. Yes, sir, I will withdraw the motion to print, although it occurred to me that it would be the better way to refer, and allow it to be printed at the same time.

The question being taken on referring the petition to the committee on the public institutions of the State, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question was then taken on the motion to spread the petition on the journal of the Convention and on the journal of debates, and it was decided in the affirmative.

STATE DEBT.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson said he had received from the Auditor of State some statistical tables containing information supplementary to that furnished a few days ago, on the subject of the State debt, and that he would be glad to have the communication referred to a select committee with the following instructions:

"To examine into, and report in tabular form, the indebtedness of the State on account of internal improvement bonds, with the amount of interest paid annually thereon; and also to submit a plan for the gradual payment of the same."

Mr. HALL. This subject has been before the committee on the State debt, and they have examined it thoroughly, but have not had an opportunity to lay before the Convention the result of their investigation. It will be brought forward when the section that has been reported from that committee comes up for consideration. I therefore move that the communication, for the present, be laid upon the table.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. I have no disposition to take anything away from the committee on the public debt which properly belongs to it, but if I understood the statement of my colleague the other day, his estimates were based upon the supposition of a certain amount remaining in the treasury. My object is, that all the information shall be collected in order that some way may be provided by the legislative department for liquidating the debt.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. I do not see that there need be any difference of opinion as to the reference that this matter shall take, and if this communication be referred to a select committee, I do not perceive that it will be taking anything away from the standing committee. So far as I am concerned, I should be glad if a separate proposition on this subject were submitted by every gentleman. I should like to see different plans submitted so that we might adopt that which appears to be the best. The gentleman from Gibson, who is chairman of the committee, has, I have no doubt, given the subject a thorough investigation. His plan is no doubt a good one, and may be adopted by this Convention if no other plan be submitted. But at the same time, there might be other plans submitted, some of which we might prefer to his. I think there can be no impropriety in sending it to a select committee.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The subject of the public debt is the only subject which the gentleman from Gibson, and the committee of which he is chairman, had charge. It strikes me that it would be somewhat out of the usual course, if, after they have spent two or three months in the investigation of the whole subject, it should now be taken from them and given to a select committee. I have no objection that other gentlemen should be added to the committee, but it certainly appears to me that to take the subject now from that committee and give it to a select committee would be a breach of courtesy which is not often perpetrated in a deliberative body.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. It is not proposed to take the subject away from that committee at all, and if it were, it would not be without precedent. The committee on the elective franchise, made a report, and the same subject upon which they reported, was then referred to a select committee. The committee on the State debt will not thereby be discharged from the consideration of the subject.

Mr. MAGUIRE. It does not discharge the committee but it takes away all their duties.

The question being taken on the motion to refer the communication to a select committee, it was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson, then moved its reference to the committee on the State debt.

The motion was agreed to, and it was so referred.

On motion by Mr. MAGUIRE, the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Miller) was added to that committee.

On motion by Mr. MILLER of Gibson, the former communication from the Auditor, on this subject, was referred to the same committee.

On motion by Mr. BORDEN, the gentleman from Lagrange, (Mr. Howe) was also added to the committee on the State debt.

The committees were then called for reports.

Mr. KELSO, from the select committee appointed for the purpose of obtaining a place for holding the sittings of the Convention, made the following report:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The select committee to whom was referred a resolution on the subject of obtaining a suitable room for the sessions of this Convention hereafter, have had the same under consideration, and now report: That communications were addressed, at an early day, by your committee, to the owners, agents, and managers of the Masonic Hall, the Baptist Church, and Concert Hall, all situated in the city of Indianapolis, requesting a reply from each, severally, whether the rooms could be rented for the use of this Convention, for a term of from three to six weeks, and if so, at what price, with and without carpet; whether seats, tables, stoves, &c., could be furnished by such owners, agents, managers, &c.

Your committee have been verbally informed by the Rev. Mr. CRESSEY, that the church cannot be obtained by this Convention; the same having been seated and otherwise arranged for church purposes.

Your committee have also received written replies from Messrs. YANDES & SHARPE and Mr. SHEETS; each of which replies your committee herewith submit and make them a part of this report.

Your committee do not feel at liberty to enter into any contract without first having the advice of the Convention.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

DANIEL KELSO,
E. K. BASCOM,
D. MAGUIRE,
S. P. MOONEY,
JOHN P. DUNN.

INDIANAPOLIS, Dec. 11, 1850

GENTLEMEN: Your note of yesterday, on the subject of the occupancy, by the Convention, of the Hall in the Masonic building, is at hand.

At the commencement of this session, I received a similar communication, from another committee, to which I replied, in respectful language, stating the terms upon which the Hall could be secured. My proposition gave great offense, and drew forth from several honorable members, remarks derogatory to my personal character. Not wishing to place myself in the same situation again, I respectfully decline making any further proposition.

If the Convention, however, are desirous of using the Hall, and choose to fix upon a sum they are willing to pay for it, and I should conceive it to be the interest of the stockholders to accede to the offer, I will do so.

Very respectfully, your ob't servant.

WM. SHEETS,
Commissioner of Masonic Hall.

TO Messrs.	DANIEL KELSO,	} Committee.
	E. K. BASCOM,
	D. MAGUIRE,
	S. P. MOONEY,
	JOHN P. DUNN,

INDIANAPOLIS, Dec. 10, 1850.

Gentlemen: In answer to your inquiries in your favor of this date, we would state that we will rent for the use of the Constitutional Convention Concert Hall, at the rate of four dollars and fifty cents per day. The room will be furnished with settees for the members of the Convention, and for the accommodation of the auditory, and a necessary number of stoves to heat the room.

We do not propose to carpet the room or furnish desks for the members.

Respectfully yours,
YANDES & SHARPE.

TO MESSRS. DANIEL KELSO,
SAM'L R. MOONEY,
JOHN P. DUNN,
E. K. BASCOM,
D. MAGUIRE, } Committee.

MR. PETTIT. I certainly am not in favor of accepting either of these propositions, and I have only risen to say that in my opinion we can remain where we are without the least trouble or inconvenience to the Legislature, which is soon to assemble. The court room in which the Supreme Court is now sitting, is large enough to hold all the members of the House of Representatives, although it might not be large enough for this body. That room is already carpeted, and by removing their desks into it, can be readily fitted up for the House of Representatives or for the Senate. We have arrived at that period in our labors when desks are not of great importance—at all events they can be spared, and, if desirable, a few tables can be substituted. I am satisfied, therefore, that we ought not to think of leaving this Capitol. It is nonsense to say that we shall be treading on each other's toes here, or be in each other's way. There are now in attendance upon the court in the room below, including the officers of court, members of the bar, &c., as many as one hundred persons, and there is sufficient room for them without any inconvenience.

I can see no objection to the two bodies, the Legislature and the Convention, meeting under the same roof, and prosecuting their respective labors at the same time. I should regard it as the height of folly to think of leaving the Capitol, where we have the rooms and other conveniences that we require. The expense of renting another room, is the least of the difficulty. The rooms that are offered to us have no conveniences, such as could accommodate a deliberative body. A large portion of the expense attending the removal would be for conveying fuel, and for the removal of stationary and other things that we may require. These halls that are proposed to us, have no adjacent rooms, for folding rooms; nothing but one square room, with a door opening at the head of the stairs. We should be disturbed by a constant clatter; the staircases are so narrow that two small persons can scarcely pass; and the room, I understand, is three stories high. In my judgment, we ought to stay here. I was about to say that I would move to lay the report upon the table, but it is a motion that I will not make.

MR. KELSO. So far as I am concerned individually, it matters not to me whether I stay here or go elsewhere, and if we go elsewhere, I am indifferent as to where we go. I can fight my way through as well as anybody else, but I am candidly of opinion that the most foolish thing that we could possibly do, would be to attempt to stay here when the Legislature is in session in the same building. Now, in the first place, let us see what position we should occupy. The Senate may—they have a right to—and in all probability, will, refuse to surrender up their room to the House of Representatives; and I apprehend that the House of Representatives have no right to take it from them. Suppose that we should come down some morning to this Hall, and find it occupied by the Legislature, we should get up such a row as would result in the adjournment of both bodies; then what sort of a situation would the State of Indiana be in?

I am loth to charge the gentleman from Tippecanoe with anything like a trick, although he suspected the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne were something like a cat in a meal tub. Now suppose the House of Representatives should come here and insist upon having this room. We should be forced to adjourn.

MR. PETTIT. I will say to the gentleman, that I shall under no circumstances vote to adjourn.

MR. KELSO. I say I am loth to make any such accusation against the gentleman, as he is generally very bold, frank, and candid about what he does. But let me make the further suggestion—would it not result in this?

Now, if we are going to adjourn over, and give the Legislature time to do what they have to do, let us, at once, like men, come up to the chalk line and agree upon it; and if not, let us determine where we will go, if we are to go elsewhere. I have submitted the report thus early, that we may be advised what further steps to take, if further steps are necessary on the part of the committee.

MR. GRAHAM of Warrick. This is a question in which I feel some little interest, and it seems to me that some of the suggestions which the gentleman has made, place us in a very ridiculous attitude, although I do not apprehend that anything of the kind will happen. I concur fully in the remark of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that the Supreme Court room is large enough to accommodate either the Senate or the House of Representatives, and it is as much the interest of the Representatives and Senators as it is of this Convention that all these arrangements should be made with as little expense as possible, for they are responsible to the people for the additional expense that will be incurred. Both Senators and Representatives will be glad, I have no doubt, to have an opportunity, in moments of leisure to come into this Hall and witness the proceedings of this Convention; but if the Convention remove to Madison, what will become of those gentlemen who are members of this body and who are also members of the Legislature? I am for keeping as close together as possible, that we may, when important questions arise, vote in either body. In my opinion, there will be no difficulty when the Legislature comes together. There is sufficient room for all within this building.

Mr. WOLFE. I do not think it would be prudent for the Convention to remain here during the sittings of the Legislature. I know it is frequently very difficult when the Legislature is in session here, and a discussion is going on in one branch, and a vote is to be taken in the other—it is very difficult, I say, to get the requisite number of votes to make a quorum. Well, sir, if we have three bodies in session at the same time, members will be continually running from one to the other. I should be glad to accommodate gentlemen who are members of the Convention and also of the Legislature, but I cannot consent to do it at the expense of the interests of the people of Indiana—I cannot consent to do it at a sacrifice of the public interest. I know there would be some inconvenience experienced by us if we were to remove to any of the public buildings in this city, but at the same time, there would be some advantages attending it, not the least of which would be, being at some distance from the place where the Legislature will sit. I think it would be impossible for us to remain in this building.

Mr. LOCKHART. I believe that on examination it will be ascertained that the Supreme Court room would be a more convenient room for this Convention than this Hall itself. I therefore move that the report be referred back to the committee, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of fitting up the Supreme Court room for the use of the Convention.

Mr. NEWMAN. We are progressing pretty fairly with our labors, and this matter may as well be considered hereafter. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Saturday next.

Mr. RITCHEY. I hope it will not be postponed. We ought to determine whether we will go on and complete the work for which we have been sent here. If we determine to go on, it is necessary that we provide for the meeting of the General Assembly; that we try to get out of their way or else provide some place for them. I hope this question will be no longer postponed, but that we will decide this morning whether we shall remain here or remove. And, in reference to those gentlemen who are members of this Convention, and also members of the Senate, let me say that it appears to me that this is a reason why all three bodies should remain in this building. These three gentlemen have been sent here as members of this Convention—they are the servants of the people. If the people choose to be represented in two different bodies by the same men, it is not our business. And, sir, they can discharge the duties of both, if the different bodies sit in close neighborhood to each other; but if we go to Concert Hall, or to any other remote place, it will be impossible for them to do so; or at least, they will not have the same facilities that they would have here. This, I think, is one reason why we should remain in our present position. I believe there will be no unwillingness on the part of the House or of the Senate, so to arrange as to give us the use of this Hall until we are through with our labors; and if we determine to progress rapidly, we can get nearly through by the time the Legislature comes together. I am in favor of progressing with all possible speed that is consistent with the necessary deliberation. I believe, at all events, we can finish our work within two weeks at farthest, after the Legislature meets. I therefore hope the Supreme Court room will be fitted up for either the House or the Senate; and if they are unwilling to yield to us, I shall, for one, be in favor of the Convention removing down into that room, to finish up our work.

Mr. COOKERLY. I am decidedly opposed to all three bodies sitting in this House. If we do undertake to remain in such close proximity to the Legislature, my word for it, there will be but little done. I have just been informed that the Masonic Hall can be obtained at our own price. [Cries of "no, no, no."] I am aware that there is a prejudice against the Masonic Hall, and against Mr. Sheets, but I think we should not cut off our own nose to spite ourselves. It is a very convenient room, and if we can get it at a reasonable price I think we ought to take it. Rather than have the three bodies sitting in this Capitol, I should be inclined to vote that the Convention adjourn over, and come back again after the Legislature adjourns, because I believe it will be a useless squandering of our time to attempt to do anything here while the Legislature is in session.

Mr. FOSTER. I trust, sir, that this question will be decided at once. There is no necessity, in my opinion, for postponing it until Saturday. With all deference to gentlemen who hold seats both in the Convention and the Legislature, I must say that we have met here, not for the convenience of those gentlemen, in order that they may assist in the deliberation of both bodies, but we have met here for the good of the people, and not to take into consideration the accommodation of individuals. It appears to me preposterous that three different bodies should attempt to hold their sessions in this building. It is hardly large enough for the two branches of the General Assembly. It is not sufficiently large to be convenient for them. I see none of the objections to removing to a different part of the town that seem to strike gentlemen so forcibly. We have but little use now for the library or for committee rooms. Besides, this will be a very important session of the Legislature—especially for the first week or two: I believe it will be impossible to keep gentlemen of this Convention in their seats, particularly those who have aspirations for a seat in the United States Senate. And I do not feel any more dispositive to make arrangements for their convenience than for the convenience of those who hold seats in the two bodies. As I have remarked, let us go to Concert Hall, or else let us go to Madison. I am told that we shall there be furnished with accommodations gratuitously. I hope the question will be decided at once.

Mr. MURRAY. There are but few days now remaining before the Legislature will meet; we ought, therefore, to determine this question at once. A good many propositions have been made, and there are many of them that I have objections to. I believe that this room was relinquished for our use by the House of Representatives, in the expectation that we would finish our labours here, before the time of the meeting of the Legislature arrived. I think we had better surrender this room, therefore, and look for another. When we rejected the proposition for going to Madison, it was because most of us thought that we should be able to get through with our labors before the meeting of the Legislature, and were desirous of avoiding the loss of time attendant upon a removal. But now it has become necessary that another room should be provided. It has been suggested that we had better adjourn over. As to that, I do not see what is to be gained by it. I think we had better proceed, and finish our business, before we adjourn. It is proposed that the Constitution which we are about to make, shall be submitted to the people as early as the month of May or June. It will be impossible then, for us to adjourn for any length of time, and have our work completed in season. For these and other considerations, it seems to me that we had better persevere and finish our labors as speedily as possible.

Mr. DOBSON. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Convention further than to say that we ought to settle this question now, in order that the members of the Legislature may understand what our determination is.

Before I sit down I will move that the proposition now under consideration be laid upon the table, in order that I may introduce a resolution. It is in these words:

"Resolved, That we will remain in this Hall."
[Consent.]

Gentlemen do not take into consideration the inconvenience which we must experience if we go elsewhere. As to the expense it is my opinion that we need not put our constituents to any additional expense. This is the people's House, they built it for the use of the Legislature, and for any other purpose for which they might require it. There is ample room here for both the Legislature and the Convention; and as to the inconvenience of all three bodies being in the same building, I do not apprehend that any inconvenience will arise from it. I am pleased with the idea that the Senate and the House of Representatives, and this Convention will all be in session at the same time, laboring for the public good. As to adjourning over, I can see no good that will result from it. We were elected to accomplish a certain work. Let us go on and accomplish it, and not waste time by adjourning. If no gentleman desires to make any further remarks, I will move that the propositions before the Convention be laid upon the table.

Mr. HELM. I desire to say a few words in reference to this question.

Mr. DOBSON. I will withdraw my motion, so that the gentleman from Rush can proceed.

Mr. KELSO. It is well known by most of the members of this Convention, that I am in favor of adjourning for a short time. This, sir, is a question that has been agitated in connection with that of our removal to some other suitable building, and I desire to say that both these questions should be settled before we proceed to any other business. We have had a report from the committee that was appointed for the purpose of procuring a suitable building; and in relation to the Masonic Hall, I will say that I think the proposition is very easily understood. We can obtain the Hall provided we make it profitable to the owners, and upon no other terms. If I understood the letter that has been received in answer to the application of the committee, we are required to make it a profitable operation to the owners of the Hall, if we accept that proposition. So much, then, in reference to our adjourning to the Masonic Hall. Then, sir, Concert Hall has been tendered to us, and that on very favorable terms; yet some gentlemen who have examined that Hall, have determined that it is not a suitable place. It is said that the staircase is too narrow. It is true that would be a serious objection to many members of the Convention, especially those who are inclined to corpulency. As I do not wish to impose any inconvenience upon gentlemen of the Convention, I think that we ought to determine not to remove to Concert Hall. I am opposed, then, to the acceptance of either proposition that has been tendered to us, and as has been well remarked by a number of members this morning, we need not think of continuing our sessions in this hall; and as it is a matter that I think has been clearly settled this morning, that we have no right to continue our sessions here to the exclusion of the House of Representatives, and as there is no other room large enough in this building, I feel satisfied that the question of adjournment is the only remaining question that we ought to consider, and in connection with that question I have a few remarks to make. I am, sir, in favor of adjourning for a short time. I believe it would be to the interests of the people of the State of Indiana that we should adjourn, since other room must be procured for us and it will take some little time to have that room fitted up, and I think we had better adjourn while it is being fitted up. You will also bear in mind that the printing of our debates is some ten or twelve days behind, and such has been the case since the commencement of the session, and we know there is great inconvenience arising from this circumstance; then if we adjourn for ten or twelve days, the printing can be brought up and the transactions of each day can be laid upon our tables every morning, and we shall have a better opportunity of knowing how to proceed with our business. Another reason why I am in favor of an adjournment is, that the holidays are now almost at hand, and I learn from those who have experience in such matters, that there is usually but little done in deliberative bodies during the holidays. Then, sir, it will be better for us to adjourn and have some suitable room fitted up for us during the time of our adjournment, and that we should return home and mingle with our constituents. I believe it would be of great advantage to us.

Mr. ROBINSON rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. DOBSON. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer my proposition before he proceeds with his remarks.

Mr. ROBINSON acquiesced.

Mr. DOBSON then moved that the resolutions be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOBSON. I will now offer the resolution that I have already stated.

The PRESIDENT. It will require a suspension of the order of business.

Mr. DOBSON. I move that the order of business be suspended.

The order of business was suspended.

Mr. Dobson's resolution was then read, as follows:

"Resolved, That we will remain in this Hall."

Mr. OWEN. I am opposed to an adjournment. I think, while we are about it, we had better finish our business. I cannot see, practically, the use of adjourning for ten or twelve days. To effect any purpose by adjournment, we should have to adjourn over until the Legislature has completed its session. But I am opposed to any adjournment whatever. The gentleman from Monroe has said that it is preposterous that the three bodies should remain in the same building. I can see nothing preposterous, nor even specially inconvenient in it. It is more convenient to remain here than to go elsewhere. As to the suggestion that the candidates for the United States Senate would probably stray off into the Senate Chamber or the House instead of remaining here, it strikes me that the Convention could contrive to get along without them; they are not so very numerous that their absence should break up this body.

Gentlemen have said that we have no right to retain possession of this Hall. I do not see that. It belongs to the people of the State. It is assigned, indeed, by usage, to the House of Representatives. Last year the Legislature provided that it should be "prepared for the reception and sittings of the Convention." Nothing is said about our leaving it.

If, indeed, any difficulty might be apprehended between the Convention and the House soon to assemble here, we ought to avoid it by vacating this Hall; but I do not think we need fear this.

Mr. BADGER moved to amend the resolution by providing that this Convention proceed with its business until Wednesday evening next; and that it meet on Thursday morning in some room in this city, to be procured and fitted up by the committee appointed for that purpose.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. Mr. President, I shall cordially vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson). I am decidedly in favor of remaining in this Hall until we close our labors. This Convention is representing the people in their primary capacity, and have paramount rights to the possession of this Hall. Besides, this is a more numerous body than any other that is to assemble at the Capital to transact official business, which entitles us to the largest room. The Supreme Court room is sufficiently large for either the Representative or Senatorial branch of the Legislature, and can be fitted up in time at a trifling expense. There is no doubt but that such arrangement will meet the approbation of the members of the Legislature, desirous, as they will be, to economize time and money, and expedite the public business with all commendable speed.

As for the proposition to adjourn over the Christmas holidays, or for any other cause, until our work be finished, I am utterly opposed.

We have already consumed much time—more than was expected when we convened, though certainly unavoidable, and for the purpose of shortening the session as much as possible, I shall vote for continuing at our labors in this Hall, without adjourning for any occasion until they shall be consummated.

Mr. WATTS. I think I can suggest a plan that will remedy all this difficulty. It is, that we pass a resolution to adjourn sine die in two weeks, and in the mean time go to work and make what amendments are necessary to the Constitution—postpone the Grand Jury question—postpone the question of the rights of married women, and some other questions, until the meeting of another Convention in the State of Indiana, and we can certainly wind up the remainder of the business within two weeks, and be ready to resign this Hall to the Legislature; and I think we are now getting along with our business pretty well. The intellectual forces of this body are pretty well exhausted. Brute force has taken possession of the Hall, and is about to do the business. But if we cannot get through before the meeting of the Legislature, I am in favor of adjourning to Madison—separating ourselves as far as possible from the Legislature. It seems to me absolutely necessary that we should do so.

Some gentlemen suggest that this Convention is chiefly composed of such animals as are usually called jassacks. I think, then, as we are to make a moving menagerie of this Convention, we have exhibited here long enough; I am in favor of exhibiting for a while in Madison.

Mr. ROBINSON. This is a question which ought to be settled correctly, and I certainly think that if anything would be calculated to disgrace this Convention more than another, it would be the adoption of the policy proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn. After ten weeks spent in attempting to make an organic law, without having more than half completed our work, if we were to wind up in two weeks from this time our constituents ought not to allow us to come into the county. There is but one way in which we can satisfy the people, and I believe the gentleman from Dearborn misconceives their wishes. It is not that we should rush matters through by brute force. I do not understand the term. It is such a term as I do not use myself, and I do not know that any other gentleman has quoted it here except the gentleman from Dearborn, and he has done so, I trust, in no other than a humorous mood. Now as to the difficulties spoken of, they all exist in the imagination of gentlemen. Sir, when the Legislature meets there need be no difficulty. I have a higher opinion of the intellect, and capacity, and good sense of the representatives of the people, than to suppose for a moment that we should have to retain this Hall by brute force. Sir, they come here as reasonable men—they find us here—they have passed a law calling this Convention—they have given us the use of this Hall, and it is the property of the people of Indiana. If our labors should necessarily last until the meeting of the Legislature, there will be no difficulty in settling this question. I have no doubt that if we fit up the Supreme Court room, they will go there and perform their duty like sensible men, without a murmur. In regard to adjourning from this Capital to Madison, if there is anything that is truly ridiculous it is such an idea. Here, sir, is the place that has been prepared and set apart for us by the Legislature of the State. Sir, I have one opinion of my own respecting this matter, and I will not surrender that opinion to any gentleman until I am convinced that I am wrong. I believe that this Convention has no power to adjourn and discharge its duties in any other part of the State. The very law that brought into existence this Convention, pointed out where its sittings should be held. It is true enough that if this Convention departs from this place, gathers up the books and records, and takes up its line of march, and on that line of march descends the inclined plane to Madison, it will look like a menagerie. It will be such a movement that the people will, in years to come, mark with their disapprobation.

It is said that the three bodies cannot sit together; and I was surprised to hear the sentiment coming from an old warrior, on whose shoulders the interests of the people of Indiana have rested for years, and without whose support those interests would assuredly have gone down. It has been said by the gentleman from Sullivan that the three bodies cannot sit together. Sir, the past history of legislation in Indiana will convince the gentleman that he is wrong. It is true, when the House and the Senate are in session, and an important question is under discussion, a member occasionally strays from one house to the other, but whenever the yeas and nays are called every one is at his post. It is true, the gentleman from Sullivan has been a vigilant representative. He is unwilling that any one else should represent his constituents in either House, and whenever an important question is up, we find him ready to make a speech. But I certainly think that his idea in regard to this matter is a total misconception. If you pass the resolution of the gentleman from Owen, that we will remain here, and if you take steps to fit up the Supreme Court room, when the Legislature meets, my word for it, you will not hear one word of complaint. The three bodies will go on harmoniously with their business; and I now say to my friend from Sullivan, with all good feeling, that if he should find it necessary to manage the three bodies, I am for giving him an opportunity to attend to it.

One word more on the question of adjournment. I have no feeling about the matter, but I believe we ought not to adjourn. If we do adjourn, I have one word to say as to the length of time to which our adjournment shall extend. Some of us live at a convenient distance from the capital, and can go to their homes one day and come back the next. There ought to be on their part a feeling of generosity towards those who live farther off. I will vote against all propositions to adjourn, unless it be to adjourn for a sufficient length of time to give every member an opportunity of visiting his family and seeing to his domestic concerns. My own notion is, that if we would progress with our business—decide to remain here—fit up the Supreme Court room, and we should have no difficulty to encounter.

In regard to the Masonic Hall, I have this to say: that I am not willing to have it upon any terms. I would rather sit in the open lot under the trees, exposed to the inclemency of the season, than that the representatives of the people should knuckle or bow to what may be the notions of Mr. Sheets, or any other man. When we are told that we have got to make concessions—that, because we did not see proper to take the Masonic Hall at first, we must humble ourselves, I would rather sit in the open air.

Mr. MOORE moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. KELSO demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. THORNTON rose for the purpose of making an explanation; and at his request the motion to lay on the table was temporarily withdrawn.

Mr. THORNTON. I have been requested by a number of members to offer a resolution that I have drawn up, in order to relieve us from the difficulty in which we are placed. I, for one, am not disposed to insist on remaining in this Hall, although I suppose we have a right to do so; but it might bring us into collision with the House of Representatives; for it is not to be disguised, that we shall have some hostility to encounter. It is said that we have been here too long, and if we continue to sit in this Hall, to the exclusion of the members of the House of Representatives, the odium hanging over us will be increased from the moment of our coming into collision with them. Suppose that we had a right to retain possession, would it be proper to exercise that right? It think it would not.

I am no candidate for office; I have no higher aims or aspirations. The only object that I have in view is to transact the business of my constituents. But it does strike me—and I claim to have some experience—that if we do continue in session in this Hall, in close proximity, as we must necessarily be, with the General Assembly, no good will be accomplished. I have understood—indeed, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact—that there are a number of candidates for the office of United States Senator; and it may be very convenient for them to remain here during the session of the Legislature. For my own part, I have no wish of that nature. I have no wish, however, to prevent them from taking care of their own interests; but I am not for making the public interest secondary to theirs. It appears to me that it would be much better that we should adjourn over until the session of the Legislature is ended. [Cries of "No, no."]

I have, sir, as I have said, a resolution which I will read. It is a proposition, however, that I am not devoted to; but I think that we must necessarily resolve upon something; and I protest most solemnly against going to Concert Hall. There are many of us who are getting in the vale of years, and who cannot easily climb so many flights of stairs. And I am altogether opposed to occupying Masonic Hall.

I will now read the resolution which I wish to offer as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Owen.

[Mr. THORNTON then read a preamble and resolutions providing for an adjournment from the 22d instant until the 13th of January, and that no per diem or mileage be allowed during the recess.]

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Owen accept the resolution as a substitute for his own.

Mr. DOBSON. I do not.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution, then, cannot be entertained at this time.

Mr. MOORE renewed his motion to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam upon the table.

The yeas and nays were again ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 105, nays 29—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wallace, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—105.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Blythe, Borden, Bryant, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cookerly, Dunn of Jefferson, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, McLean, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, and Wolfe—29.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I have no wish, sir, to discuss the resolution of the gentleman from Owen, nor do I intend to make any reference to the comparative advantages of occupying the Masonic Hall or the Concert Hall. I have no desire to meddle with any of these questions. I wish, however, in compliance with the request of several gentlemen in this part of the Hall, to repeat what I said on a former occasion, when this subject was before the Convention; and in what I said formerly, or shall say now, I can freely declare that I had and have no other motive save a desire to consult the convenience and comfort of the Convention. I presented, on a former occasion, a communication from several citizens of Indianapolis, proposing, in consideration of the advantages derived from the Convention remaining in this city, to become responsible for the amount charged by the proprietors of the Masonic Hall, over and above what this Convention should deem a fair and liberal allowance. That communication is still on file, and I take the responsibility of saying that the proposition, if desired, shall still be made good. I trust that this proposal, made from the best of motives, and with a view to accommodation, will not offend the sensibility of any member of this Convention—that all prejudice and excitement, if any remain in the minds of members, will be permitted to subside, and that the whole matter will be viewed as a plain business transaction.

Mr. WOLFE. When the proposition for the removal to Madison was before the Convention I opposed it, because I thought we could make better progress with our business here than we could if we were to go anywhere else. But the condition of affairs is now changed. At that time we did not suppose that we were going to remain until the Legislature met, and we believed that we should be interrupted until we had concluded our labors.

As to the remarks of the gentleman from Decatur, if he chooses to condescend to use language that is not becoming in a place like this, I have only to say—and I wish him distinctly to understand it—that I am not to be put down in that way. Gentlemen may understand, once for all, if they calculate to put me down by such a course of proceeding, they have got hold of the wrong man. I have occupied but little of the time of the Convention; but I am not to be prevented from doing my duty to my constituents on this floor, either by ridicule or by abuse.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman imagines that it is not becoming in me to allow him the credit of being exceedingly careful of the interests, not only of his constituents, but of the State, why, all I have to say is, that I take it all back. [A laugh.] I regard the gentleman as one to whose hands the rights of the people may be safely confided at all times.

The question being on the resolution of the gentleman from Owen, viz.: "That we will remain in this Hall,"

Mr. MOORE moved to amend the resolution by adding the words "until our labors are concluded."

Mr. DOBSON accepted the amendment as a modification of his resolution.

The question being upon the resolution as amended,

Mr. PETTIT demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. FOSTER moved to amend the resolution so that it would read thus:

"When the Convention adjourns on Friday, the 20th instant, it will adjourn to meet in the city of Madison on Monday, the 23d instant."

Mr. BORDEN moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

On this motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 93, nays 36—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall; Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, and Yocum—92.

NAYS.—Messrs. Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Carr, Clark of Tippecanoe, Dunn of Jefferson, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gregg, Helmer, Holman, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Logan, Mooney, Morgan, Mowrer, Prather, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Watts, Wheeler, Work, Zenor, and Mr. President—37.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. NEWMAN moved to amend the resolution so as to make it read as follows:

"That the Convention will continue its sessions in this Hall until the Saturday before the meeting of the General Assembly."

There certainly can be no necessity, said Mr. N., for leaving this Hall before the meeting of the Legislature.

Mr. WATTS moved to amend the amendment by adding the words:

"And then this Convention will adjourn sine die."

Mr. FARROW. It appears to me, sir, that there has been a sufficient expression of opinion in regard to this matter in the different attitudes which it has assumed, and I think the Convention has clearly expressed a determination to remain in this house, and therefore it seems to me that it is only a waste of time for gentlemen to continue to present amendments for consideration, when the views of the Convention have been so clearly indicated. I, for one, at least, am disposed, whenever called upon to give my vote, to record it in favor of remaining in this place until we complete our labors.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. When this question was brought up this morning, I thought that it would be decided in a few moments, and consequently I said nothing. But I discover that there is a disposition to settle the question more definitely. This being the case, I wish to say a few words. I wish it to be distinctly understood, that I am opposed to sitting in this house after the meeting of the Legislature. It is true that we may have the right to retain possession of this Hall, but I do not wish that any controversy should arise between this body and the Legislature; and I am satisfied that if we remain here, hostility will arise between the two bodies.

Sir, I judge of this matter by my own feelings. If I were elected a Representative, and came here to attend a session of the General Assembly, I should expect to be permitted to occupy the place that was designed for the use of the Representatives of the people. Therefore, I am opposed to the Convention remaining here. In regard to occupying the Masonic Hall or the Concert Hall, in this city, I will remark that I have no preference for either. I am no Mason, and therefore have no particular predilection for Masonic Hall. I cannot sing, and therefore I have no very great inclination to go to Concert Hall. But if either of them should be offered to us on reasonable terms, I see no reason why we should not accept the offer. I am decidedly of opinion, at all events, that we should procure some other place.

Mr. DUNN of Perry moved that the amendments be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN. I desire to make a single remark. It seems that an impression has gone abroad that the opinion is entertained by this body that it would be improper for us to remain here during the session of the Legislature. But, sir, although there are several precedents for such a course, I am in favor of surrendering this room and procuring some other.

I have a word to say in regard to the Masonic Hall. Some remarks have been made here in reference to the gentleman who has charge of that Hall, which appear to me to be altogether out of place. I think there is no reason why he should be censured for having refused the offer that was made to him for the use of the Hall. This he had a perfect right to do. The committee did not come to his terms. He was bound to consult the interests of the Stockholders. Was there anything wrong in that? I do not think that any prejudice that gentlemen may have permitted to arise in their minds should prevent us from consulting our own convenience by taking the Masonic Hall, where we can proceed and accomplish our work without an adjournment.

Mr. KELSO. There are two inconveniences, one of which we must encounter. If we adjourn over, we should adjourn to meet after the adjournment of the Circuit Court of the Spring term. We shall then accommodate those members of the Convention who are members of the Legislature, and we shall also accommodate members of the Convention who are members of the bar, and who have business to attend to during the sitting of the Court. I think, that if we adjourn at all—if we adjourn for any length of time whatever—before the completion of our labors here, we should adjourn until the first of June; and in the mean time let the people consider of what we have already done, and express their wishes as to what we shall do. But, sir, if we are to meet the other inconvenience, that is, the assembling of all these bodies together in the same building, let us meet it just where we are now. We should be no better off at Concert Hall or Masonic Hall than we are here. The officers appointed by law for that purpose have assigned to us this room. We may sit here as long as we choose, or at least as long as our money lasts.

A MEMBER. "It is exhausted already."

Mr. KELSO. Well, sir, we must keep on good terms with the Legislature until we get a new appropriation. But if we drive them out, I do not know whether we shall get any money or not. [Laughter.]

Now, by sitting here we shall accommodate those gentlemen who are members both of the Convention and of the Legislature, and enable them to receive six dollars a day instead of three; and we shall render an essential service to those gentlemen who are candidates for the office of United States Senator. They will be able to attend slightly to their business in this body while they attend to it a good deal in the other. [A laugh.]

Let us, then, keep as close to the Legislature as possible. We may learn something from them, and I am vain enough to suppose that they may learn a little something from us. ["Consent."] I am for remaining here, and for that reason, I now propose, under the circumstances, to vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Owen, although it is rather an impudent proceeding on our part; but, perhaps, all things considered, we cannot do any better.

Mr. BASCOM. A single word, sir, before the question is taken. I am surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, a gentleman who is aspiring to one of the highest offices in the gift of this Government. I am surprised that he should propose to occupy this Hall to the exclusion of the Legislature, and that we should request the State officers to provide another room for their use. The question is not whether we shall provide a place for them, but that we shall provide a place for ourselves. As to providing for them, it is a matter over which we have no control.

In regard to adjournment, I have no such fears as my colleague seems to have about going home. If gentlemen discharge their duties faithfully here, they need have no fears of going before the people. The question for us to decide is: What is best for the interests of the public?

Gentlemen seem to apprehend that there will be no business done after the meeting of the Legislature; but go to what place you please—the Lunatic Asylum, if you choose—perhaps the most fit place—there will still be gentlemen of this body, not only those who are aspirants for a seat in the Senate of the United States, but those who are seeking for judgeships and other minor offices, with their adherents and supporters, who must necessarily have constant intercourse with the Legislature. I have no doubt but that we shall be subjected to a good deal of inconvenience wherever we may be.

On motion,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. DOBSON.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson proposed to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting a provision to the effect that the Secretary of the Convention be directed to inform the Governor, Auditor, and Treasurer of State, that the Convention could not complete their labors previous to the next meeting of the General Assembly, and that said officers of State be respectfully requested to procure for the use of the Convention some other suitable room in the city of Indianapolis.

Mr. D. said that his object in offering this resolution was to relieve the Convention from some of the embarrassments of their present situation. The law by which the Convention was convened evidently contemplated that their labors would be completed prior to the meeting of the Legislature, and that body in surrendering the Hall, in which they were now assembled, to the use of the Convention, did not suppose that they were depriving their successors of the use of the place in which the Legislature was accustomed to hold its deliberations. It would be necessary, even as a matter of courtesy, to resign to the members of the House of Representatives the use of their accustomed place of meeting, otherwise they would be apt to say that the Convention being on the spot might have procured a place of meeting for themselves. But whether that were a good reason or not, he could not but think that if the Convention retained the use of the Hall it would have a tendency to generate a bad state of feeling between that body and the Legislature. It was always the case where two bodies of that sort came in contact that a kind of esprit du corps was generated between them; and men in a collective capacity would do, in the maintenance of their rights, what individuals in many instances would decline to do.

It had been said that the Supreme Court room might accommodate one or the other of the branches of the Legislature, but he did not believe it was large enough for either; and even supposing that it was, it was known that there were occasions on which it was necessary for both branches to meet in one Hall, and neither the Senate Chamber nor the Supreme Court room was large enough for this purpose. His own idea was that the Convention should take the Masonic Hall. He was willing however to leave the matter entirely with the officers of the State, and to let them decide upon it. If these officers should provide a room which was not suitable for the deliberations of the Convention, they could decline its occupancy; but he thought the better way would be to request these officers to inquire about the matter, and he had no doubt whatever that they would procure a room that would be suitable in all respects. As to the price which was to be paid for such a room it was known that the Convention could not involve the State in any additional debt on that score, because the utmost amount to which they could go was already fixed by law. He understood that when this matter was under consideration on a former occasion the agent of the Hall had offered to let the Convention have the use of it, and to leave the question of compensation to the next General Assembly, so that the matter would be entirely under the control of the Legislature. He believed that one of the delegates from Posey county had intimated that the Convention might designate their own price, and that they could have the Hall. He thought, however, that the better plan would be to leave it to the officers of State to find a place; and should they fix upon the Masonic Hall the Legislature would have it in their power to decide upon the amount of compensation to be paid for it.

Mr. EDMONSTON said he had an amendment to offer which he thought the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) would perhaps accept. It was "that the said officers be requested to have said room prepared for the use of the Convention by Monday the thirtieth instant.

The amendment was accepted.

Mr. BASCOM moved further to amend by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting "that the select committee appointed to procure a room for the sittings of the Convention be authorized to contract with William Sheets for the Masonic Hall, at the rate of one hundred dollars per month, and that they be requested to prepare the same for the use of this body."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BASCOM, it was rejected.

The question was then taken on the resolution as amended by Mr. DUNN, and it was adopted.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, the question being on the final passage of sections ten, eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, seventeen and eighteen, of report number 12, being a report from the committee on the legislative department. Sections from ten to fourteen were read, when,

Mr. MILROY moved to re-commit section fourteen to the committee on the legislative department, with instructions to report the following:

"When the office of any person elected to either branch of the General Assembly is vacated by death or otherwise, or when any board of canvassers at its meeting after an election for one or more members of the General Assembly, that may be elected in any one county, shall certify that there is no election for any one or more of such offices, by reason of a tie, or for any other cause, the Governor shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies. And the General Assembly shall provide by law for empowering boards of canvassers to hear and determine all contested elections for the General Assembly, and for all county offices; and shall also provide a mode by which persons feeling themselves aggrieved by the decisions of any such board, may appeal to the circuit court, and for empowering such court or any such board, when justice cannot otherwise be done, to refer such elections back to the people."

Mr. MILROY said:

Mr. PRESIDENT—It will be perceived that this instruction is in substance the same as that of an amendment that I offered on yesterday, as a substitute for the original section while on its second reading; and I must believe, sir, that had that amendment been properly examined and understood by the Convention, it would not have been laid on the table. Now, sir, I am not in the habit of troubling the Convention in the way of speeches, but I think I have observed a disposition here to vote down or lay on the table without examination, all motions or amendments that are not seconded or enforced by long speeches. I am not a practiced speaker, and would at all times much rather listen to others than to speak myself; and as we have many practiced speakers here who are always ready, anxious, and able to discuss and elucidate all questions that arise among us, I had determined to be a silent listener to all the discussions in this body, and a silent voter upon all the subjects submitted for its decision; but as this is an amendment which I deem of much importance, and one too which if adopted would not only greatly promote wholesome legislation by often keeping party spirit out of our legislative halls, but one which would save the State thousands of dollars, that will otherwise be spent by the Legislature in settling contested elections, I believe it to be my duty to endeavor to present a few considerations in favor of its adoption.

In the first place, sir, I think the original section is defective from its providing that the Governor shall only issue writs to fill vacancies in the General Assembly. It reads as follows:

"When vacancies happen in either branch of the General Assembly, the Governor shall issue writs to fill such vacancies."

Now, sir, I am of the opinion that if this section is strictly construed, as all Constitutional law should be, it will preclude the Governor in every case, from issuing writs of election prior to the meeting of the General Assembly; for I conceive that there cannot properly be a General Assembly until the members elected to seats in that body, assemble together at the place designated, and are found to possess the proper constitutional qualifications, and are sworn into office; then, if this be the case, it makes no difference how many vacancies occur in the offices of members elected to the General Assembly, between the time of their election and the meeting of that body; the Governor would have no power to issue writs of election to fill these vacancies until after its meeting, and thus counties would be disfranchised and deprived of representation for perhaps the greater part of a session. I think the section should also provide specifically for cases where there may be no election, by reason of a tie, or from any other cause. But, sir, the reason why I consider the original section most defective is, that it does not provide any mode for settling contested elections, prior to the meeting of the General Assembly; but permits all such contests to be delayed until after the meeting of that body, and then to be settled by it at an immense cost to the State; when all such contests could be much better and much more speedily settled, in the counties where they originate, by the boards of canvassers, at little or no cost. And, sir, there could not be selected more proper, just, and competent tribunals to settle contested elections, than the boards of canvassers in the respective counties, where such contests originate; for the reason that these boards are always composed of steady, honest, intelligent men, from every part of the county, who are selected by the people in their respective townships or election precincts, with reference to their honesty and integrity, irrespective of their party doctrines; and men, too, in whom the people have entire confidence, which is manifested by them, placing in their hands the sacred trust of the ballot box.

Among some of the disadvantages, or rather evils that flow from the General Assembly settling contested elections for seats in its own body, may be enumerated, 1st. They always engender a bitter partizan feeling in the Legislature, very injurious to the enactment of good laws, for, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, these contests are between individuals of the two great opposite parties of our country; and the members of the General Assembly, knowing nothing of the real merits of the contest where it originated, will take sides with one or the other of the contestants, according to the party to which they belong; thus the two parties square off against each other, and become excited, and will stop at no means, fair or fowl, to carry their point; and the examination into the respective claims of the two disputants, which should be conducted with coolness and impartiality, results in a death struggle between the two parties, in which the real merits are entirely lost sight of; the parties become embittered against each other, and the breach between them widened, and members become so blinded that every subsequent measure or proposition that may come before the Legislature, will take a party cast, and they will vote for or against it, according to the politics of the person who may have introduced it, regardless of its merits, and thus wholesome legislation is sacrificed upon the altar of partyism. For the proof of this, I need only refer to the history of such contests, both in our National and State Legislatures. 2d. The county or counties in which such a contest may originate, are disfranchised and deprived of representation until the contest is settled, which may not be till a large portion of the session has passed. We had an example of this in the contest that came up here from Union county, for a seat in this body, at the commencement of this Convention, which was, after some time, referred back to the people of that county for settlement, and it was thus deprived, for several weeks, of a delegate upon this floor. 3d. The settlement of such contests by the General Assembly, always costs the State a large amount of money, not only in the pay of members, clerks, door-keepers, and all other expenses incidental to a session of the General Assembly; but in sending for witnesses and procuring testimony perhaps from a distant part of the State, and the people of every county in the State are taxed to raise this money which is squandered in settling contests, each one of which only interests the people of the county where it originates, and could be settled by the board of canvassers, or the people of that county in one-tenth part of the time, and at a hundredth part of the cost. It does seem to me that the retention of such a system of settling such contests, is not only impolitic, but unjust and absurd. 4th. The settlement of such contests by the General Assembly, takes up the time of that body from its proper legitimate business, in deciding matters purely local. It is the general determination here, that the new Constitution shall prohibit local legislation, and yet gentlemen seem disposed to leave with the Legislature the determination of all contested elections for seats in its own body, which contests are necessarily local questions, and questions, too, which must always distract, and have a most baneful influence upon wholesome legislation. Why it is that such a system, so pernicious to pure legislation, so costly in its operation, and so inadequate to do justice, is sought to be retained, to me is incomprehensible.

Among some of the advantages and benefits that would result from having contested elections settled by boards of canvassers, may be enumerated—1st. All such contests would be settled prior to the meeting of the General Assembly, and every member would come up here with a clear and an undisputed right to his seat; and no county would be without its due representation, save by resignation or the dispensation of Providence. 2d. If the settlement of contested elections was given to boards of canvassers, such contests would be heard and determined by much smaller juries, or bodies of men, than if left to the Senate, to consist of fifty men, or the House of Representatives, to consist of one hundred men. Such boards seldom exceed fifteen men, and could, therefore, act with greater promptness and dispatch; for it is an old and a true saying, which we see clearly demonstrated by our snail-like progress in business, that "large bodies move slow." 3d. Every such contest would be settled in the county where it originated, and where the witnesses reside, and the cost would therefore be comparatively but trifling, and would be a tax only upon the people interested in the settlement of such contest. I might mention many other advantages that would result from settling contested elections by the board of canvassers; leaving the disputants the right of appeal to the circuit court; but, sir, I think it will be apparent to every person, upon reflection, that this is the most reasonable, practicable, and just method of settling such controversies. And, sir, this method could be extended to the settling of contested elections for the offices of Representatives or Senators, from districts composed of two or more counties; and, indeed, sir, I see no reason why it may not be extended, with equal facility, to the settlement of all contested elections, both for district and State offices, as well as to those of a single county. For it very seldom happens that the cause or causes for contesting an election for any State office, originates in more than one county of such district, or the State; and if the board of canvassers in that county were authorized to re-assemble, and determine the exact number of votes that each of the contesting parties was entitled to in such county, it would end the contest. And if the causes for contesting any such election should originate in two or more counties, the boards of canvassers in each of such counties could be re-assembled in the same way, and each determine the vote of their respective counties, and thus settle the contest.

This section which I propose, also requires the Legislature to provide a mode by which any person, feeling himself aggrieved by the decision of any such boards, may take an appeal from such decision to the circuit court. And to provide methods by which such courts and boards of canvassers may, where justice cannot otherwise be done, refer contested elections back to the people; from whose decision, when clearly expressed, there is no appeal, and to which every aspirant must bow with submission.

I look upon this plan for deciding contested elections, Mr. President, as a very important reform, and I do hope that the Convention will not pass it by without giving it that consideration that it deserves.

The question was then taken on the motion to re-commit the fourteenth section, with instructions, and it was decided in the negative.

Sections fifteen, sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen, were then read a third time, when

Mr. BRIGHT moved to re-commit section 17, with instructions to strike out the additions which had been made to the section by the Convention, and to report it back as it was originally reported. He said he had strong objections to the proviso which had been added to the section—that so much of any law which was not expressed in the title, should be void. Here it was provided that the title of an act should express all that was contained in it. If gentlemen would reflect for a moment, they would perceive that it was scarcely possible that any general law could be passed, which would not be made void, for the reason that the title could seldom comprise all that was contained in the act. Gentlemen could not find a single law on the statute book that would not be rendered void by such a Constitutional provision. He could see no good that would grow out of such a measure, while he believed, on the other hand, that it was fraught with much mischief. When the Convention had provided that a bill should be read on three different days, by sections, and that on its final passage the yeas and nays should be required, he thought they had thrown around it sufficient safe-guards to protect the people from fraudulent legislation. He hoped therefore, that the Convention would not finally pass the section as it had been amended, but that they would consent to its re-committal with instructions to report it back to the Convention as originally reported.

Mr. STEVENSON said, he thought the fears expressed by the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr.

Bright,) were not well founded. He could see no difficulty at all which was likely to arise from this provision. It merely provided that each law should embrace but one subject, which should be expressed in the title. There could be no difficulty about this. If it was necessary for the Legislature to pass laws relating to a variety of subjects, they could all be provided for in separate bills; and one great advantage resulting from this practice, would be to enable the ordinary reader to understand the laws which were enacted. Now, as to the next part of the amendment, which provided that every law should embrace but one subject, which subject should be expressed in the title, he could see no difficulty in it. All that was necessary, was to put a clear expression in the title, of what the object of the bill was. He thought that gentlemen were alarmed unnecessarily. This provision had been adopted in other States, and for aught he had heard to the contrary, had worked well.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I would ask the gentleman from Putnam, in what other States this provision has been adopted?

Mr. STEVENSON. In the State of Wisconsin, and I believe, also, in the State of New York.

Mr. CLARK. Like the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright,) I have many and great objections to this clause. The gentleman from Putnam thinks that no difficulty can arise under it; but it does not so appear to me. I understood him to say it has been adopted in the Constitutions of some other States, but I believe it has not been adopted in any but the Constitutions of Michigan and California. Our courts have not been called upon to decide upon questions arising under a clause of this kind, and therefore we cannot be said to have any experience upon the subject at all. Now, I think I can show the gentleman from Putnam that this provision means something more than he supposes. It is:—

“Provided, that if any subject should be embraced in any law which is not expressed in the title, such law shall only be void in so far as regards that portion of it which is not expressed in the title.”

These may not, perhaps, be the exact words, but at any rate that is the substance. Now this is an imperative provision; and it just amounts to this—that if all that is in a bill is to be expressed in its title, then the title must be as specific as the bill itself. That is my opinion of it. Courts will be called upon to decide in innumerable instances as to the conformity or the provisions of a bill with its title, which in itself, is a very unimportant matter, but which, when regarded in connection with a Constitutional provision of this kind, becomes all-important, for in nine cases of ten, it will have the effect of making a bill void in all its main provisions. It seems to me that no good can accrue to the people from such a provision and that many salutary provisions of law, if this provision is retained in the Constitution, will be rendered entirely nugatory.

Now, although we should find a provision of this kind in the Constitution of California, or in that of any other State, it does not follow that it is therefore right, or that it would be suitable to our situation, and proper for us to adopt it. I take it, that as intelligent men—as those who are framing the basis on which future legislation is to be built—we ought to have a reason furnished to us why we should adopt any particular measure, and adopt it, merely because somebody else, whose situation may be entirely different from ours, has said it was right. Men must exercise their reason, and judgment, and prudence in matters of government. No man ought to perform any act without being able to give a good reason for it, much less any act of government which is to affect all the people of a State. Sir, I should be ashamed of my State if we, in matters of this high importance, are not to exercise our reason, but are blindly to take up with every proposition which has been adopted in the Constitutions of other States. I think that on a question of this kind we may trust as safely to the intelligence of future legislatures, as we may to our own. We must trust a great deal to their prudence and discretion. We trust them to decide upon grave principles of legislation, and yet we are afraid to trust them as to the details of a bill. We are so minute and specific as to compel the Legislature to describe in the title of a bill, everything which it contains on pain of its being rendered of none effect. Sir, this would be a very convenient mode of procedure, if men could read books by their titles; but we know that a man will never gain much knowledge by merely reading the title of a book, neither is it to be expected that we should be able to tell what is in a law by merely reading its title, unless the title is a transcript of the law itself. I hope, therefore, that this section of the article will be referred back to the committee, and that the original section as reported will be left untrammelled by this very doubtful amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON said, from the remarks made by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, he felt himself placed in such a position as to render it necessary that he should, in part, repeat what he had said on a former occasion upon this subject. That gentleman had intimated, in pretty broad terms, that the only reason which had been urged in favor of the passage of this amendment was, that a similar principle had been embodied in the Constitutions of other States. This was far from being the case; and he thought he had urged reasons of a most substantial character, why such amendment should be ingrafted in the Constitution. Take the case of revenue bills. It was usually the case that a majority in both Houses could be found to pass such bills, but if a majority of one House desired to pass a bill which was obnoxious to the other, then it was generally tacked on to a revenue bill and passed in that way. Now, he would ask the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark) how he would remedy evils of this kind? They were evils, it was admitted on all hands, and such as should be remedied. Bills of this kind should not be forced upon the country against the will of the majority, and the Convention ought to provide some means by which a stop could be put to the practice. There was another thing which gentlemen had, doubtless, frequently seen in legislative bodies. A certain set of gentlemen might have a bill which they wished to have passed, but that could not pass upon its own merits. There might, at the same time, be another bill pending, which had merits, but which was yet weak, and the friends of the two measures would join together and pass two measures conjointly, neither of which had merit sufficient to sustain themselves separately. These were some of the reasons why he was in favor of this amendment, which had been added to the section, and he thought they were sufficient to induce the Convention to carry the measure. He did not approve of the proviso which was attached to the section by the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) but he thought it could do no harm. Perhaps it might be well to re-commit the section and strike off the proviso, but he still contended that the provision that each bill should contain but one subject which was to be expressed in the title, was a good one, and would result beneficially in legislation. There was no need whatever, to entertain the fears which some gentlemen entertained. He thought that all the difficulties that were likely to arise from such a provision would be found to exist only the imaginations of gentlemen.

Mr. GIBSON. The section under consideration is, in my opinion, certain to do mischief, and equally certain not to do good: nor does the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) in the slightest degree guard against the evils necessarily and certainly resulting from its incorporation in the organic law of the State. That amendment cannot by any possibility ever prevent any law from being declared unconstitutional, which is in contravention of this section; for the simple reason that if a law would be unconstitutional, because all the subjects in it were not embraced in the title, it would also be void for another reason, that the body of the law embraced more than one subject, and this the amendment does not reach.

The first time my attention was attracted to this subject was during the debates in the United States Senate on the omnibus bill. Some of the opponents of that measure, in arguing against it the objection of multifariousness, had adverted to the fact that a provision similar to the one now under consideration had been adopted as a Constitutional provision in many of the States. To this, it was replied, I think by Mr. Downs of Louisiana, that unmixed mischief had resulted from its adoption; and that a large number of most important laws of Louisiana had been or would be declared void by the courts as embracing more than one object in their provisions.

Instead of being a means of the prevention of legislative fraud, it would, in the hands of a dishonest legislator, be one of the most convenient instruments for its perpetration. Nothing could be easier than in the haste of legislation, and at the close of a session, to smuggle some trifling section into the most necessary and, perhaps, important law of the session, and thus defeat the action of the Legislature and perhaps the will of the people.

Under the stringent restrictions which will be imposed on legislation in the New Constitution there is not the slightest necessity for the section. It is powerless for good and mighty for evil—I am opposed to it in all shapes it may assume.

Mr. NEWMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in regard to the provision under consideration. It provides that no law shall embrace more than one subject, and that subject shall be referred to in the title.

Now take the provisions of a law similar to one we now have, which shall provide that when, hereafter, any person shall agree, in the body of a promissory note or bill of exchange that he will pay the same without any relief from valuation or appraisal laws, and that upon judgment being rendered on such note or bill, the court shall award execution to be levied with such relief, and that upon execution issued on such judgment, the sheriff or other officer shall make sale of property, without any valuation or appraisal.

Now, there are three distinct subjects which may be all embraced in one section—first in relation to the execution of the contract, secondly, in relation to the judgment of the court upon that contract, and thirdly, with regard to the duty of the officer in executing the judgment of the court. Thus there are three distinct provisions that may be contained in a single section. Now, if you take your statute book and read over a few pages, you will find innumerable instances of just the same character. It does seem to me, Mr. President, that the adoption of this provision will work incalculable mischief, that the bar, with all its discrimination would be unable to frame a simple statute of a few sections without almost unavoidably including more than one subject within the provisions.

Why, sir, if you want a bill upon any single subject, you must either have it all in one section, or, if it has a number of separate provisions then you must have a number of small bills, because you can scarcely make more than one section without referring to some other subject that ought to be embraced under some other head. I think those who have made this provision with a general regard to the public good are mistaken in the amount of the good they would accomplish. And, I verily believe, if they succeed in adopting this provision they will inflict an injury upon this country they little wot of at this time.

Mr. NILES. I desire to submit an amendment to the instructions. I will confess that when this matter was first broached yesterday, I was inclined to favor the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Stevenson) in its full length and breadth; but I have since become satisfied in my own mind that it may lead to difficulty and danger. It is highly desirable that litigation should be avoided, and that laws, when passed, should be operative and without mistake. I propose then to amend the instructions by adding the following:

“Every law shall embrace but one subject, and matters reasonably connected therewith, which shall be expressed in the title; but no act shall be rendered void by reason of any defect in the title.”

I do conceive, Mr. President, that no essential difficulty need result from confining a bill to one single subject and matters reasonably connected therewith. That would include all such matters as those referred to by the gentleman from Wayne, while at the same time it would exclude all matters which might be entirely foreign or irrelevant to the main subject of the bill. For example it would preclude the possibility of a bill of divorce being attached to a bill providing for the appropriation of money, or for any other specific or private purpose. Then I apprehend that it would not be either necessary or prudent to require that a perfect epitome of a bill should be included in the title. With such a provision as that proposed by the gentleman from Putnam, it would certainly require the careful examination of a good lawyer in nine cases out of ten, to say what law is constitutional and what is not constitutional. It is true that under the provision I have suggested it would be obligatory on the consciences of the Legislature to specify as carefully as they could the subject of every bill in its title; but with the provision of the gentleman from Putnam, I ask whether, if the Legislature should err in judgment in this matter, such error would not open the door to endless litigation! It is certainly desirable that this should be avoided; and the amendment which I have proposed will, I think, answer that purpose.

Mr. KELSO. On yesterday we debated this question from morning till night, when it was got into such a shape as many gentlemen on this floor supposed was just the very shape it ought to wear. And now the very men who introduced it and contended for its passage, are anxious to get behind their own work, and send the section back to the committee, in order that that work may be either improved or annihilated. Now this is just of a piece with all that we have done; and I hope that as we have decided upon this question by vote after vote, and have said that the provision is right, we will let it pass and let the people take it as it is.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Niles, and it was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now on re-committing the section with the proposed instructions.

Mr. KELSO contended that the instructions, if carried into effect, would result in the Convention reporting a section exactly like one in the old Constitution. Now he was of opinion that if any amendment was necessary at all, that which had been introduced by the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Stevenson) was the right kind of amendment, and all that had been added by way of proviso was useless and could not do either good or harm. He thought that the proviso had better be taken away entirely.

Mr. BRACKEN moved the previous question, which was not sustained.

Mr. DOBSON said, that if the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) were adopted, it would be saying emphatically to the Legislature, "You shall not at any time put more than one subject in a law; yet if you should happen to do so it makes no earthly difference." The latter part of the amendment destroyed the first. It was no kind of use, and he hoped the Convention would not agree to refer the section with the amended instructions.

Mr. OWEN. Notwithstanding the criticism of the gentleman behind me (Mr. Dobson) and the remarks of the gentleman from Switzerland, I must assert that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Laporte has an essential meaning, and that it is a useful and important amendment. Now I have heard no reply made to the argument of the gentleman on my right (Mr. Stevenson), that it is a thing in itself injurious that two or more subjects having no connection with each other, should be embraced in the same bill, or that one bill having merit should be made to carry another one on its back having no merit. I admit, that to the section as it originally stood, there were some objections; but because it was passed in a form which was too stringent, and to which there were objections, that is no reason why we should not now pass it in a modified form. Now the proposition is that every bill shall embrace but one subject, and matters reasonably connected therewith; and that the mere circumstance of a defect in the title shall not invalidate the law. I regard this as one of the most important reforms which the Convention can establish, and with the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) I cannot conceive that there can be any danger of well digested laws being pronounced unconstitutional, or that two, three, four, or five, incongruous subjects will ever be embraced in one bill. This is certainly an important question, for nothing can be more necessary than that we should take every proper step to prevent fraudulent or ill-digested legislation. I hope the motion to refer with the amended instructions will prevail.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I do not know how our courts would construe the words "reasonably connected therewith," but I presume that they would, in most instances, decide that whatever the Legislature had done, was "reasonable."

In regard to the remarks made by the gentleman who was last up, (Mr. Owen,) he observed that it was improper to make a bill having merit carry another one on its back which had no merit. Why, sir, I contend that if there is anything wrong in the world it is that a meritorious bill should be made the hack-horse or vehicle to carry an injurious measure along with it. I should most certainly wish to see all bills embrace but one subject which should be expressed in the title. We have adopted a provision in the Constitution, or if we have not yet adopted it there, there is every probability that we will do so, that all laws shall be general; and is there any great impropriety, or will there be any great inconvenience in expressing in its title the provisions of a general law? You cannot ingraft upon a general law any private matter under such a provision; and I do think that the idea, as it has been suggested here, that our courts will determine our laws to be unconstitutional in consequence of the title being defective, and not clearly pointing out the body of the bill, is all "gammon," and I am in favor of retaining the original section.

Mr. KELSO. When this proposition was under consideration yesterday, I took no part in the debate, but contented myself with voting against it at the time. Now what is the evil which is sought to be remedied by this proposition? It is that when a bill is introduced, and the title expresses the character of the bill, it should not, by way of amendment, be loaded with other subject matter differing from that originally introduced, and made part and parcel of it, or that the merits of one bill should not be made to carry the demerits of another.

Now the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) gets up, and with much assurance—I mean nothing offensive to that gentleman—gives us his views in regard to the matter, and says, in effect if not in words, "You have adopted a correct idea, and if you don't follow it out it is no fault of mine." And he further expresses his surprise at the remarks made by myself and the "witticism" of the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson). Now neither of us said much, but I feel quite satisfied that what we did say was as much to the point as the remarks that fell from the gentleman from Posey. Now the object of this provision is to prevent the covering up, by a title, in one law, matters which do not appertain to its true character, and are not legitimately part and parcel of it; and the gentleman from Posey says that no difficulty can arise if you provide that a law shall embrace but one subject, and matters reasonably connected therewith. Now we all know that under the old Constitution laws were sometimes passed of an incongruous character, the incongruity being covered up sometimes by the words "and for other purposes," these words being part of the title. But, sir, let me ask, how was this done? I undertake to say that no man who ever came to this Hall with a desire to legislate honestly, and for the good of the people, ever attempted to palm a provision upon the Legislature in this sly and insidious manner. No honest man would do it. No man would do it who was willing to stand up before the Legislature with a fair, honest proposition. It is only dishonest men that make such attempts, and to be always expressing fears that this will be done, is saying but very little for the judgment of the people in choosing their representatives. I maintain that there is but one good reason why the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) should be adopted: and that is, that the Legislature may put into any bill "one subject;" and having done that, that they may then put into it as may more as they please. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Posey is mistaken if he supposes this amendment would effect his object. What would be the result of it? We have corporations out of number already in existence, and we cannot destroy them. They have vested rights, and neither this Convention nor any other body, can disturb those vested rights. And these men would eternally be seeking opportunities of slipping in little matters to subserve their interests, now that we have forbidden special legislation, the very thing which almost to a man we have come here to prevent. Yes, sir, under this provision they will always be slipping in amendment after amendment, and having them carried through on the credit of the title. They will effect in that way, the very things which the Legislature would not touch if proposed to them in their true character. That, sir, is doubtless the reason why the section was introduced.

Mr. NAVE said he regretted very much to see the excitement which appeared to pervade the Convention, on a question of so much importance. Gentlemen had spoken of impositions that had been practiced upon the people heretofore, by introducing matters into bills which were irrelevant, and had instanced two or three cases of the kind to show that the section as amended on yesterday ought to be adopted. Now admitting that all the cases referred to had occurred, would all of them put together amount to as great an injury to the country as to have one general law declared to be unconstitutional? It seemed to him that they would not, for in their whole operation they could only affect a few individuals at most. The arguments adduced to the Convention, therefore, in support of the provision which had been contended for, seemed to him to fall far short of being sufficient to sustain it. He believed that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Laporte, if carried out, would do away with all the objections which had been urged against the proposition of the gentleman from Putnam. Why then not compromise the question, and let it be incorporated in the Constitution? Why not re-commit the section, with the proposed instructions? He would call upon gentlemen to reflect for a moment upon the consequences which would result from general laws being declared unconstitutional in consequence of a mere defect in their title. It would affect every portion of the State, and in many instances would impose the additional duty upon the Executive of calling an extra session of the Legislature for the purpose of amending the law, so as to have it enforced upon the people.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I move to amend the instructions, by adding the following:

"Every law and joint resolution shall be plainly worded, in the English language, and shall not refer to any other law or joint resolution in explanation or extension of its provisions."

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. There is a section already reported by the committee, which I think obviates the necessity of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Marion. I will read it, for his information.

"No act of the General Assembly shall ever be revised or amended by a reference to its title, but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted, and published at full length."

I think that will remedy the evil sought to be removed by the gentleman from Marion.

Mr. MORRISON. That section does not cover the ground I take at all. It says nothing whatever about the mode in which laws shall be worded.

Mr. CLARK. I do not anticipate that we shall be entirely overrun by the Dutch, and why should we enact laws in any other language than the English? I think such a provision would be a reproach, both to all future Legislatures and to our posterity. Surely we do not contemplate that the English is to be superseded by any other in this country? But if such a misfortune should happen, if the State of Indiana should become entirely French or Dutch, why then I suppose their legislators would be of the same nations, and doubtless they would provide for the wording of the laws in that language which they were best able to understand.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from Tippecanoe misapprehends my meaning. I would ask him whether "ne exeat," or "ex post facto," or "capias ad respondendum," or "capias ad satisfaciendum," with a variety of other law phrases, are plain English, and whether words could not be found which would equally express their meaning to the ordinary understanding?

Mr. CLARK. I will answer —

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Lockhart) has the floor.

Mr. LOCKHART. I have thus far been a listener to the debates upon this question, and would not at this time presume to trespass upon the patience of the Convention a single moment, were it not that honorable members in different parts of the Hall have pronounced the introduction of the section under consideration, an innovation—something new. It may be new, sir, to those who are not familiar with the proceedings of many of the Constitutional Conventions held in sister States; but to the anxious inquirer who seeks information wherever he can find it, this proposition is not new. The gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) read to the Convention, a section from the Constitution of California, substantially the same as the one now under consideration. From an examination it will be found that the new Constitution of Kentucky has the same provision in it. [Several voices—"yes, and a half dozen other States."] Several gentlemen say half a dozen other States have adopted the same provision in their Constitution; this then, sir, is not as new a proposition as gentlemen who oppose it seem to imagine. But whether it be old or new, is not the question. Our inquiry ought to be, is it proper to ingraft the provisions of this section in our organic law? That some such provisions ought to form a part of the Constitutional law of the State I have no doubt. Whether this section is the best that we could adopt, I am not prepared to say; I am however willing to vote for it. It will do much to produce uniformity in our laws, and in many instances prevent ruinous litigation. There are numerous instances where laws have been stealthily repealed, or stealthily enacted, that could never have received the sanction of the Legislature, had this section been in the Constitution. The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) referred to a case, where this species of legislation was prevented. The gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Stevenson) referred to another case. It may not, sir, be amiss for me to refer to the scene that was enacted in this Capitol, I believe during the session of 1839—'40. I allude to the difficulty between the two Houses of the General Assembly, in passing the revenue bill. The House of Representatives became satisfied that there was something wrong in the conduct of one of our fund commissioners, and made every laudable effort to displace that officer. In the Senate equally strong efforts were made to retain Milton Stapp in office. Between the friends of Stapp in the Senate, and the friends of the State in the House of Representatives, the revenue bill was defeated. So great was the excitement, sir, in the Halls of legislation at the period to which I refer, that it became necessary in order to raise any revenue, that the law of the preceding year should be continued in force by a joint resolution. Had this section been in our present Constitution, none of these difficulties would have occurred. But sir, it is said that the practical effect of this section will be to render legislation uncertain, and that it will be productive of endless litigation. I cannot believe, sir, that the fears entertained by gentlemen who oppose this section, on this ground, will be realized. I feel confident, sir, that there can be no difficulty in framing laws under this section. The section provides that "No law shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title."

Is there any difficulty in understanding this language. For example, an act is passed relative to the State University; the subject matter is easily understood, and can without difficulty be expressed in the title. If the title of the act should be "an act relating to the State University," would any one pretend that all necessary provisions relating to the State University could not be embraced under this comprehensive title? So, sir, with every other "subject." I believe, sir, that this section can do no harm, but that it will be productive of much good. I repeat, sir, that I have no doubt, but that this section will prove a valuable check upon improvident legislation. I therefore yield it a hearty support.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Morrison, it was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now on re-committing the section, with instructions as amended.

Mr. KILGORE. So far as regards a portion of these instructions I cannot but think that they are right; and I am far from supposing that difficulties will occur which many gentlemen seem to suppose will result from their adoption. The Legislature will unquestionably be governed by the provisions of the Constitution, which may be adopted; and if we adopt the principle that no law shall contain more than one subject, each member, having been sworn to support the Constitution, will support that as well as its other provisions. Every gentleman, therefore, who might be sent to the Legislature, would feel bound to see that there was but one subject embraced in any act. Not only so, but if a law was passed embracing more than one subject, it would be in violation of the provisions embraced in the first part of the instructions, and would be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. It is perfectly immaterial what gentlemen may say in regard to the title, I think the provision unnecessary. If the provision of the gentlemen from Laporte is adopted, I think it might do good, because it would not operate so as to make a law unconstitutional, as in the instance cited by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman). I do not think that part of the instructions which relates to the title, would make the matter any worse, but I look upon it as being wholly useless.

The question was then taken on the motion to re-commit the section, with the instructions as amended, and the yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, were taken, with the following result—yeas 57, nays 66:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hitt, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Maguire, Mather, May, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Ristine, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Spann, Tannehill, Taylor, Walpole, Watts, and Zeno—57.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Crawford, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogin, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, March, McClelland, McLean, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mower, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Elliott, Wallace, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wundelich, and Yocum—66.

So the motion to re-commit the section with instructions did not prevail.

Mr. DOBSON moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to strike out the proviso. The proviso was, that if any subject was embraced in a law which was not expressed in the title, the law should only be void in regard to so much of it as was not so expressed. Now there seemed to be a difficulty about this matter, and men's minds did not appear to come to a satisfactory conclusion concerning it. He believed that the section was right previous to the adoption of that proviso, although he had no doubt that it was introduced by the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) with the best intention. The object of the proviso was undoubtedly to avoid difficulties in carrying out the law, but it appeared to him that it would have a directly contrary effect, and would create difficulties rather than obviate them; for this reason he moved to recommit the section, with the view of getting rid of this proviso. The balance of the section, he thought, was all right.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson said, that he had moved to insert that proviso in order that the other portion of the section might be made as harmless as possible. He considered the whole of the addition to the section as being full of evil, and had voted for its recommitment, with the instructions offered by the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles). He was sorry that that motion did not prevail; and if he was right in his view of the matter, he could not but believe that when gentlemen had had a few years experience of the workings of the provision introduced by the gentleman from Putnam, (Mr. Stevenson,) they would regret that they had not voted with the minority on this question. The object of the proviso was to save the general features of an act; and that the only part of an act that should be deemed unconstitutional, should be that which was not expressed in the title, so that frauds might not be committed.

Mr. PETTIT. I listened all day yesterday, and I have listened all this afternoon, to the discussion which has been held on this subject. I have said nothing myself, nor is it my intention to say a great deal now. I want this question of legislation to be fixed up precisely to suit those who are in the habit of finding fault with lawyers. However, I have no doubt that many of us might obtain certificates from our judges, (myself included,) that we are no lawyers at all. ["Consent! Consent!" and laughter]. I say that I am not disposed to quarrel with the section as it now stands. I hope it may be allowed to be passed as it is. The Convention have evidently determined to pass it as it is, as well as the following one, which I think is still more objectionable. Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that if we pass this section as it now stands, requiring that but one subject shall be embraced in an act and that that subject shall be designated in the title, it will cause more litigation than all the other provisions of the Constitution put together. Now I say this deliberately, and upon reflection. I, however, understand gentlemen to say that they want it so any how; and if they want it so, why so let it be; I am willing that they should have it. I am not disposed to offer any resistance to it, for I clearly perceive that it would be useless; but I tell gentlemen that if we live to see this Constitution in operation for five years, we will see the Supreme Court crowded with cases, to determine whether one or two or more subjects are embraced in a bill. That is precisely what we will see. Now I go further, and say that there is no necessity for this provision at all. If we were going to continue to legislate under the old Constitution, then this provision might perhaps have been necessary. But what is the necessity for it now? What can be the necessity for it? You have determined, and already declared, that each bill shall be read three times by sections, and that three several votes shall be taken upon it by yeas and nays, unless a majority of two-thirds of either House in which it may happen to be, shall decide to dispense with the yeas and nays upon two of the readings, but that no power on earth shall suspend the law requiring the yeas and nays on its third reading. Now in addition to this, you must have sixty-seven men in the House of Representatives and thirty-four in the Senate, before you can pass a bill. This is determined by another provision upon which you have agreed; and besides this, you have a further provision that it shall require not only a majority of each body to form a constitutional quorum, but that a majority of all those elected to each House shall be required to pass a bill. Now with all these precautions and restrictions, let me ask whether there is any necessity for saying that bills that are read three different times on three different days, and voted upon each time by yeas and nays, and every man thus made responsible, shall need this provision to embrace in them only one subject to be expressed in the title, in order to guard the interests of the public? Sir, whatever necessity other gentlemen may perceive for such a provision, I must confess that I can see none whatever. Now I say to gentlemen who are in favor of this proposition, that they are only drawing upon themselves a steel trap, into which they will eventually get their feet. I do not know how much credit for integrity and honesty of purpose those gentlemen may be disposed to accord to me, but I tell them in all candor, that they are injuring themselves. The thing is plain to be seen. Suppose that a law is passed securing some right to a man in this or that part of the State; his neighbor violates that right, and is sued for the violation. He replies, "I will contest that matter with you; the law securing what you call your right is no law at all, for it embraces more than one subject, and consequently it fails in its effect." If the provision were to pass at all, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson would be a good one. But if it should pass as amended, the result would be litigation arising out of almost every act of the General Assembly. The first question would be, are there two subjects embraced in the bill? and a long argument would have to be gone into to decide that matter. That being determined the next question would be—if there were two subjects, which of them was covered by the title of the bill? Thus an everlasting scramble would be going on, involving interminable law suits. There seemed to be a disposition on the part of the House yesterday, as well as there has been to-day, to incorporate this provision into the new Constitution. All I have to say is, that if others can live under it I can; but I know very well that those gentlemen who argue so strenuously for it now, will find out its evil effects before they have lived under it many years.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. Judging from the vote just taken upon the subject under consideration, we must presume that the title of the law is to override and abrogate the law itself. Strip the question of the veil of sophistry, which its friends have thrown around it, and it means just that, and nothing more nor less.

Sir, what is the language of the proposed section? It is that, "Every law shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in the title."

Now, sir, what does this really mean? Clearly this, that if the title of the law, and the law itself, cannot both stand together, the title shall prevail over the law, or in other words, that the whole is unconstitutional and void.

Can it, I ask in all soberness, be possible, that in the middle of the nineteenth century, under the meridian splendor of political and literary attainments, in the age of progress and reform, a wise Constitutional Convention will ingraft so silly a section on the organic law?

I hope not. It cannot be seriously intended that if the draftsmen of a law should from any cause, fail to perfect in every particular, the mere title, while the law may be entirely perfect, and imperiously demanded by the country, shall, owing to the defect of the title, which amounts to nothing, be held unconstitutional.

For the purpose then, of testing whether the title of the law, or the law shall stand, if both cannot harmonize together, I move to recommit the section with the following instructions:

"Provided, however, that if the title and law cannot both stand, the title shall not defeat the law."

Mr. BRACKEN. It is very evident that the Convention cannot come to any satisfactory decision upon this question to-night, and I therefore move that the Convention adjourn.

A division on the motion being called for, there were for the motion, ayes 46, against it noes 47.

So the Convention did not adjourn.

Mr. RITCHEY. I am anxious to have a vote taken upon this section; and after the lengthy discussion we have had upon it both yesterday and to-day, and believing that every gentleman has now made up his mind, I will endeavor to put a stop to it, and therefore, with the view of testing the feeling of the Convention, I will move the previous question.

The call for the previous question was not sustained.

Mr. BERRY. As this section appears to be regarded as a very important one, and as gentlemen do not appear to have made up their minds entirely upon it, I think it would be better that the Convention should not act hastily. I will therefore move to re-consider the vote taken on the engrossment of the section.

The motion to re-consider was adopted.

Mr. BERRY. I now move to re-commit the section to the committee on the legislative department.

Mr. READ of Clark, moved to amend the motion by adding the following instructions:

"No private or local bill which may be passed by the Legislature, shall embrace more than one subject, and that that shall be expressed in the title."

Pending the question on the motion of Mr. Read,

The Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, DEC. 13, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. HULL.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HALL moved a suspension of the order of business for the purpose of enabling him to offer a resolution to rescind the rule setting apart Saturday for the introduction of resolutions.

The question being put, a division was called for, and by ayes 58, noes 19, the order of business was suspended.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Gibson—

Mr. BORDEN said, that it seemed to him that this rule ought not to be rescinded. Saturday was the only day upon which gentlemen could, by resolutions, lay before the Convention the views and wishes of their constituents.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution must necessarily lie over until to-morrow.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY,

The first thing in order being the motion to re-commit section sixteen of the report of the committee on the legislative department, with instructions to amend so as to provide that every private or local bill shall embrace but one subject, and that to be expressed in the title.

Mr. NILES moved to amend the instructions by directing the committee to insert the same provision which he had submitted yesterday under another aspect of the case, namely: that every law shall embrace but one subject, and the matters reasonably connected therewith, which shall be expressed in the title, but no act shall be rendered void by reason of any defect in the title.

Mr. PRATHER moved that the instructions be laid on the table.

Mr. NILES requested the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment to enable him to make a few remarks.

Mr. PRATHER withdrew the motion.

Mr. NILES. It seems, sir, that there are two parties upon this question, both of whom, it appears to me, are inclined to go to extremes. The one party seems to have a kind of horror of all manner of legislation, and to be desirous to place upon it every check and trammel within their power—even to the extent of making the validity of every act a subject of litigation in the courts. The other party seems to think that our prosperity depends very much upon the abundance of our legislation.

Now, sir, I do not agree with either of these parties, I do hold—the opinion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) to the contrary notwithstanding—that it is wise and proper to require the votes of a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the General Assembly to pass a bill. I look upon that as a truly conservative measure—a reasonable check upon hasty and indiscriminate action. It is true, sir, that under the operation of such a rule useful legislation may sometimes be postponed. But it is also true that it will tend to prevent the repeal or modification of laws before their usefulness has been tested. The good resulting from the greater permanency which will be given to our legislation will, in my judgment, outweigh any temporary inconvenience which may be anticipated from the stringency of such a rule. Our laws should not change with every change of the moon. I cannot anticipate from it the serious danger which some gentlemen seem to apprehend. A similar rule has prevailed in the State of New York for several years past, and no essential evil seems to have resulted. Indeed, by their former Constitution a majority of two-thirds was required to pass bills of a certain class, and even that did not operate very injuriously.

Then again, in opposition to a large number of the members upon this floor, I hold that it is important to make our legislation direct and simple, and that every law should embrace but one subject, and matters naturally and reasonably connected therewith. The exemption of a certain amount of property from sale is reasonably connected with the subject of executions, and though an act might not be declared void under the original section, for connecting such a matter with a provision subjecting real and personal property to sale on execution, it would seem desirable to avoid all grounds for litigation upon any such points. If it be objected that the word "reasonably" is too indefinite, I answer that it would be obligatory upon the consciences of the Legislature, and that it would certainly prevent all danger of utterly incongruous matters ever being associated. It would not have permitted a bill settling the boundary of Texas to be connected with one for the admission of California. I think it clear that we should not permit a system of legislation, such as has sometimes, and to some extent prevailed, under which parties in different portions of the State, or different interests, could combine together to carry through two measures, neither of which could succeed upon its own merits. Neither should we permit an important and useful measure to carry through an obnoxious one. Indeed, sir—to use a term which has recently come into vogue—I am opposed to all omnibuses in legislation.

While I believe all this, I do not believe that it is consistent with the interests of the people that the validity of a bill should be made, as under the original section, to depend upon its title. Such a rule would flood the country with litigation, and benefit only lawyers. It would, as was well said by the gentleman from Crawford, (Mr. Pepper,) make the title overrule the bill. It is, doubtless, wise to require of the Legislature, in good faith, to express the subject of a law in its title, but I would not adopt a rule which would oblige them to call in the best lawyers in the State to determine what title would be sufficient, or which would render the judgment of the most discriminating lawyer in the world uncertain. By adopting the proviso which I have suggested we avoid all incidental evils of this kind, and may safely presume that the Legislature will carry out the spirit of the section in good faith.

Mr. RITCHEY. I have some doubts as to the propriety of adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte. If I recollect the language of the instructions moved by him it is that the bill itself shall not be vitiated by a defect in the title. Now I presume that it is within the recollection of almost every member of the Convention that a few years since a certain bill was passed relating to the settlers on the Wabash and Erie Canal—and a most infamous bill it was—and one which required the exertion of extraordinary power on the part of the Governor of Indiana to prevent being carried into effect. And, sir, if the proposition of the gentleman had been in force at that time that law would have gone into effect. There would have been no possibility of preventing it. The title of the bill was good enough; but it was so specious and so deceptive that members were not aware of the nature of the bill. Under such a provision as this such a bill might pass again, and it would be beyond the power of the Governor to interpose a barrier, because the title might be thrown aside, and still the provisions of the law would be operative and binding.

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay the instructions upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the instructions, and decided in the affirmative.

The question being on the instructions as amended—

Mr. WATTS inquired if it would be in order further to amend the instructions.

The PRESIDENT replied that he was informed—not having been in the Chair yesterday when the original instructions were moved—that the motion to re-commit was made separately, and this being the case the question must be first taken upon the motion to re-commit.

Mr. KELSO demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I rise merely to request the gentleman from Franklin to withdraw the motion to re-commit, for the reason that if the committee report back all the amendments referred we shall have the same ground to travel over. In order to save time I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion to re-commit. He can then move any proposition that he chooses as an amendment, and let the Convention take a direct vote upon it.

Mr. WATTS. I shall go against re-committing, believing that the section is just as it should be—that there is just enough of it as it is.

Mr. KELSO. I shall vote against re-committing for the reason offered by the gentleman from Dearborn, and that is, that we have the section here ready for amendment, and that re-commitment is not necessary.

Mr. BERRY. No question having been taken, I believe I have a right to withdraw my motion to re-commit. I made the motion to re-commit without instructions, in order that the committee might perfect the section and then report it back, thus saving the time of the Convention. But as gentlemen are not content that this course should be taken, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BORDEN. I renew the motion to re-commit without instructions.

Mr. BERRY. The motion being renewed, in order to make the matter as short as possible, I demand the previous question.

The question being upon seconding the demand for the previous question—

Mr. RITCHEY asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I would like to know what will be the effect of the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. The previous question, if sustained, will bring the Convention to a direct vote upon the engrossment of the section.

Mr. WALPOLE. I understand that the question will be first upon re-committing. The order of putting the questions being first on re-committing, then on amending, and if there be no amendment, then on engrossing.

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman will look at the rule he will see that the motion to re-commit is the last in the catalogue but one.

The motions, according to their order of precedence, are to adjourn, to lay on the table, to postpone indefinitely, to postpone to a certain day, to commit or amend.

The question is, will the Convention second the demand for the previous question?

Mr. OWEN. I ask if it be now in order to introduce a resolution of which I gave notice yesterday, and which has reference to this very matter?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it will not be in order, as the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. BORDEN. I would like to have the yeas and nays on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BERRY. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MOWRER. I renew it.

The demand for the previous question was seconded by the Convention, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being upon the re-commitment of the section, a division was called for and there were yeas 50, noes 35.

So the section was re-committed.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the instructions as amended.

Mr. PETTIT moved to lay the instructions on the table.

Mr. DOBSON. I merely wish to ask what have become of the instructions which I sent up.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair was not aware that the gentleman had offered any.

Mr. DOBSON. Yes, sir, I proposed to instruct the committee to strike out the proviso.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark, that perhaps the gentleman's instructions were offered at a different stage of the section.

Mr. DOBSON. I suppose that my instructions have gone to the dead letter-box.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. Mr. President, what has become of the instructions which I sent up.

The PRESIDENT. I suppose, sir, they have shared the fate of the instructions of the gentleman from Owen.

Mr. PETTIT. I move to lay all the instructions on the table. That will include the instructions of the gentleman from Owen, and the gentleman from Crawford, if any such instructions are before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. Gentlemen must perceive that this conversation is entirely out of order.

The question being on laying the instructions on the table, a division was called for, and by yeas 58, noes 19, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. DOBSON. I now move the instructions that I have heretofore proposed, viz., to strike out the proviso.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will please send up his instructions in writing.

Mr. DOBSON. They are there in writing now.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will send up his instructions in writing if he wishes them to be attended to.

Mr. DOBSON. Certainly, I will do so in a moment.

Mr. PETTIT. I arise to a question of order. The subject has been committed without any instructions, and a separate motion is now made to instruct the committee. My point of order is, that the instructions must lie over for one day. It is a separate resolution, and an imperative one.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark, that a resolution referring a subject to a committee must lie over one day, but it is within the province of all deliberative bodies, to instruct a committee at any time, and such is the motion now made.

Mr. PETTIT. All deliberative bodies have not such rules as we have.

Mr. WALPOLE. This I understand to be the point of order: that inasmuch as the subject has been re-committed, it has passed from the possession of the House. As long as it is before the House, a motion may be made to re-commit with instructions, but having passed out of the possession of the House, the gentleman now cannot follow it up and move instructions in reference to it.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remark to the gentleman from Hancock, that it is the practice in all deliberative bodies, to instruct their committees after subjects have been referred to them.

Mr. WALPOLE. That is unquestionably true.

The PRESIDENT. That is the present case, and laying one set of instructions on the table, does not preclude the offering of another.

Mr. KELSO. Will the Court indulge me in making a remark. [A laugh.] Pardon me, I mean the Convention; but, sir, it is more like a Court than a Convention, and more like a mob than either. ["Consent."]

Now I understand this to be the true condition of the question. While a motion to re-commit is before the Convention, we may accompany it with instructions, and you cannot under our rules, divide the instructions from a motion to re-commit. But if there is a motion made to re-commit without instructions being connected with the motion at the time, you cannot afterwards instruct the committee. The question that I put is: can the instructions assume any other character than that of an independent resolution?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has already decided that it is within the province of the Convention to instruct the committee.

Mr. KELSO. Not by separate resolution I think.

Mr. DOBSON withdrew his motion to instruct the committee.

Mr. OWEN. Is it now in order to introduce a resolution upon the subject, of which I gave notice yesterday?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. OWEN. Then I offer the following:

"The previous question shall not cut off a motion to commit previously made."

I remind the Convention, that upon the engrossment of a section, a member has a right to move to amend it. If the previous question be called at that stage, the effect is to bring the Convention to a vote, first on the pending amendment, and then on the engrossment of the section; so that when debate is closed, we have a right to select from among the various propositions before the body, that which we prefer; but a section being upon its final passage, if the previous question is moved, it not only arrests debate, but cuts off also all motions to re-commit. Then we must either suffer debate to go on interminably or be deprived of the opportunity to vote upon the only form of amendment that can be offered at that stage. The Convention has refused, again and again to order the previous question, not because it was unwilling to put a period to debate, but because under its operation there would be no opportunity to vote upon the instructions by which it was proposed to amend. I think the Convention is prepared to alter the rule.

Mr. KELSO. I am, perhaps, as much opposed to the use of the previous question as any member of this Convention. If there is anything that I despise above another on the face of the earth, it is that which presents itself in the shape of a rule to suppress debate here or elsewhere. I am for the fullest latitude of debate; but there are many gentlemen here who, when they get tired of debating themselves, are ready to call the previous question; and we have an iron rule by which we are governed, that when a bill is upon its second reading and amendments are pending, if the previous question is called, the vote shall be taken upon the amendment then pending; and we are prohibited from offering other amendments. The pending amendments having been disposed of, we are then brought to a vote upon ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading. But these very gentlemen who are so willing to call the previous question, and stop debate, after sleeping for a night, perceive their error and come back here in the morning and move to re-commit the bill, and, without giving time for a moment's explanation, demand the previous question, and take a vote upon the proposition.

The bill is afterwards reported back and subjected to a second consideration, which, together with the delay incident upon these forms of proceeding, occupies more time than would have been sufficient to perfect the bill in the first instance, if opportunity had been afforded to effect the necessary amendments.

Mr. OWEN. It is quite true, as the gentleman says, and as we all know, that the previous question will cut off debate—what is the remedy? It is to vote against the previous question. I believe I have not voted for the previous question more than once since we have been in session. But let me put this case: Suppose a bill is upon its third reading; a motion is made to re-commit; a large majority are in favor of the motion; but suppose a certain number of members are resolved that they will debate it until the patience of the House is utterly exhausted; what remedy is there, under our rules, except to move the previous question, which, in such a case, as the rule stands, defeats the will of a majority of the Convention? Gentlemen may complain of the effect of the previous question just as much upon the engrossment of a bill. If the principle of voting first on amendments be right upon the engrossment, it is certainly right upon the final passage, also.

Mr. BORDEN. I understand the purpose of the rule to be this: when a section is upon its final passage, and a motion is made to re-commit with instructions, and the previous question is moved and seconded, it will not cut off the motion to re-commit with instructions, but the Convention will proceed to vote upon that motion as upon the main question. It seems to me that the rule is very proper, and that it ought to be adopted.

The question being taken on the amendment to the rule, it was adopted.

The Convention then took up on their third reading the several sections from ten to eighteen inclusive.

Mr. KELSO moved to re-commit the 18th section with instructions to strike out that part of it which required the votes of a majority of the members elected to each House to pass bills.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and being taken were—yeas 39, nays 91—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Beach, Bidle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hogan, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Mather, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Mowrer, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Robinson, Spann, Tannehill, Walpole, Watts, and Zenor—39.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Balingall,

Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Bracken, Bookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliot, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—91.

So the section was not re-committed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to re-commit the 16th section with instructions to strike out as much of the section as exempts members of the Legislature from civil process during the session, and for fifteen days previous thereto, and upon this motion he asked the yeas and nays.

I will remark, said Mr. H., that if the section be amended as I have proposed, it will then be left precisely as the section stands in the old Constitution. I presume there is no gentleman who can imagine an instance of hardship which has resulted from the provision that members of the General Assembly are exempted from arrest except for breaches of the peace. I can enumerate instances where the exemption would operate as a great hardship upon the citizen who has a demand against a member of the General Assembly; but as I have already, on a former day, referred to this subject, I shall not at this time detain the Convention with any lengthened remarks.

It will be recollected that according to the policy which prevails in Indiana, no courts are held between December and April, so that a case can hardly be thought of while a member of the General Assembly would be interrupted in the discharge of his duties here during the session of the Legislature; and the right to serve the process prior to commencement of the session, may be a matter of the utmost importance. I am of opinion that the convenience and advantage resulting from the privilege of serving the process upon the member compared with the inconvenience, would be as ninety-nine to one. If no serious inconvenience has resulted from this provision in the old Constitution, I do insist that the provision should not be changed.

Mr. EDMONSTON. The gentleman from Dearborn says that no inconvenience has grown out of this provision in the old Constitution. I can tell that gentleman that I have seen great inconvenience occasioned to a Senator from Spencer county, as honest a man and as prompt in the discharge of his obligations as any man in the State. Some difficulty had arisen between him and a man in New Albany, concerning a claim which was set up against him, while he was of opinion that he owed the man nothing. The New Albany man, instead of going to Spencer county to commence his suit, waited until he came here and then had process served on him, and he was subjected to the inconvenience, when the time for trial came on, of traveling all the way from Spencer county to attend court here.

Mr. HOLMAN. That case came on after the adjournment of the Legislature.

Mr. EDMONSTON. That is true; and the disadvantage is, that he was subjected to the service of process at this inconvenient distance from his own county, where the trial ought to have been had.

Mr. READ of Clark. I am satisfied that the provision ought not to be adopted. If it affected the interest of members of the General Assembly only, I should have no objection. But if I understand it, it is to operate to the disadvantage of the constituents of members, by preventing their representatives from discharging the important duties entrusted to them. I think it is proper to throw this protection around the representative; not on his account, but on account of those who send him here. I am opposed, therefore, to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn.

Mr. RITCHEY. I was once fool enough to purchase a patent right; afterwards the people sent me up to serve in the Legislature. A man with whom I had had some business transactions, found out by the newspapers that I had been elected a member of the General Assembly. He came on here, and one day I was invited out of the Hall and served with a process by a person who I did not know. I found out that a suit had been commenced against me for debt, and you may be sure that I felt somewhat disconcerted. I was here among strangers; there was no one who knew me, or was acquainted with my circumstances at home, and I had not the money to satisfy the demand. I did not know to whom I should apply to become my security. It was really an awkward predicament. The suit might just as well been instituted against me at home. I was ready there, to meet any demand, and to satisfy any demand that was just. But in consequence of the circumstance that the suit was prosecuted here, I was obliged subsequently to come back and attend the trial. And I was subjected to all this inconvenience to gratify the malice of an individual who, perhaps, imagined that he could extort money from me by proceeding in that way.

The gentleman from Clark has well said that a man who is elected to the Legislature owes a duty to the people. His services belong to them, and they have a right to demand that he shall be exempted from everything that will interfere with a discharge of that duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is well known that there are several gentlemen in this Convention who have served in the Legislature, and who have had experience in matters of this kind. And what is the testimony that they furnish us? Let me call the attention of gentlemen to these two cases: the gentleman from Dubois has said that he knew of a case where a member of the Senate was served with process, and after the adjournment of the Legislature was obliged to come from Spencer county for the purpose of defending the suit. The case is the same with every private citizen trading through the State. He is subject to civil process, under certain circumstances. But mark the fact in this case: the trial did not come off until after the adjournment. Now the gentleman from Johnson admits that in his case the debt was a just one, but he had not the money. The effect of the proposition that is proposed to be incorporated in the section, will be this: that the right of action for the recovery of a just demand, shall be suspended during the time that the Legislature is in session, and for fifteen days preceding the commencement of the session.

Mr. RITCHEY. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him in regard to the case that I mentioned? I did not say that the demand was just; I said that I was driven to the necessity of either paying the demand or of entering a defense to a suit commenced in this county, and having a trial here, and perhaps having an appeal from the decision of the circuit court, and rather than be subjected to such inconvenience, I paid the amount which ought never to have been paid. I was driven to this necessity from the fact of the suit being instituted in this county, when it might as easily have been commenced in the county where I resided.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman had not the same conveniences here that he had at home. But had he came for the purpose of the transaction of his own or any other business he could have been equally liable to any civil process. I will however say this, that in a very large majority of instances the circuit court will not be in session during the time that the General Assembly is sitting, so that no man will be compelled to answer to civil process until after the adjournment of the General Assembly, when his public duties are ended. But I can suppose numerous cases where the service of civil process is necessary for the protection of private rights.

Besides, sir, it does not always happen that the people elect men who are honest. They sometimes may elect a man who would be desirous of enjoying this peculiar exemption; and, also, when the exemption is terminated, would be out of the way; who just before the adjournment of the General Assembly would take care to remove himself from the jurisdiction of the courts, and great injustice could be done to his creditors.

Mr. ALLEN. I am opposed to the re-commitment of the section, and as gentlemen are relating instances, I will mention one which occurred to one of our senators; and it furnishes one of the reasons that induce me to go against the re-committing of the section. A senator from our county started on his way to the capital. He staid all night at a village on the way, and although he started before day next morning the constable was after him, and he arrested him. The senator was obliged either to go back and answer the claim, or give security. He stopped at a good old democrat's house—the very last individual in the State who should have been victimized. The old gentleman went his security, and the result was that just previous to the adjournment of the Legislature the senator left for parts unknown, and his poor old democratic friend had to pay the debt. I think that if such a provision as this had been in existence, this occurrence would never have taken place, because the senator would at that time, it being within fifteen days prior to the meeting of the Legislature, have been exempted from arrest. And I think it would have been better for his creditors to have lost their debt than that this good old democrat should have been obliged to pay it. I think it is proper and right that when a man is elected to the Legislature he should be exempted from arrest for at least fifteen days before the meeting of the Legislature in order that he may prepare himself for the discharge of his duties, and proceed to the capital without being molested by the constable. ["Consent."]

Mr. WATTS. In corroboration of the remarks of the gentleman, and to show the propriety of putting this provision into the Constitution, I will continue the history of the said Senator a little further. He claimed an exemption, not only from civil process, but exemption from the payment of his board bills, and left Indianapolis without paying them. I therefore hope this provision will be incorporated in the Constitution for the purpose of securing the rights of the people here.

Mr. MOWRER moved to strike out.

Mr. MURRAY. A single word. I hold that in addition to the inconvenience to the members themselves in being subjected to process, I hold that every member has a deep interest in the reputation of the body in which he serves. I think the section is precisely right as it stands, I think it will have a happy effect in disembarassing the Representatives, so that they may be free to attend to their public business.

Mr. KELSO. I have a few words to say as to what may probably be the result of the adoption of a provision of this kind. Let us suppose a case: Suppose a man to be elected to the Legislature, and it becomes known far and wide that he is a member. Suppose that he has one hundred and fifty miles to travel to reach the seat of government, and it is known to a creditor of his, that he has but a certain time in which he has to get here, and he takes that occasion to commence his suit. He follows him up here, [a voice, "or catches him half way,"] or overtakes him half way, if you please, and arrests him. Does not every one perceive the inconvenience to which he is subjected in consequence of having a process served upon him at a distance from home? whereas if the suit had been commenced in his own county, where all the circumstances attending the creation of the obligation were well understood, he would have been subjected to no inconvenience, whatever. But when the suit is commenced here, the member is reduced to the necessity of sending all the way home and bringing his witnesses. Now I ask if he should be subjected to all this inconvenience? I think he ought not. I am satisfied with the section as it is. It seems to me that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. BARBOUR. I was about to make the same motion which the gentleman from Dearborn has made. I hope that motion will prevail. I do not know what right a member of the Legislature has to be exempted from the payment of his debts. There may be particular cases of hardship, but that is the fate of any man in the community now. I do not know why a member of the General Assembly should enjoy any peculiar privileges over any other citizen. His body should be exempted from arrest. That is all well enough. But when he comes here, I am not for giving him exclusive privileges in regard to the payment of debts. I do not think he ought to have any such right. When the people elect a man to the Legislature let them elect such a man as will do them no discredit.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to re-commit with instructions.

The Convention refused to re-commit.

The question being, Shall the section pass? the yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 105, nays 20—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mower, Murray, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Simms, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimby, Elliott, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—105.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bourne, Bowers, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Gootee, Holman, Howe, Kelso, Kilgore, Maguire, Newman, Rariden, Spann, and Walpole—20.

Mr. NEWMAN. Pursuant to notice, I move to amend the rules as follows:

"No section of the Constitution shall pass unless voted for by a majority of the members elected to the Convention."

The PRESIDENT. The amendment lies over one day.

Mr. NEWMAN. I gave notice of it on a former day.

The PRESIDENT. No notice has been entered upon the journal.

THE VETO POWER.

The section providing that a bill, when passed, shall be presented to the Governor for his signature—if he approve it, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it originated, which shall proceed to re-consider it; if, after such re-consideration, it again pass both Houses by yeas and nays, by a majority of two-thirds of each House present, it shall become a law, notwithstanding the Governor's objections was taken up on its second reading.

The section having been read,

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved to strike out the whole section, and insert the section contained in the present Constitution, which provides that "bills vetoed by the Governor may be passed by a majority of the members elected," instead of "two-thirds present," as provided in the section under consideration.

Mr. STEVENSON. This section, sir, properly belongs to another article. It belongs to the article reported by the committee on the executive department. This subject was referred to that committee by the Convention, and the committee have reported a section, which will come up for consideration at the proper time. I therefore move that this section be laid upon the table.

The question being put, a division was called for, and by ayes 53, noes 45, the motion was agreed to, and the section was laid upon the table.

The Secretary then read the next section, which provides that every resolution, to which the concurrence of both Houses may be necessary, shall be presented to the Governor, and, before it shall take effect, be approved by him; or, being disapproved, shall be re-passed, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of bills.

On motion by Mr. MORRISON of Marion, the section was laid upon the table.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. Is it now in order to introduce an additional section?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. MORRISON. I move, then, the following as an additional section:

"Every bill and joint resolution shall be plainly worded, avoiding, as far as practicable, the use of technical terms in the Latin, or in any other than the English language."

[Cries of "No! no!" and "Consent."]

I hear a slight murmur of "no," in regard to this section, and I shall ask permission, therefore, to say a few words in reference to it. From the use of verbiage, with which the law is encumbered, and technical terms in Latin and other languages, it requires a lawyer to interpret every enactment that is made by the Legislature. I need only refer to almost every chapter of the law to prove this fact. Now, sir, I want that kind of language made use of which will put the meaning of those laws within the reach of justices of the peace and private citizens. I desire that such language shall be employed as may be readily understood by every citizen who is bound to obey the laws.

[Mr. MORRISON then referred to and read various clauses in which Latin phrases are used.]

Now I would like to know, (continued Mr. M.) why plain English would not do just as well. There is no language more copious than the English language. I think we should lend our aid, at least, to bring this matter to the consideration of the Legislature. The laws ought to be so plain that every man can interpret them for himself, without the aid of a law dictionary. This is a reform that has been called for by the people. They are loudly complaining of the complexity of the laws, as well as of the manner in which they are administered—of the pleadings in the courts, and of the use of terms which are not comprehended by the unprofessional. I hope that this provision will be adopted.

Mr. NILES. I do not pretend to controvert the proposition, that it is desirable, as far as possible, not only in legislation and in constitution making, but in all writings of whatever character, to use simple, plain, old Anglo-Saxon household words. But, sir, I do not, for that reason, hold that it is proper to expunge from what the gentleman calls the copious English language, one-half of that language itself. I do not hold that it is well because a portion of our people, at the present moment, may not perfectly understand the meaning of words which, by common, universal use, for centuries past, have become part and parcel of the English language, to forbid their use in future. It is one thing for the Legislature or for constitution makers, to use the simplest and plainest words that they can use, and another to say to the people of Indiana, that for all time to come they shall be prohibited from using, in the law, certain words, which are as appropriate as any words in the language can be, and which have acquired a definite technical signification, merely because they have a Latin prefix or termination.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I ask the gentleman to refer to the section which I have proposed. It does not require any such thing as the gentleman seems to infer.

[Mr. MORRISON read the section.]

Mr. NILES, I beg pardon of the gentleman. I did not notice the precise phraseology of the section when it was read a few moments since, and I inferred its character chiefly from his remarks. I supposed it to be imperative, otherwise I should not have risen to say a word on the subject. But while I am on the floor, I must be permitted to say that I am inclined to oppose it, even in its present form, as a useless incumbrance upon the Constitution. I do not imagine that such a provision can be necessary or useful. If it means nothing we ought to reject it. If it means anything more than what common sense and common honesty would dictate to every legislator, it is so far pernicious. It is no more necessary than it would be to require that the professors in your State University should teach their pupils to write in good, plain, strait forward English. You might with equal propriety reject the technical names which are used in Chemistry and the arts, because they are derived chiefly and with slight modifications from the Greek. The very copiousness of our language, which the gentleman so justly and so highly values, as is known has grown out of the contributions it has received from the Latin and Greek and other foreign tongues. As you elevate the standard of education, and send up to these Halls competent men, they will adopt the simplest language they can use, as a matter of course. I do not think there is any propriety in our sitting here as school masters, to teach our contemporaries or more especially our successors what kind of words they ought to use.

By carrying out the policy suggested by the gentleman, of excluding Latin words, you would only introduce endless confusion instead of securing simplicity. Most of the Latin words used in our statutes are merely names, and the difficulty is in understanding the thing, not the name. The word subpoena is Latin in form. The word action is Latin with the simple addition of the letter n. There is an hundred times more difficulty in understanding the word Action as a legal term than in understanding the word sub-pœna. Both words are convenient, appropriate and useful. Certiorari is a somewhat long and hard sounding name. But why abolish a name which has been used for centuries, and the meaning of which is definite and certain, for the sake of introducing a long and awkward circumlocution, which would be no more intelligible? Most of these Latin words, such for example as viva voce, are as well understood by all as any words in the language. Why then reject them? We might as well, instead of calling George Washington by the name by which we have always known him, require a brief description of his person and history of his life whenever he is spoken of. By rejecting the arbitrary name which has been long and universally adopted you sacrifice both brevity and certainty. The same thing would be true of many of the words and phrases used in our statutes. Certainty of all things is most important in the law. Let us not then deface the Constitution by introducing a provision that will produce confusion instead of doing good.

The question being on the adoption of the section proposed by the gentleman from Marion;

The yeas and nays were taken and resulted—yeas 109, nays 21—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Elliot, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—109.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Barbour, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Hall, Holman, Huff, Kelso, Kilgore, Nave, Niles, Robinson, Thornton, and Wiley—21.

So the section was adopted.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford then moved to amend the section by adding a proviso, to the effect that the laws may be published in the German and French language for the benefit of those who cannot read English.

Mr. PEPPER. It will be observed that it is not made compulsory upon the Legislature that they must publish the laws in the German and French language, but it gives them the right, if they think proper to do so. The section which has just been adopted precludes that right.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. Notwithstanding all the gentleman's legal attainments, I beg leave to dissent from his opinion; the amendment that has just been adopted contains no such prohibition. It does not preclude the publication of the laws in such manner as they may see fit to direct.

The question being on the adoption of the proviso,

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford asked for the yeas and nays.

They were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 98, nays 25—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliot, Farrow, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—98.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beach, Bourne, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Conduit, Davis of Parke, Dick, Duzan, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Helmer, Kendall of White, Logan, Morgan, Murray, Schoonover, Snook, Steele, Thomas, Wiley, and Mr. President—25.

The question then being on ordering the section to be engrossed for the third reading—

Mr. KELSO. I do not believe that gentlemen have sufficiently reflected upon the character of the section which has just been adopted. We shall soon come to the section which prohibits the passage of an ex post facto law. I can hardly suppose that gentlemen will be in favor of striking out that term and supplying its place by English words that will have the same meaning. It would require three or four lines to do it. In fact words enough can hardly be strung together to supply the place of that brief phrase. Well now if they would retain this, why may we not as well retain the word "certiorari," and other Latin words. There is scarcely a farmer that does not know their meaning as well as we do.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. (Sotto voce.) There are scarcely fifty who do.

Mr. KELSO. To express the same in English would require quite a number of words. For instance, instead of saying a writ of certiorari, we would be compelled to say a writ to certify the record up to a superior court. There certainly can be no utility in abandoning the use of these well-understood phrases.

Mr. BASCOM. I did hope that this matter would pass over without debate. But there are a few lawyers here and they must always have something to say. They tell us that if the Latin phrases are stricken out it will take a great many English words to supply their place. Sir, I care not how many words are requisite, I want language employed that men who are not versed in law can understand. I know that it will be resisted by the members of the legal profession, for it will steal a little of the trade of those lawyers who hang around the county seats. [A voice. "That is it exactly."] But we have been long enough governed by lawyers. I am not in favor of compelling an honest and plain citizen, who understands nothing about legal phrases, to travel up to the county seat and pay a lawyer five dollars to explain a provision of the law. The whole system requires changing. The people throughout the State demand that all these technical terms—all these absurd and antiquated phrases shall be abandoned. Why, you might just as well put in Dutch phrases. Dutch will be more readily understood by the people of my county, than Latin. In my district we have no Latin scholars, but we have a good many Dutch.

A MEMBER. What is viva voce in Dutch?

Mr. BASCOM. The Dutch for viva voce is lebendige sprach.

SEVERAL VOICES. "Repeat it again."

Mr. BASCOM. Why, sir, a mere glance at these technical terms is sufficient to show that there is no necessity for using them, that they may be easily interpreted into good plain and intelligible English; then every man may be aware precisely what the law is.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the orders of the day, the pending question being on ordering the following section to be engrossed for a third reading:

"Every bill and joint resolution shall be plainly worded, avoiding as far as practicable the use of technical terms in the Latin or any other than the English language: Provided, that the Legislature may publish the laws in the French and German languages for the benefit of those who cannot read English."

Mr. STEELE. When the Convention adjourned this morning I desired to offer a few remarks in relation to the section, and also relative to the manner in which the Convention has voted upon it. We well recollect the vivid remarks made by the gentleman from LaPorte; and that he anticipated too much in the offset—namely, that he supposed the section itself contained something more restrictive upon the Legislature of the State of Indiana than it really does. I would further notice that, in voting for the original proposition, the vote of the Convention stood quite different to what it stood in relation to the amendment. The cause of this difference must be obvious to every gentleman. In the section as introduced by the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Morrison,) it cannot but be recollected that, on calling the yeas and nays, almost every gentleman within the bar voted against the section; and when the amendment came from the gentleman from Crawford, which in itself contains nothing—for I hold it to be a provision that means nothing, and which can only encumber the section itself—we find those very gentlemen who opposed the section voting directly for the amendment. Now this proves something. At least it is obvious to my mind that the section contains a great deal that counteracts the feelings, and the interests, and the practice of the gentlemen of the bar, while the proviso itself contains nothing—and they know it. [Laughter and great applause, and "say that over again."] Yes, sir, I have no hesitation in repeating it—they knew that it contained nothing. We all know that the gentlemen of the bar are supported by those very technicalities which the gentleman from Marion wishes to abolish—those foreign terms which are the very idioms of the bar. The gentlemen of the bar well know it; and for that very reason they voted against the section and for the amendment, with the view of breaking the section down. Yes, sir, they well know—for they are gentlemen of quick understanding, and I will give them credit for all they deserve—that the amendment of the gentleman from Crawford contains nothing, and therefore they could easily vote for it. Now, sir, in proceeding, I will remark that the great object of our assembling here is to effect a reform in every particular, and that assertion has dropped from the mouth of almost every gentleman on this floor during our proceedings. We want a reform in the executive, the legislative and the judiciary departments. Yes, sir, no reform is more greatly needed than a reform in the judiciary department. Such has been the language, such the motto, of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit); and I have no doubt that when we come to the subject of our courts, he will show you that he goes for very extensive reforms. Well, if this is the great object of our assembling here and remaining here so long, I will say to the gentlemen of this Convention, that in the short section offered by the gentleman from Marion there is the germ of a most complete reform—that is, the simplification of our laws; to write and indite them in plain English that can easily be understood by the yeomanry of the country. We are all well persuaded—every intellect on this floor, and more particularly the gentlemen of the bar who have had so much practice, and who boast of so much learning—and I regret that I am not able to keep tally with them on that score—I fall very far short indeed, although I have had some small experience in law reading, some small practical knowledge—I say that we are all aware—I have been aware of it for these last twenty years—that these “jaw-breakers,” as we call them—[a voice—“that’s the word,” and “go ahead,” and “knock ‘em down”]—these jaw-breakers are put into our statutes to prevent the honest yeomanry of the country from understanding them. [Ironical cheers.] They cannot understand what the law is; and the object of the gentleman from Marion is to effect a reform in that particular. His proposition is one that is easily understood; it is rational in itself; it is reasonable in every direction of the human mind, that we should have our laws written in our own language. Perhaps, at this point, in order that I may better explain my views, I may give an anecdote. [“Consent, consent,” and “let’s have it.”] The circumstance took place in a fire-proof office in the town of Wabash. I won’t say that it was in the Recorder’s office, but it was very near it. The conversation happened to turn upon the manner of doing business in the Senate of the United States; and a gentleman of the bar said that the mode of doing business in Congress was shorter and easier than that adopted by our Legislature. Being asked to explain the reason why this was so, he replied that they worked there altogether by “quassi” committee. [Great laughter.] “Quassi committee,” replied a gentleman who was standing by, and whom you would not have supposed was over-intelligent, “quassi committee!” said he, “in the name of God, what’s that?” [Roars of laughter.] I have heard of standing committees, and of select committees, and of committees of vigilance, but I never, in all my life, heard of a committee of “quassi” before.” [Uprorious applause and laughter.] “Why,” said the gentleman of the bar, turning round to the man, “the thing is very plain; ‘quassi’ means as if; that is, ‘as if in committee.’” “O,” said the man, “if that is the meaning of the word, it is very plain; but it would have been quite as well to have used the plain English words ‘as if,’ and it would have been shorter, too, for you would have saved a letter in the operation.” [Bursts of laughter.] Now this simple fact—this one occurrence—proves to me the necessity, as far as practicable, of giving the laws of the country in plain English to the people. For this reason I go against the indefinite postponement of this section. I am very sorry—and my vote proved it at the time I gave it—that gentlemen have embarrassed this section with the amendment of the gentleman from Crawford.

Gentlemen, I usually sit here very passively, but I am not blind, either naturally or in the eye of the mind; and during the investigating of this amendment, I could see some chuckling in this Hall, that proved to me that the object of that amendment was to break down the original section. But, sir, I would even take the section with the amendment rather than lose it. And if it has friends in this Hall—men who intend to progress in the work of reform—I hope they will sustain the section as proposed by the gentleman from Marion, even if it should go with the amendment itself upon it, for that amendment can do neither harm nor good. With these remarks, I will conclude by simply saying, that I expect the friends of the section will support it through evil and through good report. [“Consent, consent,” and applause.]

Mr. PRATHER. I have not made many speeches in this Convention, and it is not my purpose at this time to make a very long one. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the section now under consideration, and I hope it will not prevail. I cordially agree with the views entertained by my young friend over the way (Mr. Bascom) on this question. He thinks that it is important that these technical terms should be dispensed with, and I would go with him that far. And it may be further said, they are unnecessary to a large portion of the people. And why should they be so tenaciously adhered to? There are a great many technical terms used in all associations, as well among professional men, as among mechanics and farmers. Now I want it distinctly understood that I am down on all these technicalities. Were I a scholar, I would read and give the definition of some of the technical law terms, I will however leave this to some one learned in the law. I will however read a paragraph from a newspaper, which will I think put this matter in its proper light, at least so far as the printers technicalities are concerned. It appears that they have a singular set of technical terms which must trouble plain men very much to understand. Here is the paragraph, and by permission of the Convention I will read. [Cries of “read,” “read.”]

“PRINTER’S LANGUAGE.—Every profession has its technical terms and of course the printers have a smart smattering which is intelligible only to the craft. The following, says the Delaware Republican is a specimen; it does not mean, however, as much as would seem to the uninitiated:

Tom put General Washington on the galley, and then finish the murder of the young girl you commenced yesterday. Set up the ruins of Herculeñeum—distribute the small-pox, and you need not finish that runaway match—nave the high water in the paper this week. Let the pie alone till after dinner—put the barbecue to press, and then go to the devil and he will tell you about the work for the morning.”

Now, I hold that it is just as important that these technical terms should be dispensed with as that we should dispense with legal technicalities. I am a farmer, and am quite willing to abandon all those old words that I have been raised on, and become so familiar with. They too may be called technical phrases. If the lawyers and the printers will agree to do the same, and will make a kind of compromise of the whole concern. Now we farmers, when we drive our teams are willing to dispense with “gee,” and “haw,” and to say “go right,” or “go left.” [Great laughter.] These are plain terms and easy understood. We will dispense with “wo,” and say “stop,” or ——— [The nearest the reporter can get at the expression is zie, zie, zie, and to use the words “go along.”] [Renewed laughter.] These are all technicalities, and must be troublesome. I hope the matter may not be indefinitely postponed; but that we may have a kind of compromise of the whole subject. Without jesting, Mr. President, I see no good reason why these Latin law phrases could not be dispensed with, and the English used in their places. A simplification of our common law practice, is loudly called for, it is one of the principal reforms demanded by the people; that, together with a few other reforms were all they did demand or expect. It was never expected when this Convention was called by the people, that when it met, it would make an entire new Constitution, but that such amendments as had been spoken of through the papers, and discussed before the people by the candidates for the Convention, would be as amendments to the old Constitution. If this course had been adopted, we could have been through long ago, and saved a large sum of money to the people. I hope this question may be duly considered, and not indefinitely postponed.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I am not in the habit, Mr. President, of making speeches to this Convention, for I am one of those who entertain the opinion that they do not effect much good; but I cannot refrain from expressing the opinion that this section ought not to be indefinitely postponed. Gentlemen may turn it into ridicule, and make fun of it as they please, but I conceive that it is a measure of great importance. It is a question, sir, in which my constituents, and those of many other gentlemen on this floor feel no small degree of interest.

Mr. PRATHER. I hope the gentleman from Randolph does not mean to insinuate that I would ridicule a measure of this kind.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I have not said that the gentleman from Jennings would do anything of the kind; but the Convention will of course entertain its own opinion of the matter after hearing the speech with which that gentleman has just favored the Convention. He being a farmer would doubtless speak in earnest on the subject, knowing as he must know, that the farmers have to pay the cost of a great many of these Latin phrases.

Now what is the proposition before the Convention? It is simply that the laws of the State shall be written and published in the English language, so that men who have received an English education may understand them. That is the simple question, whether you will let every man set up for himself, and understand the laws, or whether you will write your laws, or a portion of them so as to prevent those who are not educated in Latin and Norman French from understanding them, and thereby make it the business of a certain class of men to expound these mysterious expressions.

Now, sir, it has been objected that there are some phrases which cannot be turned into English; and that they convey a meaning which the English language is too meagre to supply. “Ex post facto,” for example, is said to have a legal meaning which cannot be rendered into English. Then, sir, if it cannot be explained, do for heaven’s sake, let us keep it in Latin, and let it stay there. [Laughter, and applause.] But if it can be rendered into English, (and I think it can,) why then let us have it in that language, so that the common stock of the country may understand what it means. Now, sir, we have been referred to Nero, to Lucius, Stolo, to Nicholas of Russia, &c., and a hundred others, as well as to various parts of the world, in times past and present, in order to obtain illustrations of the workings of different systems of laws. Sir, I regard this as being all wrong—utterly erroneous. The only thing which it is our business to contemplate here is the practical effect of a measure in the State of Indiana, and not what it was in England, in the reign of Queen Anne, or in Rome in the days of Nero, or in the days of the heathen empires long gone by. The question is, how will any measure affect the people of the State of Indiana; and the simple fact for us now to consider is, will the measure proposed by the gentleman from Marion, be beneficial to the people or not? Sir, we have nothing to do with other countries; our business is to make a Constitution for our State alone. Shall the laws be published in the English language or not? Gentlemen say that there is not power enough in the English language to explain the meaning of many terms that are used in the law, and they give us the word “certiorari” as an example. Well, sir, what does that mean? [Cries of "hear him," "hear him."] We all know that it means "to be certified." ["Hear, hear."] Sir, my constituents understand English, but they have neither time nor inclination to learn Latin, and they want the laws by which they are to be governed written in English. Some of them it is true understand Dutch, and probably others French; and it would be more reasonable, if foreign words are to be used, they should be selected from one or other of these languages. I want to see the man who is capable of holding a conversation in Latin, and then ascertain whether even he would understand these barbarous phrases. Now it is said that the word "certiorari" as applied to a certain writ, is a word which cannot be explained. Why not, I should like to know? Would it not be quite as easy to say "a writ to be certified?" I think so; and I trust that some gentleman eminent for his classical attainments, will give us a little further explanation of some of these hard terms.

Blackstone tells us that the pleadings used to be always in law Latin, but that in the course of time, they were changed to Norman French. Now gentlemen do not contend for the Norman French, but for the Latin, for the simple reason that there is not perhaps one man in the State, who is acquainted with Norman French, although there may be a few who have passed through a college, and have learned a little Latin. Blackstone also gives us a long reason why the judges of the land should be clothed with dignity; why the sheriff of a county should attend him with a great display, and his jurisdiction be secured from contempt, with a great deal of stuff about learning and dignity forsooth! Sir, the reason assigned is, that all this pomp, novelty, and display, has "no small influence on the multitude." Why, sir, do gentlemen tell us that they intend to retain this Latin, and Norman French for the purpose of "influencing the multitude," or awing the masses of the people of the State of Indiana? I think such an assertion will not be ventured here; and yet I hold it that the same reason which requires the retention of these barbarisms would apply equally to all the pomp and parade which attaches to the office of Judge in European countries in the days of Blackstone. Yes, sir, it may do to "awe the vulgar" and "influence the multitude."

Now, sir, in that same law Latin, according to the old books, they used to call a "declaration" a "narratio." Well, sir, has the change injured the community? [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. That is a Norman French word.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Clark for the information, and hope he will teach us a little more.

Blackstone further says, on the subject of using foreign languages:

"Gallia caesidicos docuit facunda Britannos."

Will the learned gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson) give us this in English? Probably the classical gentleman from Switzerland will favor us with a translation? or perhaps the "Delaware Chief" will do us the favor?

I ask you, ye sticklers for Latin, you men learned in "law Latin" to give us a translation. ["Hear, Hear."]

Now what does it all mean? You cannot answer. I am always willing to learn. Probably the learned Delegate from Decatur can explain it? I must own that it is a peg above me. Now there are a great many terms which it is said cannot be rendered into English. For example, "nisi prius." What does that mean? I should say it meant "unless before." Then there is a plea called "nunquam indebitatus." What does it mean? It means "never indebted;" and is it not just as well to say "never indebted" as to say "nunquam indebitatus?" [Applause. I think it is.]

Sir, is it conceivable that men sitting on your judicial benches, with the lives and property of their fellow-men in their hands, and these books before them full of these barbarisms which they say cannot be rendered into English—is it conceivable that such a system should be continued? They surely will not say that they do not understand these expressions. And if they do understand them, is the English language so meagre, so poor that words cannot be found to express those ideas? I do not profess to be a learned man, but I hope that those gentlemen who desire to adhere to technicalities, and to have them placed in the Constitution and laws, will explain them to us as we go along, in order that when we go home with the new Constitution to our constituents, we may be able to explain them in our turn. [Applause.]

Now let us turn to another passage. Here is a definition of a yeoman:

"A yeoman is he that hath free lands of the value of forty shillings by the year, qualified to serve as jurors, where the law requires one that is 'probus et legales homo.'"

What does this mean? A man that owns a horse or so much land? [Laughter.] Is it capable of being rendered into English? If so, I wish to have it translated into English so that it can be understood.

Mr. KELSO. It signifies "a good and lawful man."

Mr. McCLELLAND. Sir, it is just as easy, and I think a little easier, to say "a good and lawful man," as to say "probus et legalis homo." [Applause.] In the same book I find—

"It is further to be remarked with respect to an action for seduction, that none can be maintained in any case by the daughter herself for 'volenti non fit injuria.'"

Now what does "volenti non fit injuria" mean? [Laughter and applause.] Let it mean what it will, I want to have it placed on the statute book in English. Sir, if we are to have these technicalities placed in the Constitution and laws, I want to have a translation of them there also; because, as every body is to be bound by the law, every one should be in a position to understand the law. Sir, unless this is the case you may as well do as Draco did; that is, print your laws, and then place them so high that nobody can read them. [Applause.]

Again we find it said—

"The words must be sufficient in law to bind the parties; as if a man grant "omnes terras certa sua," a lease for years passes not, but freehold only at least "nec per omnia bona sua.""

What does this mean? You do not answer. I suppose you can't tell.

Now where is there a jury, sitting on a case where such law is quoted, who can understand its meaning? Nevertheless juries are required to pass upon the merits of a case when addressed in this kind of jargon.

Here is another—

"Cujus est dare, ejus est disponere."

And another—

"Summum jus, summa injuria." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, gentlemen may well laugh at it, and it may be a matter of laughter to many gentlemen present, but I tell you that with the people this is no laughing matter. It is they who pay for all this. It is out of their pockets that the money comes to pay for translations. Sir, these expressions, if they are necessary, can be as well placed in English as in this miserable Latin; and allow me to hope that this section will be passed as it is. Before I take my seat I would like to say that I should be happy to learn from some learned gentleman why we should retain this barbarous Latin, for I have been informed that it is not real genuine Latin, but even miserable corruptions of that language, and hence we have the distinction of "College Latin," "Medical Latin," "Law Latin," and "Dog Latin." [Great applause and laughter.]

Mr. READ of Monroe. My friend over the way, (Mr. McClelland,) I am informed, is one of the best classical scholars in our body, and in the speech he has just made has been playing off the wag upon us. As a Professor of Latin, I certainly do not feel, in any manner, called upon to defend the Latin of the law books. There are indeed many terms and phrases of law Latin, which I suppose the study of Cicero and other classic authors, pursued however extensively, would hardly enable the student to understand. My friend, I presume, has felt his classic taste offended, and has been disposed to vent a little just indignation at the use of such shocking bad Latin.

I have no objection to the section in the form proposed by the gentleman from Marion—certainly not to it as a rule of taste. The practice of interlarding sentences with words or phrases from the Latin, where they can be avoided, I have never admired. It is much more indicative of pedantry than of scholarship.

But, sir, I do not agree with those who fancy that if technical terms were abolished the difficulty in understanding the subject to which they belong, would in any degree be removed. The difficulty is always in understanding the subject itself, and not in understanding the technical terms connected with it. That is but a small matter. If we are told that air is composed of oxygen, as one of its elements, would it be any plainer if we should translate the word oxygen and say that sour making is one of the elements of the air. If, instead of saying water is composed of oxygen and hydrogen, we say sour making and water making are the elements which form water, how much plainer or better understood would the subject be? If you call a capias a you may catch him, or a take him, there is still the same difficulty in understanding when it may be issued, and you might still be obliged to apply to the lawyer. Just the same difficulty exists if you call a procedendo the writ of go ahead, and a ne exeat, a no go, &c.

Our English is made of all the languages under the sun, oriental and occidental; and if we reject all words of foreign origin, we shall have left us a very slender stock.

We have two classes of words; those which have gone through with the forms of naturalization, and those which are dwelling among us as mere foreigners, and have not yet been recognized as liege citizens.

The word constitution itself is nothing but a Latin word, naturalized by the addition of the final letter. What shall we do with it? [A Voice. Strike it out.] Well, we will take the section before us and see how we will get along without the Latin words, which have been anglicised by slight changes. Here is the word resolution. [A Voice. Strike it out.] The striking out process then will have to go pretty far. We may have some trouble in making a Constitution at all. You have in this short section the words necessary, effect, approved, disapproved, according, rules, limitations, prescribed, and case, all Latin words adopted into English. [A Voice. Well strike them all out.]

Now, sir, there are words which are pure Latin words which we are much in the habit of using. Here is viva voce in the next section. I prefer as a matter of taste the words, living voice, and instead of a viva voce vote, I would say a vote with the living voice—not that one expression would be any better understood than the other.

Here is the phrase ex post facto on the next page which could not be safely displaced. It has a fixed, definite, well established, and adjudicated legal meaning.

The gentleman has mentioned the word certiorari, and says its meaning is to certify. Well, the word certify is still Latin, adopted into our language with hardly a change. That, indeed, is the mode in which our language has been enriched. We take in foreign words, grant them a domicile among us, and at length adopt them as citizens.

But, sir, as a rule of taste, I hold that the use of Latin words ought to be avoided in the laws and Constitution wherever it can be, and that the simplest and most perspicuous language should be used.

Mr. KELSO. I cannot believe but that there is a common sense side of this question.

A MEMBER. That's right, Kelso, let's have it.

Mr. KELSO. Now, sir, my friend in the rear (Mr. McClelland)—and I think they do him injustice when they say he is not a Latin scholar—has told us that this section is in regard to laws that are hereafter to be passed in the State of Indiana.

Now, you may take up the statute laws of the State and examine them, and you will occasionally see a Latin term used. But what is it? Why, sir, it is a mere name. Now, sir, what is the difference, if you call a certain writ by one name or another, if by that name it is equally well understood? Now, if a man wants a capias ad faciendum, every man knows he wants a writ by which he may seize a man's body, in order to satisfy him for a debt.

That writ, sir, has happily gone into disuse in the State of Indiana. Or, if he wants a capias ad respondendum, that is a mere Latin term, admitted to be technical; but we all know enough about it to know that it is a writ that requires a man to answer. Now, sir, these are mere names, and if you search the statutes all through, you will find no harder terms. Take for instance, the writ called Ne exeat, which means, preventing a person from leaving the State.

Well, sir, these are short and convenient terms, and if they are to be dispensed with, I would ask whether it would not be equally as reasonable to require of the Legislature, when they are writing a law in regard to trespassing animals, that, instead of using the word "cow," which is a short and convenient name which everybody understands, they should describe the animal, and say: "animal with horns, which gives milk, and has a long tail," [laughter] so as to make the definition perfectly clear? Or take another case: Suppose that, instead of using the word "hog," they should say: "an animal with bristles, which has a strong disposition to grunt." [Laughter.]

Sir, I ask whether it is not as necessary to change these names, as to change the name of a writ of Certiorari, or any other writ, and thus dispense with these short and convenient terms? This certainly would be carrying the matter out just like the man who had a sign painted with a bear upon it, and, for fear the people wouldn't understand what it meant, he had the word "bear" written under it. [Great laughter.]

But gentlemen say we should dispense with technical terms as far as practicable. I would agree with those gentlemen, so far as regards dispensing with terms that are not convenient; but I will undertake to say that there is not in the statute books of the State of Indiana any term to be found that is not short, and convenient, and useful, and perfectly adapted to convey its meaning. Now, if my friend here had understood the question as he ought to have understood it—or perhaps I might use other words, and say: If he had dealt honestly by us, and had acted honestly as he did understand it, and had gone to the statute books and had examined for himself, instead of "playing the baboon for us"—then he might have given us some information that might have been useful. But instead of doing that, the gentleman has referred to Blackstone, a book which nobody uses but lawyers. We don't expect to make a Constitution out of Blackstone's Commentaries. If he had gone to Chitty, and Story, and Kent, and others, I think he would have both thought and acted differently. We expect that when men come here to make laws for the State of Indiana, they will use as little Latin as possible; and whether they have done so or not, let the legislation of the last fifteen years attest. Had the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) thought of this, I think, without incurring the Constitution with that section, or attempting to incur it—for I have no idea it will pass—he would have been content to let the matter remain as it is. Sir, there is no use whatever in that section. Every man knows it. It is a common sense proposition, that we need not, in the formation of this Constitution, file section upon section, for the sake of dispensing with these short and convenient terms; that we ought not to leave out that which is useful, in order to put something in the place of it which requires twice as much language to make it understood, and when done, in many instances, will not be half so well understood. That is the reason I shall move to dispense with the section entirely. I have done so in serious earnestness; for I believe that the Constitution will be better without it, as well as without many other of its provisions.

Mr. President, one other word. Here is my friend, too, finding a good deal of fault with the law, because, sometimes Latin phrases are used. If he wants to study law without much trouble, he had better fall in with the plan of my friend from Hancock, (Mr. Tague,) and abolish the common law. [Laughter.] I can tell him that he may search the statute book from beginning to end, and he will find nothing of this kind that he need make it a matter of complaint. Sir, let me ask, what does a lawyer gain by it? We, who know the law, must read these books if we would fully understand it. If we can understand these terms, well and good; if we cannot understand them, then that is our misfortune. We all know well enough that a man usually goes to a lawyer for advice, because he does not want the trouble and the labor of going to the books himself to find out what the law really is. If he will go to the statute book, he will never find himself in the least bothered with the Latin that he will find there. But he does not go to the statute book, because he knows that he would not find there more than a five-hundredth part of the law. No man, who wants to be a lawyer, ever thinks of looking into the statute book until he has read enough of common law to teach him the fundamental principles on which all laws should be based. The statute book is resorted to only when you wish to learn the provisions of any given law. What, then, can the legal profession gain by the retention of these Latin phrases? Nothing whatever, in a pecuniary point of view. We do not ask to have the statutes published in Latin. Nothing of the kind. I know as little about Latin as any man here.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I don't know that.

Mr. KELSO. If you know anything at all, you might know it. Now, what can we gain by the retention of these Latin phrases? I have been a lawyer for some years, and I have no hesitation in telling gentlemen that I never studied Latin; and I will tell them further, that any man who studies Latin for the purpose of making himself a lawyer, is a fool for his pains. [A voice—"How do you know that if you don't understand Latin?"] I say that it is of no use. So little of it is used, that a man need not trouble himself with it; and he had much better spend his time in studying the law as it is written now, and the money that it would cost him to learn Latin, in the purchase of books necessary to learn practice. I say again that the profession can gain nothing by it, for nothing can be put into the statute book in English that I cannot understand as well as my more learned friends of the profession. Then, sir, if I understand the law sufficiently without a knowledge of Latin, I apprehend that those who choose to employ a lawyer would come to me as readily as they would go to those gentlemen who have burned the midnight oil in reading Horace, or studying the Orations of Cicero. Would I, then, lose any of my practice by it? Certainly not. If a man comes to a lawyer, and wants to sue a man who has got his property, and who refuses to pay for it, would he sit down in the office and ask him what kind of a writ he would send? If a man were to ask me that question, I should tell him at once I should send a capias ad respondendum. And does any man suppose that a man, asking a question of that sort, would be blockhead enough to say: "O, you can't collect my money with a writ of that sort, because it has a Latin name?" [Laughter and applause.] Does a man come to you and want to know what sort of a writ you will send? No, sir; he comes to you, because he thinks you can get his money for him sooner than he can get it himself. He doesn't care a fig whether you send a certiorari, a ne exeat, a capias ad respondendum, or a capias ad satisfaciendum, or a scire facias, or anything else, so that you get his money. That is all he wants, and he does not trouble himself about the name of the writ you send. I say, then, that this is a matter that ought to be left to the Legislature. If they find it convenient to use a short technical term, let them have the right to do so, and let us not attempt to tie up their hands by such an unnecessary and absurd provision as this. [Applause.]

Mr. MURRAY said that the people whom he represented, had instructed him to vote for a provision in the Constitution, abolishing the use of latin terms in the law. They conceived that the English language was not so barren as to require the use of words from another language. And even if it should require a few more English words to express what might be more concisely expressed in latin, they were of opinion it was still better to take even that circumlocutory method rather than to use terms which the generality of men could not understand. If it was desirable to study perspicuity only then it might often happen that terms and phrases might be borrowed from the Greek or Hebrew languages that would be still more concise than those borrowed from Latin. This however was not the main object to be attained, but rather that the laws should be written in language so plain that "he who runs may read." This was a matter that was as much thought of in his region as any other; and although he did not wish to be understood as opposing science or literature, he could not think but that in a matter of this importance, where the people were to be bound by the laws that were made for them, every technicality should be avoided which might tend to prevent those laws from being thoroughly understood.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon postponing the question indefinitely.

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, were taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Crumbacker, Dobson, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Hall, Helmer, Hovey, Kelso, Kilgore, Logan, Nave, Newman, Niles, Rariden, Robinson, Schoonover, Thornton, Todd, and Wiley—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chero-with, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Colfax, Cook-erly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of

Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—98.

So the motion to postpone the question indefinitely did not prevail.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BARBOUR offered the following amendment:

"The Legislature shall provide by law for the election of a committee of revision to correct the phraseology of acts passed by the Legislature, so as to conform to the Constitution."

On motion the amendment was laid upon the table—ayes 59, noes not counted.

Mr. NILES. I voted in the affirmative on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Crawford, but I must say in regard to the whole of the amendment proposed to this section, that I think it is entirely unnecessary, and that we had better not incur the Constitution with that which ought not to be there. No man perhaps would have any serious objection to the section submitted by the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Morrison,) except from the fact that it is utterly useless, and cannot serve any purpose unless it be the purpose of Buncombe. There is no man on this floor but is conscious of the fact, for a sensible Legislature would never be governed by any other rule. If however we are to have it, I hope we will have it in the plainest and simplest form. I, therefore, move a re-consideration of the vote by which the last amendment was adopted.

After some conversation the motion of Mr. NILES was—

Mr. HELMER. I move to amend the section by adding the following:

"And every Buncombe speech shall be made not only in the English language, but also in the French and German languages, so that all those persons who belong to either of these classes of inhabitants may have an opportunity of reading them in their own language, and of judging for themselves of their respective merits." [Roars of laughter and applause.]

Mr. NEWMAN. I move to amend the amendment just offered, by adding the following:

"And all names commencing with 'Mac' shall be hereafter rendered into good English." [Continued laughter and applause.]

A motion being made to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table,

Mr. KELSO asked for a division of the question, and hoped the question might be taken first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wayne.

The question was then taken on laying the amendment of Mr. NEWMAN on the table.

Which was decided in the affirmative.

The question then re-occurred on the motion to lay the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN upon the table, and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. RITCHEY. I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Crawford, and I now move for a re-consideration of that vote, and I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RITCHEY. A gentleman here has asked me why I have made this motion to reconsider, and as other gentlemen may be disposed to ask the same question, I will answer them all at once, by stating my reason to the Convention. I believe that a majority of the members of the Convention are determined to insert the proposition offered by the gentleman from Marion, or something similar to it in the Constitution; and I see a disposition on the part of many members of the Convention to render the proposition as ridiculous as they can make it. If it is to go into the Constitution at all, I wish to see it go there in as proper a shape as possible. Any man who knows anything of legislation must know that the Legislature will have the power to print the laws of the State, either in the French or the German, or any other language if the population of the State requires it, and there is no necessity, therefore, for such a provision in the Constitution.

Mr. KELSO. Now in reply to the remark of the gentleman who was last upon the floor, that some of us were anxious to make this provision as ridiculous as possible, I must be allowed to say to him, that he is entirely mistaken, for I declare it to be beyond the ingenuity of man to make the proposition more ridiculous than it is. [Laughter.] Now if that section is adopted, with the proviso stricken out of it, we shall be compelled to render all our laws in English, and where then will be your Dutchmen and Frenchmen? Sir, I think it is the best possible thing we can do to print our laws in the language of these foreigners. We ought to make them acquainted with the law as early as possible.

They come here, and we make them voters in six months after they arrive, and yet at the same time we refuse to furnish them with the laws in a language which they can understand, while we require of them obedience to those laws. Now if it is all to be in plain English, and we are to strike out all technical terms, how much of it may be in French or German? Clearly none at all, for you provide that the Legislature shall be bound to render all laws in the plainest English. [A voice—"that is right."] I say that the Frenchman and the Dutchman should be furnished with the laws which are to govern him in his own language. An old Dutchman comes here who has been educated in his own language, and you cannot expect him in the decline of life to go to school and learn a language which he did not acquire in his youth. He might learn the laws and the Constitution of the State of Indiana if he had them furnished to him in his own language. The same then may be said of Frenchmen and other foreigners, who are in the country. I say it is unreasonable to expect them to obey your laws unless you furnish them with the means of knowing what they are. But seriously, Mr. President, I would ask what necessity for all this being engrafted in the Constitution? Sir, gentlemen act and talk here as if all our legislative bodies for the future were to be composed of a set of unmitigated scoundrels—men who do not intend to pay the least regard to the wishes of the people, but to act just as they themselves may please. Sir, I think there is no reason to apprehend that in future we may not have good, and honest, and intelligent men to perform the business of legislation. We have nothing whatever to fear on that score. We are safe without this section, and if it is to be adopted, I say let the proviso go with it.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. Mr. PRESIDENT: I would wish to approach this subject without any excited feeling. I most seriously considered it to be my duty to introduce this matter, and I now most particularly disavow the intentions of making Buncombe, any further than as such a thing may naturally accrue to a man who may do a good action, and who may, therefore, be entitled to the credit of it, if it results in good to the community. The gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) for whom I have always felt the greatest respect, both in regard to his legal and philosophical opinions, seems to think that no good can come of my proposition except for Buncombe. Now, if that gentleman will look to the Constitution of the State of New York, he will find that the language used in that instrument in regard to this point, is almost precisely the same as that which I have offered. Sir, is it merely for Buncombe, or is it to effect a practical and useful improvement in the verbiage of the laws, so as to accommodate them to the language of the people? This is all that I desire—all that I am at; and yet I see a proneness on the part of gentlemen (probably unintentional), to imagine the words in the section to contain more than they really do. The gentleman from Switzerland thinks that the words of the section are so broad as to require that everything in the shape of a Latin word should be expunged from a statute. No such thing; he is entirely under a misapprehension. They require only that the Legislature shall, as far as practicable, use English words in preference to Latin words.

Now, sir, let me allude to another argument against the section which was offered in another part of this Hall—that is, that because certain courts use technical terms, and printers and physicians, and members of other crafts and professions do likewise, it is not, therefore, within the purview of our duty to provide that the laws of the land shall be made in such a way as to be plainly understood by the people. Why, sir, these technicalities affect none but those who are perfectly acquainted with the terms of their trade. I am a printer, and when I go into a printing office, I understand all the technical terms appertaining thereto; but, so far as that is concerned, I am the only person benefited thereby. But these technicalities in the law affect the whole country. It is not to be supposed that men would ordinarily desire to understand all the technicalities of a printer, or of an apothecary—but the distinction is widely different in regard to law making. The gentleman from Jennings (Mr. Prather), says, that he is a farmer, and that if these words are to be changed in the statute book, on the same principle he might be required to change the terms which he uses in driving his cattle. I should be sorry, sir, if the gentleman should be under the necessity of changing his farming vocabulary, and of finding more lengthy substitutes for "Gee," and "Haw," and "Wo;" I assure the gentleman that I had no such intention in my proposition, nor do I think it would bring out such a result.

Mr. PRATHER. The gentleman from Marion did not understand me.

Mr. MORRISON. Perhaps I did not; but that was the impression made upon my mind by the gentleman's remarks. Now, in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Crawford, I think it is irrelevant, but not of such a character as to destroy the effect of my proposition. It is mere surplusage; but even with that amendment upon it, I prefer to have the section engrossed and passed and made a part of the Constitution. I hope that gentlemen will not suffer the trickery of any set of men, who may attempt, insidiously, to defeat the section, to effect that purpose. I believe that there is a determination on the part of the Convention to pass the measure as a matter of principle; and I think that a majority of gentlemen here, have too much good sense to allow dust to be thrown in their eyes, for the purpose of defeating their object.

Mr. WALPOLE. I am one of those who voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Crawford, and I think it is a very proper amendment. During the time that I have had the honor of serving my constituents, both in the Senate and the House of Representatives, I have encountered not a little obloquy in the efforts that I made to have the laws of the General Assembly published in such form as to be available to the foreign population of the State. There are in my county about five hundred Germans, who are wholly unacquainted with the language of their adopted country. Year after year have I introduced a proposition of this kind in the Legislature, though without success. Not only from my county, but from various other counties in the State, have petitions been sent to the General Assembly, praying for the publication of the laws in the German language. In the State of Indiana, I suppose there are about ten thousand Germans unlearned in the English language, and for the last ten or fifteen years, they have been petitioning the Legislature to publish the laws in the German language, and they have as constantly been refused. From all the experience that I have had, I see no other way to obtain this right, unless it be provided for by a Constitutional injunction. As the amendment now stands, it is an absolute direction to the Legislature to publish the laws in the French and German languages. When the gentleman employs the word "may," it is equivalent to a positive direction in regard to all public acts, although, in regard to private acts, it is discretionary with the Legislature.

Then, sir, the gentleman from Marion is mistaken with regard to the spirit that has governed certain gentlemen in rendering their votes; and I was astonished that the gentleman from Johnson (Mr. Ritchey), should have regarded this proposition as a humbug, and evinced a desire to retrace his steps. If you are to accommodate your English population with a translation of every Norman French, Latin, or Greek word that may be used, why not, at the same time, have your laws published in a language spoken by ten thousand people in the State, who cannot read English? It may be contended that these people are not interested in the administration of public justice, and that a thousand things have been enacted by the Legislature, that have a bearing only upon private individuals. However forcible this argument may have been as to the past, it has no force in regard to the future, for our legislation henceforth is to be general, and applicable alike to all our citizens. And, although there may have been a thousand laws of a private character, passed in former years, in which these people could feel no interest; others have been passed in which they were deeply interested—as, for instance, in the mode of acquiring property, the assessment and collection of taxes, and a variety of other important matters connected with the administration of the government which they will desire to understand, without being obliged to go to a lawyer. I shall, therefore, stand by the vote which I gave this morning, that we should have the laws published, for the benefit of that portion of the population who cannot read English, in their own language. Seeing that the Legislature has, year after year, refused to do this, I hope the amendment will stand so as to impose this duty upon them by Constitutional obligation.

Mr. NAVE. I must confess that I have been astonished at the course which gentlemen have taken to-day in regard to this proposition. Sir, what is the supposition which it implies? Why, sir, it supposes that if these Latin phrases are expunged, the entire community of the State of Indiana, learned and unlearned, will become acquainted with the laws, so as to dispense with the necessity of consulting a lawyer. The absurdity of such a supposition is so obvious that it need not be dwelt upon, for I maintain that if every technicality were swept from our law books this very moment, there would not one man more understand law than now understands it. On the other hand, so far from the change hurting those who follow the profession of the law, it would do them a positive good; for the change would inevitably result in so much confusion and misapprehension on the part of the ordinary reader, that he would find it absolutely necessary to resort to a lawyer, and the fees of the gentlemen of the bar would consequently be greatly increased. Every lawyer understands this perfectly well; so that no charge of interested motives on their part in opposing the proposed change can be sustained against them with anything like a show of justice.

Now in regard to publishing the laws in the German language, I would simply remark that I am opposed to striking out the proviso; because I hold that it is unjust to punish men for violating the laws, when you give them no opportunity of understanding what those laws require. Sir, you might just as well adopt the plan of Draco—to print your laws and then place them so high that no man can read them, and yet punish men for their disobedience. I am in favor of publishing the laws in German and French, in order that these people may have an opportunity of reading them in their own language, and of thus acquiring a knowledge of what they provide. If then they violate them, they violate them knowingly, and they are without excuse. I trust, therefore, that the proviso will not be expunged from the section.

Mr. FOSTER. I am in hopes that the motion of the gentleman from Johnson, (Mr. Ritchey,) to re-consider the vote, will prevail. I have been fully convinced of the necessity of this by the remarks of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole). That gentleman has informed the Convention that he made many unsuccessful efforts in the Legislature to have the laws of the State published in the German language. Now I am opposed to having the laws of the State published in any other language than our own, for if we encourage this cultivation of another language, we never can become an homogenous people. What is the course adopted in other countries? Do we find the laws of France published in English for the benefit of the crowds of Englishmen who flock to that country, or the laws of England published in French for the benefit of the Frenchmen in England? No, sir; nothing of the kind; and to do so in our country is only to create, and foster, and sustain those national prejudices which foreigners always bring with them to this country. This country, sir, is regarded as the asylum of the oppressed. So I would ever wish it to be; and when we open the hand of benevolence, and greet the foreigner with a hearty welcome, I think he can do little less than endeavor to learn our language. Sir, we do not want to create a sort of imperium in imperio, by having a nation of Germans or of Frenchmen within the United States; and I hope that no measure will ever emanate from any legislative body to print the laws in any other language than our own.

I contend that it shows a want of patriotism thus to attempt to disfranchise our own language, either in favor of French, or Dutch, or any other. This is all I have to say. I hope the vote will be re-considered, and the amendment rejected; for I should almost despise myself if such a disgraceful provision ever emanated from this Convention.

Mr. HOLMAN. The chief argument which I have heard in favor of the section offered by the gentleman from Marion, is that we should abandon the use of technical terms in our laws, because they are not generally understood by the masses of the people. Now I think the same argument operates with equal, if not with greater force, in regard to the proviso of the gentleman from Crawford. There are in the State of Indiana perhaps ten thousand German voters. There are in the State, entire townships in which none but Germans reside. These townships have all their local business to transact as well as those townships peopled by our native born citizens, and as all laws relating to the management of township business are to be general, it is a matter of importance to these Germans to know what these laws are. In my own county there are one or two townships that are almost entirely filled with a German population; and it is well known that the German emigrant coming to the United States late in life, seldom becomes acquainted with our language. If the object is to make the people familiar with the laws of the country, we should adopt this proviso for the benefit of those who come among us from other countries, and from whom we require the same obedience that we require from our own people. It was well remarked by a gentleman upon this floor, that the law should be brought within the knowledge of every citizen, in order to render just the punishment of disobedience. In that remark I most cordially concur; and I trust the proviso will not be stricken out. I hope that the section will not only be adopted as it now stands, but that the Legislature will put the same construction upon the word "may" as has heretofore been placed upon it in such connection.

The question was then taken on the motion to re-consider, and there were yeas 35, nays 83—~~as follows~~:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Duzan, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Gregg, Haddon, Helmer, Hitt, Kendall of White, Kinley, Logan, McLean, Morgan, Mower, Murray, Niles, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Watts, and Mr. President—35.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chenowith, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Eliott, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kilgore, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Robinson, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—88.

So the motion to re-consider the vote on the proviso did not prevail.

Mr. WATTS. I move to amend the proviso by inserting the following in the proper place:

"And the Constitution, and the decisions of the Supreme Court."

I am in hopes, if it is determined to publish the laws in the German and French languages, that my amendment will be adopted, for the Constitution and the Supreme Court are the paramount law of the land.

By giving these people the Statutes only, we would only be likely to lead them astray. It would be like giving them the law by piecemeal. I am for going the whole figure.

Mr. DUNN of Perry moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to on a division—there being yeas 75, noes 44

Mr. MORRISON of Marion moved the previous question, which was sustained.

Mr. KELSO. If it is not too late, I respectfully ask that we may have the yeas and nays on the question of engrossing the section for a third reading.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows:

AYES.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—104.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Blythe, Bourne, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Dunn of Jefferson, Foster, Gibson, Gootee, Helmer, Hovey, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Logan, Niles, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, and Mr. President—19.

Mr. BORDEN. I wish to have my vote recorded in favor of the section.

The PRESIDENT. Was the gentleman from Allen within the bar when his name was called?

Mr. BORDEN. No, I was conversing with a gentleman outside the bar.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman is too late. His vote cannot be recorded.

Mr. STEVENSON. I offer the following as an additional section:

"The Legislature may confer upon the boards doing county business in the several counties in the State, such powers of a local, legislative, and administrative character, as they shall from time to time prescribe."

Mr. NILES. I would suggest the propriety of this section being referred to the committee on local and special legislation, and move that it be so referred.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, DEC. 14, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. Crumbacker, a Delegate from the county of Lake.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the Governor, enclosing a letter from a joint committee of the Legislature of Kentucky appointed to forward to this body a copy of certain resolutions of the Kentucky Legislature in reference to the resolutions adopted by the Convention in relation to the death of Col. Richard M. Johnson, expressive of their high appreciation of the course pursued by this body on that melancholy occasion.

The communication and resolutions were read, and

On motion by Mr. THORNTON, they were ordered to be spread upon the Journal and published with the debates.

RESOLUTIONS.

The PRESIDENT. This being Saturday resolutions are in order.

The Convention will first take up the resolutions that have been laid over.

The first resolution is that offered by the gentleman from Lake, (Mr. Crumbacker.) The Chair is uncertain whether this resolution has been acted upon or not.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. It has not been acted upon. I am willing to leave it to the action of the Convention without any remarks, for I do not wish to consume time, but I would like to have the yeas and nays upon it.

The resolution was read. It directs that the first section of the first article of the present Constitution, which declares that all men are born free and equal, &c., be inserted in the new Constitution.

Mr. PETTIT. My recollection is, that that resolution was laid upon the table.

A VOICE. "Certainly it was."

Mr. CRUMBACKER. The gentleman from Tippecanoe, I think, is mistaken. The resolution being imperative it was laid over until the following Saturday, and on that day the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne were brought up, and occupied the whole day, as will be recollected.

Mr. PETTIT. When the first section of the Constitution was up for consideration, the corresponding section in the present Constitution was proposed to be inserted, and it was, I believe, laid upon the table. I do not design to discuss this question again; it has been fully discussed already. I have on a former occasion, endeavored to point out that the section in the old Constitution is not true in fact, if true in theory. I do not believe it is true in theory. Men are not created equal. I said, probably, on that occasion, that men were not born or created equal. Perhaps I should have employed the word "persons," to make myself more clearly understood. Persons are not created equal. The declaration in that section is not true, and I protest against putting anything in the Constitution that is not true in fact as well as in theory. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. CRUMBACKER demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DOBSON. I wish merely to make a short explanation.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark —

Mr. DOBSON. I know, sir, that debate is not in order, but this subject has all been acted upon already —

Mr. BORDEN (interposing). Is it in order to debate the question? If so, I wish to take part in it.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, with the following result—yeas 81, nays 35—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison, Marion, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Trimble, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—81.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Borden, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Frisbie, Gregg, Hamilton, Hitt, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Morgan, Mowrer, Newman, Rariden, Smith of Ripley, Thornton, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Work, and Wunderlich—35.

A resolution heretofore offered, requiring the committee on public institutions to report an article to be inserted in the Constitution directing the Legislature to provide for the deaf and dumb, the blind and insane, was then taken up.

The question was taken upon its adoption, and decided in the affirmative.

A resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Chapman, instructing the committee on criminal law to report a section to be inserted in the Constitution providing that embezzlement of public funds by any public officer shall be deemed a felony, and shall subject the offender to such punishment in the penitentiary as the General Assembly may provide, was taken up for consideration.

The resolution having been read by the Secretary,

The question was taken upon its adoption, and decided in the affirmative.

A resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Hendricks, instructing the committee on miscellaneous provisions to report a section to be inserted in the new Constitution providing that all county officers shall continue to hold their respective offices until the expiration of their several terms, provided that no officer shall continue in office after the adoption of the new Constitution for a longer time than a term of the office under the same, was taken up for consideration.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution, the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. WALPOLE moved to amend, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

"That the present incumbents shall perform the duties of their respective offices until superseded under the authority of the new Constitution."

Mr. EDMONSTON moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. WALPOLE demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. GIBSON (addressing the Chair). Is it in order to amend the motion, by including the original resolution?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to think that it is not in order to amend the motion.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and resulted—yeas 91, nays 31—as follows.

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Brayant, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Spann, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—91.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bracken, Butler,

Carr, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dobbson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Gibson, Graham of Warrick, Harbott, Holman, Johnson, Mooney, Moore, Mowrer, Nave, Nofsinger, Rariden, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Walpole, Work, and Mr. President—31.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BRACKEN. It would seem, Mr. President, to be in vain, after the overwhelming vote that has just been given to lay the amendment of my friend from Hancock on the table, to undertake to argue against the evident determination of the Convention. Yet I think it will be well enough before we proceed with such haste, that we should pause and consider what it is that we are doing. This resolution is an imperative resolution, requiring the committee to report specifically the provision contained in the resolution. I for one, sir, believe that we came up here to make a Constitution, to be submitted to the free electors of Indiana, for their approval or rejection. But the people never expected that we were coming up here to create officers for them. No one ever dreamed when this Convention was called, that we were going to keep those old hunkers in office, forever. But as soon as we come up here, we set to work, not only to make a Constitution, but to create officers under it. It is certainly a most extraordinary course for this Convention to pursue. I, for one, believe that offices are made for the benefit of the people, and not for the benefit of the officers. Sir, it is a perfect outrage upon the community, to stand up here and say that we will designate the officers who shall serve under the Constitution that we are making; for it amounts to that. It is the same as if you were to say that A. B. & C. shall be the men who shall fill the offices. You make it an imperative matter. I submit to this body that we were never sent here for such a purpose as this. I am not for legislating people into office. We were never sent here for any such purpose, and if you adopt a proposition like this you will place yourselves in a false position, you will force the people, when they come to vote upon the question of the adoption or rejection of the Constitution, either to vote for its rejection, or else to give their votes for retaining in office these old hunkers. Why, sir, one of the chief objects of calling this Convention was to get rid of the old office holders, those who hold their offices in perpetuity. You have adopted a provision declaring that hereafter offices shall be held, some for four years, and some for a shorter period, and now you propose to let those who already fill the offices, continue to hold them, you make them by your vote, officers under the new Constitution. Sir, you might as well declare who shall be the first Senators and Representatives, under the new Constitution. You have just as much right to do the one as you have the other. It is all wrong. I submit to gentlemen, with due deference, that it is a thing which we were never sent here to do. I for one, protest against it. When the proper time comes, I expect to take part in the election of these officers, but I shall most assuredly decline taking part, as a member of this Convention, in the creation of officers to serve under the new Constitution. I shall not so far interfere with the rights of the people—those rights which we came here to secure to and protect. I call upon gentlemen to reflect before they adopt a proposition of that character.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following:

"Said term to be estimated from the date of his election."

Mr. EDMONSTON. I cannot see for my life, the force of the argument of the gentleman from Rush. The gentleman says that we are about to legislate men into office for an indefinite period. Now I appeal to gentlemen on this floor, if the people have not put these officers into office with the expectation that they would continue to serve during the period for which they were elected—during the term of their respective offices as prescribed in the old Constitution.

Mr. BRACKEN. If the gentleman will permit me to set him right, the remark I made was this: That one of the chief motives for calling this Convention was to get rid of these interminable office holders.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Precisely so. But what does this amendment propose? It proposes that no man who now holds an office under the present Constitution, shall serve for a longer period than the term of office provided by this Constitution. Now I submit to gentlemen whether, if the people had anticipated that we were coming up here to legislate all officers under the present Constitution, out of office, to turn out all those whom the people had themselves entrusted with office—I submit to gentlemen whether, if the people had supposed this, this Convention would have been called or not? I think it would not. And I submit, also that if they adopt, with a provision, it may have the effect of raising up a formidable opposition to the Constitution, and may occasion its rejection. You will, at all events, have all these office holders and those who elected them to office, bringing all the influence that they can exert to bear against the Constitution, and the influence they can bring to bear will not be inconsiderable. Having canvassed their districts for the office they hold, and having been elected for a certain period of time, if they should now be summarily ejected from office, and thrown back upon the people for their suffrages again, they will, undoubtedly, raise up a powerful faction against you, and will probably be able to defeat the adoption of your Constitution by the people. And in another view it is not right. The freemen of the various counties having chosen men to fill certain offices for a definite period of time; what right have we to say to those men they shall not serve? What right have you to throw them back to canvass the district again, at a heavy expense, and at much cost and trouble to the people? Would it be right and proper? I think it would not, and I think we should not do it. If we adopt this resolution, we say that these men shall serve during the term for which they were elected, or, until the expiration of the term prescribed by the new Constitution. No matter which Constitution they serve under, the old or the new. Their obligation to serve the people faithfully is the same. The gentleman from Rush asks how officers under the old Constitution can be officers under the new. Will the fact of the adoption of a new Constitution change the obligation of the oath they have taken under the old, so far as these officers are concerned? Why the idea is preposterous in the extreme: That a man is absolved by the adoption of the new Constitution, from the obligation which he incurred when appointed to office under the old Constitution, to serve the people faithfully.

Mr. WALPOLE. The sentiments of gentlemen seem to be somewhat changed within a few days. There was not long ago, evidently a majority of this body in favor of removing the old incumbents from office. In my opinion the gentleman from Rush has assumed the correct ground, that when you adopt this provision you are legislating men into office. How do they get office? They derive it from the existing Constitution. When the old Constitution passes away, those who were constituted officers under it, cease to be officers, they pass away along with it. When the Constitution under which they received office ceases to exist, their offices of course, also cease. This provision if adopted into the new Constitution, will confer powers upon them which were heretofore conferred by the old. When an individual has a right conferred upon him under the provisions of the law, he can enjoy that right only so long as the law which confers it continues in existence; but the moment the law is repealed, or otherwise ceases to exist, his right ceases. So it is with the present incumbents of offices, derived from the present Constitution. The moment that Constitution ceases to be the supreme law of the land all the rights they enjoy as such officers, all the emoluments of their offices pass away with it. What does the gentleman from Dubois propose? He proposes that, although the Constitution shall have passed away, yet those who derived their offices from it shall continue in office. To that I object, because it is anti-republican. We declare that all power resides in the people, and the moment you declare in your written Constitution that a certain class of persons shall hold office, that moment you deny to the people the right of sovereignty. You might as well declare in the new Constitution that the present Governor shall continue to exercise the functions of his office for six years, as to declare that the clerk of a county shall be an officer under the new Constitution for a certain period of time. The principle is the same. You deny the sovereign power of the people, and say that you will act for them until a given period. But what further does the gentleman's amendment propose? One of the articles in the new Constitution provides that there shall be biennial elections. You do not then make the same provision in regard to elections that is contained in the old Constitution, and the gentleman's proposition is, that sheriffs and other officers shall continue to hold their offices under the new Constitution not exceeding a term of office under the same. Suppose that before the adoption of your Constitution, a sheriff should be elected and should serve his year nearly out; then under this provision of the gentleman from Shelby, if adopted, he would continue in office and serve a year longer, without a re-election; and at the expiration of the several twelve months—there being only biennial elections and consequently no election until the second year—the office would necessarily become vacant, or if a provision be inserted, as will probably be the case, that all incumbents of office shall continue to hold their respective offices until their successors are elected and qualified, you then make this individual hold the office of sheriff for three years, whereas the people elected him but for one; and there are a hundred cases in which the same thing may happen. I take this ground, that the calling of this Convention to remodel the Constitution of Indiana is a revolution in our government, that the old Constitution is passing away, and that we are sent here to do as if there were no existing Constitution for the State at all; and that we were commencing to form a government ab initio. Suppose there was no Constitution, and you was about to establish a paramount law for the State, would you think of putting in a provision that men who derive office from some former authority which had existed but which had passed away, should fill the offices created by your organic law? Then why should you declare that those men shall continue in office, the authority which conferred power upon them having been abrogated? It is urged by the gentleman from Dubois that if you adopt a provision sweeping away the present incumbents you will call to the ballot box an irresistible power against your Constitution. And this, sir, is an argument addressed to an intelligent body of men engaged in the formation of an organic law! That there is an out-door pressure which must be guarded against and prevented. Ah! I am afraid, sir, that county officers have an influence in this body that gentlemen are not fully aware of. That I apprehend is the out-door pressure that is acting in this case. Their right to retain office is in question. Has it come to this, that this body cannot freely deliberate and determine upon a question like this, without the influence of the public functionaries being brought to bear against the adoption of the Constitution that we are making? If this is the argument I desire to know whether the people of the State are prepared to submit to such a state of things. I want to know whether four or five hundred office holders have the whole government in their hands? It is worth the experiment, it is worth the enquiry to know whether these official gentlemen, with the influence and patronage of four or five hundred county officers, can deprive the people of their just rights? Sir, your Constitution is not worth a bawbee if it can be voted down by the influence of four or five hundred officers. If it can be voted down in that way it ought to be voted down.

I, for one, would like to see these official gentlemen, with their mercenary considerations, endeavoring to act upon the independent will of the elector to induce him to do contrary to what his judgment dictates as being right. It is an argument that is unworthy the place, and it shall have no influence on my mind. Instead of holding his place as the creature of mercenary motives and self-ambition, you would see a hundred who would fail. But I have no desire to enter into a struggle with these officials for the adoption of the law of the land. As was said by the gentleman from Marion, our Constitution should depend upon its inherent merits, and not upon any such influences to induce the people of Indiana to adopt it. The people of Indiana who act, not wholly from selfish motives, but for the public good. They desire to have those persons in office who act with some degree of independence. They do not put men in office on account of the personal influence that they may possess. If the man is worthy, if he has the requisite qualifications, he will be elected. The people will be sure to select such men. Do not, then, by constitutional provision, preclude the electors of this country from electing their own officers. Do not make one provision in regard to one class of officers, and another provision in regard to another. You say that a county clerk elected under this Constitution, shall be in office a certain number of years, yet A, B, and C, the present clerks, shall continue in office for that length of time after the adoption of this Constitution, although they were elected for a shorter period, and may have served the greater part of the term for which they were elected. Let our government be a new government. Let all things become new. It is our duty to carry out reform in every department of the government, and to remove those officers whose duties and functions are limited under the old Constitution. Why should you retain such officers when the people have determined that the government shall be revolutionized? If you reform the government, let it be reformed in every particular. The out-door pressure which has been spoken of, and which the gentleman from Dubois says will be brought to bear upon the adoption of the Constitution at the ballot box, I hope will not have any effect here. Perhaps I should not say it, but I was going to make the remark, that the men who dread this out-door pressure so much, are the very men who feel it the most.

Mr. KELSO. The other day when this question was before the Convention, I made a few brief remarks. I then favored the same kind of provision that is now proposed, and I am now decidedly in favor of the adoption of this resolution. I have listened attentively to the remarks of the gentleman from Hancock, and I suppose he has traveled over all the tenable ground in favor of throwing all the present officers out, by the action of this Convention. I apprehend that it is a question that he has studied well; and he has made, to be sure, a very able effort, considering that he is on the wrong side of the question. And now if he was a man who had ever been charged with trickery in political life in any way, I should feel safe in saying that his only object in this instance, was to break down the dominant party and to undertake to build up his own. [A laugh.] But I suppose that is not the case. Now he says that if we undertake to create county officers for the people of Indiana, they will put us down, and they ought to do it. The gentleman says that we have not come here to create offices. That is true. We do not come here to legislate men into office. But I ask, on the other hand, in answer to his appeal, do we come here to remove those that are in office? Do we come here to annihilate offices any more than to create them? I say we do not. How did these men get their offices? Were the offices created for them? By no means. Did they acquire them by any inherent right? Certainly not. They have been chosen by the people to fill these offices, for the benefit of the people, and they hold their offices by the will of the people—by the will of a majority, or at least of a plurality. Then why should we take upon ourselves to strike them out of existence, when a majority of the people have chosen them? I say that not one-fifth of the people of Indiana ever entertained the idea that we would do so. They never dreamed of any such thing. The gentleman says we were sent here to organize an entirely new government. Such may have been his instructions, but they were not mine.

Mr. WALPOLE. I said we have the power to do so.

Mr. KELSO. Ah! we have the power, but

I hope we have sense enough, if we have the power, not to abuse it. [Consent.] I will tell you what I believe is our duty: We are to make amendments to the Constitution. The people expect us so to amend it as to have less legislation; at least, less local and special legislation. There should not be so frequent sessions of the Legislature. The people expect that we will alter the judicial system in some respects: more especially the Supreme and Probate Courts. That there shall be a different application of the Seminary Funds: that it shall be given to common schools; and many expect that we will reduce the number of Senators and Representatives.

Now I ask for a precedent, whereby the action of a State Convention, called to amend the existing Constitution, men, whom the people have elected, have been turned out of their offices. It was asserted the other day, in debate, that New York had done so. Here is what was done in New York, and we have it as part and parcel of their Constitution.

Mr. Kelso here read an extract from the Constitution of the State of New York, as follows:

"Sheriffs, clerks of counties, (including the clerk and register of the city of New York,) and justices of the peace, and coroners, in office when this Constitution shall take effect, shall hold their respective offices until the expiration of the term for which they were respectively elected."

That is what New York did in respect to her then existing officers. Now, sir, there is no precedent, or I am greatly mistaken, where a Convention, acting under the then existing Constitution, have turned men out of office.

It is true, that, upon the organization of a territory into a State, officers appointed by the proper authorities for the territory, go out of office when a Constitution is adopted, and the territory becomes a State. A new system is then commenced, and then, for the first time, under the new Constitution, they fill the offices by new appointments, and the men who held the offices under previous appointment, go out of office, as a matter of course. But I cannot see the utility of proceeding in that way in a case like the present. I cannot see what justice there could be in it. The people have filled these offices; it is with their will and consent that the present incumbents hold them. And if they hold them in that way, I ask, by what right we, a hundred and fifty delegates, assembled here, by the suffrages of a hundred and eighty thousand voters of this State, have to drive these men out of office. If there is any propriety in it, I confess I am unable to see it. Well, the gentleman says that if we turn out these officers, we have nothing to fear from their influence, because those who do not hold office are three or four to one of those who do. Now, that is an argument that I care little about.

But it is, perhaps, worthy of remark, that, if you take the officer who has been elected under the old Constitution, he is able, perhaps, to command a majority of the votes in his county; and if you turn him out, I ask you, does that not introduce this difficulty—there will be not only the influence of the officer who has been rudely and ruthlessly thrust from his place, but you have the influence of that majority who elected him, brought to bear against your new Constitution? I ask you, if we have not more to fear from turning him out than from letting him continue in office? I say if we leave them in office, we shall be doing just what the people expect us to do, and it will not furnish a single vote against the new Constitution. If we adopt such a provision as proposed by the resolution, we have little to fear in submitting the Constitution to the people. I am for leaving these officers where the people have placed them. Let them fulfil the term for which they were elected. And, sir, another remark of the gentleman from Hancock, is, perhaps, worthy, of an answer. The gentleman says that the Convention have determined that the elections shall be held biennially. This is a great mistake. There has been no such determination on the part of the Convention; nor has there been any direct intimation that such will be the determination; that we will not have annual elections. It has been determined also, that there shall be biennial sessions of the Legislature, and that the members of the Legislature shall be elected every two years. But it does not follow, as a matter of course, that if we elect the members of the Legislature for two years, and the Governor for four years, and judges, perhaps, for six years—it does not, I say, follow that we will not have annual elections authorized by law, so that if there is a case of necessity for electing officers between the two general or regular elections, we can do so. It seems to me, if we make such provision, it would be the height of folly, on our part. It would be acting very imprudently, unless we provide that elections shall be held once in each year.

Now one word for the benefit of my friend from Rush. He is a first-rate, clever fellow, in his way, and I only desire to say this—and I do it in all kindness—I think he takes altogether an erroneous view of this matter. It appears to me that an officer who is qualified for the duties of his office, and has been placed in office by the people, ought, at least, to be permitted to remain in office for the period for which the people have elected him. I think the gentleman is greatly mistaken in supposing that the men who are in office under the old Constitution should be relieved from the discharge of their duties under the new. As I have had occasion to say heretofore, I repeat, that the State will not be, for a single moment, without a Constitution. The old Constitution will be in force and effect up to the time when the new Constitution is adopted by the people. If we were to be without a Constitution, we should cease to be a State; and an officer who continues to serve is as much bound by the obligation of the oath he took originally to support the Constitution of the State of Indiana—he is as much bound, I say, to support the new Constitution which the people have substituted for the old, as if he had taken an oath fifty times over to support the new Constitution. That is my opinion of the subject, and I am decidedly in favor of adopting the original resolution, without any of the amendments.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I have not studied the operation which this measure may have upon political parties, nor the effect it may produce in reference to the adoption or rejection of the new Constitution. I must say, however, that I think the resolution is about right. The proposition is such a one as I intended to introduce in the proper place, if it should not be proposed by any other member. It provides that county officers, elected by the people, shall serve out the term for which they were elected, provided the time shall not run beyond the term established by the new Constitution. The gentleman from Rush (Mr. Bracken) argues that this will legislate into office one-half of the county officers in the State. Now, Mr. President, I do not so understand it. We legislate no man into office. The officers whom this proposition will reach were elected by the people. We only declare that the action of the people shall not be disturbed, except so far as to curtail the terms of officers, so that they shall conform to the terms of the new Constitution. The gentleman says we did not come here to keep old hunkers in office. To this, I have to reply, that, if the individuals who hold the county offices throughout the State be old hunkers, they are such hunkers as the people themselves have elected. So far as I am concerned, I feel perfectly disinterested on this subject. I have no relative in any office in Marion county or anywhere else that I know of. A majority of those holding office in Marion county are opposed to me in politics. My object is to do what is fair and equitable; and this, in my judgment, will be accomplished by the insertion of a provision in the Constitution such as is contemplated by this resolution. The provision will shorten the terms of many of the officers—clerks and recorders, for example—whose terms, by the old Constitution, run for seven years. It will be a compromise with which they will doubtless be content.

Mr. President, one of the leading objects of the people in calling a Convention, no doubt, was—not, as has been contended, to turn out those whom they themselves have elected—but to bring under their control those officers in whose election they have hitherto had no direct agency. They desire to resume the power, of which they were deprived by the old Constitution, of choosing their State officers, Judges of the Supreme and Circuit Courts, &c. If I have not mistaken the public will, it is that those officers who have not been chosen by the people should not be continued in office longer than may be necessary to make arrangements for an election by the people; but that they do not desire any interference, except as is provided in this resolution, with those who have received their offices directly from them.

The gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole), who has argued the other side of this question with much ability, alleges, among other objections to the proposition, that it will, in some instances, continue officers longer than the term for which they were elected. That of course would be a valid objection, and if it were a necessary consequence should defeat the proposition. The gentleman contended that under the new Constitution elections would be held biennially, and that a sheriff or other officer, whose term should expire in the year during which no election should take place, would be compelled to hold on until the succeeding year, and hence he argued that all should go out at once, and commence regularly under the new Constitution. The gentleman from Switzerland replied to this by saying that annual elections would still be held for county officers; and I would say further, that even if elections should only take place biennially, it can be so arranged that officers may be elected the year before they enter upon the discharge of their duties. In several of the States members of Congress are elected a year before their term of service commences; and the same arrangement certainly might be made in regard to our county officers. There surely need be no difficulty in carrying out the proposition, and it seems to be founded in justice. The Convention no doubt has the power, in the case of county as well as State officers, to provide for new elections immediately on the adoption of the new Constitution, but it seems to me that in the former case, those officers having already been elected by the people, it would not be proper to exercise the power.

Mr. PRATHER. I am tired of hearing speeches upon this subject, and I am satisfied that the minds of members are made up in reference to it. I, therefore, move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was decided in the negative.

The question then being upon the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered were—yeas 93, nays 28—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—93.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Butler, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Fisher, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Warwick, Mooney, Moore, Mowrer, Nave, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, Walpole, and Mr. President—28.

So the resolution was adopted.

The resolution offered by Mr. HALL, for rescinding the vote which sets apart Saturday for the introduction of resolutions, was then taken up.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. BORDEN. I hope the rule will not be rescinded. Saturday is the only day on which gentlemen have an opportunity to introduce resolutions, and if it be left to depend upon the consent of the Convention to suspend the rules as a matter of courtesy to gentlemen, it may be done at the request of some gentlemen and refused to others. Some gentlemen may have the courtesy extended to them and others not. I recollect one gentleman having asked permission to record his vote, and permission was granted by unanimous consent. Another asked the same privilege, and it was as unanimously refused. Now let us all be on an equality in regard to the privilege of introducing propositions, for one day in the week at least. The change that has been made in our rules by the proposition of the gentleman from Putnam, is a very great innovation upon the proceedings of a body like this, and I think we should make no further innovation.

Mr. READ of Clark. The gentleman from Allen must be in error. He certainly does not understand the matter. Instead of abolishing the privilege of introducing resolutions, it is increasing and extending it. We shall have the privilege of introducing resolutions every day in the week instead of being restricted to one day. The introduction of resolutions will form part of the order of business for every day.

Mr. BORDEN. Will that be the effect of it?

Mr. READ of Clark. That will be the effect, and the only effect. Therefore I am in favor of the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DOBSON. I think the gentlemen from Clark is wrong, and the gentleman from Allen is right. I know that resolutions will be in order once each day, provided we reach that point in the order of business. But we are continually engaged with reports from committees, and resolutions would never be reached. That was the reason for adopting the rule setting apart Saturday for the introduction of resolutions. So far as I am concerned, I believe, I have not introduced a resolution, except one, and that was under a suspension of the rule. But I take it we ought not to close up the avenues to information in this way. I think we ought to set apart one day for ourselves. We ought to leave at least, this one means by which those who are not in the habit of speaking, may lay their views before the Convention. There are many members of this Convention who are able to enlighten us upon important questions, if they had the privilege of introducing resolutions. There are a good many gentlemen here who are not accustomed to act in deliberative bodies, and who have not perhaps, so large a share of confidence as some of the rest of us here. They should have an opportunity of laying upon the clerk's table, their opinions in the shape of resolutions. But if you declare that resolutions shall only be introduced when it is permitted by the regular order of business, I tell the gentleman that that order will never be reached until we have finished the Constitution. And if it be made necessary to ask a suspension of the order of business for the purpose of introducing resolutions, it will occupy more time than if we were to devote one day in the week to that purpose.

Mr. READ of Clark. My friend has attempted to correct me, but I think upon an examination of the standing order of business, he will find that he is wrong himself. I hold in my hand the standing order. By that order the introduction of resolutions takes precedence of the several orders of the day, following immediately after the introduction of reports from committees. As soon as the reports are made from committees—which occupies not more than half an hour—resolutions are in order, previous to taking upon the orders of the day.

Mr. BORDEN. Let me correct the gentleman. On the motion of the gentleman from Putnam, the orders of the day have precedence over resolutions.

Mr. READ of Clark. Oh! if there has been a new order adopted, I come down. [A laugh.]

Mr. HOVEY offered the following amendment:

"And no resolution shall be offered without the consent of the Convention."

I think, said Mr. H., that we have had resolutions enough. I think that our labors would have been curtailed if we had had none. Day after day resolutions have been offered that were wholly irrelevant to the matters under consideration, altogether unnecessary, and sometimes the same resolution offered as many as four times. One day in each week has been devoted to this purpose, and it appears to me that it is time altogether thrown away, as the same end can be accomplished by amendments.

Mr. NAVE. I am one of those who consider that there has been an unnecessary waste of time in discussing motions to do away with action upon resolutions. And I would call the attention of this Convention to one fact, that where resolutions have been offered that have not been adopted, they have, almost universally, come up again for our consideration in the form of amendments, or in the shape of substituted sections. Then, sir, we unnecessarily consume the time of this Convention by offering resolutions when there is a time presenting itself every day in the regular order of business, when a member can introduce his proposition in the form of an original section, or amendment to be incorporated into the Constitution. Then, sir, the privilege which it is claimed by gentlemen is to be cutoff by rescinding the resolution providing that Saturday shall be regarded as resolution day, is in no wise affected. There is no gentleman who will be deprived of the opportunity of offering an amendment to any section when it comes up for consideration or when the subject upon which he may desire to offer resolutions comes up regularly for consideration. There is no gentleman who will be deprived of the privilege of offering anything that comes up regularly as an amendment to the Constitution.

We have already seen, sir, that we consume our time in discussing imperative resolutions, and when their defects are about to be pointed out, some gentleman rises and calls the previous question, thus preventing their further consideration, and consuming the time of the Convention unnecessarily in their consideration.

When it is a legitimate proposition, it should be regularly debated. Then, sir, I am in favor of cutting off this interminable resolution operation, because they have consumed our time without any profitable result.

Many resolutions that are presented here have no more business here than the provisions of the Statute Book of Kentucky. Thus, sir, it is evident that we deprive no gentleman of the opportunity of offering amendments to the Constitution; and when this is the fact, and we have to travel over the same ground, as often as we have to do upon different propositions, I am in favor of having the various subjects that come under consideration brought but once before us, so that when we once act upon them we will dispose of them for all time to come.

Mr. COOKERLY. I am as much in favor of expediting the business of the Convention, as any man can possibly be; but I am opposed to all kinds of gag law. I will not for one consent to gag any gentleman upon this floor. I say if gentlemen desire to offer resolutions here they ought to have the opportunity afforded them of doing so. If this discussion in regard to offering resolutions had not been sprung upon us to-day, we would have been through long ago with them, and have taken up the orders of the day.

It is these trivial discussions to the right of the members to offer resolutions, that take up the time of this Convention. Let us proceed, then, with the regular order of business, as laid down in the rules, and not be continually attempting to change the rules which we have once formally agreed upon. Every gentleman here has rights, and it is not our business to deprive him of those rights. I hope this resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. MOWRER moved to lay the resolution and the pending amendment upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. BEESON offered the following resolution for adoption:

Resolved, That this Convention adjourn sine die on the 15th of January next.

Mr. KELSO. I desire, Mr. President, to say a word or two with reference to this proposition. We are now at the end of the tenth week of our session, and what have we done? We have passed carefully over some six important propositions. There are certainly more than ten more yet to be acted upon, among which is that of the organization of Courts of Justice—the Bank—Currency, and several other important matters. Now, sir, all these matters could not be disposed of by the time at which it is now proposed to adjourn, even if we were to go to work and lose not one moment of time unnecessarily between this and that period. Some time will necessarily be spent in vacating this Hall, and preparing for our new quarters.

Now, sir, I assert as a truth, that in seven times out of ten, when a proposition of the kind now before us, is submitted, those who introduce them tremble for fear we will adopt them. They know very well that if we adopt them they will have to return to the people without having accomplished the work they were sent to perform, and that the people will hold them to a strict accountability for their deficiency in action.

This, sir, is the largest Constitutional Convention—I speak within bounds—that has ever assembled in the United States. And yet there has been less time spent by this Convention, in proportion to the labor it has performed so far, than by any other Convention that has created or amended a State Constitution within the last eight years. We have not been here an unnecessary length of time, neither have we wasted our time. To be sure, we have debated at length important propositions. But I appeal to gentlemen if the propositions we have debated have not been fully worthy of the consideration we have given them. Let us not tickle the ears of the people with the idea that we will get through with our business here satisfactorily by the fifteenth of January. If we cannot get through by that time, let those gentlemen who desire to go home take up their line of march for the "home diggings" at that period. The gentleman who offered this proposition I am inclined to think has not been a regular attendant upon the proceedings of this Convention no more than I have been—at any rate, he has not made himself acquainted with what is yet to be done by this Convention, or he would never have offered his resolution. He should make himself acquainted with what is yet to be done ere he attempts to dictate what time we should adjourn. I shall here close my remarks, sir, as I do not wish to consume the time of the Convention upon a resolution of the character of the present one.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I do not wish to consume the time of the Convention, but I feel it to be my duty to make a few remarks upon this resolution. I have endeavored to occupy the attention of the Convention as little as possible during the last two weeks, and I shall endeavor to do so in future; and if other gentlemen will pursue the same course, ere five weeks have elapsed we shall have completed the business we were sent here to perform.

I am of opinion, sir, that we shall appoint a day for the conclusion of our services, and then we will have an additional stimulus to work, knowing that we must get through by a certain period of time. But this is not the principal reason why I would have this resolution adopted. I think that, without any extraordinary or hurried efforts on our part, we can get through with all that we have to do in four weeks. We have already gone over a great deal of ground, and accomplished a great deal more than appears, without close examination, to have been accomplished. The speaking is probably greatly exhausted, and this is a great deal effected towards bringing our labors to a close. Some of the most important questions that can come before us have been fully discussed, and gentlemen, I think, are prepared to act upon them. We have already had ample evidence in the speedy adoption of important measures, that we can get through with our business in a speedy manner if we try. I fully believe, sir, that if we go to work with the right determination, we can perform all our necessary business in four weeks time.

It is stated by gentleman that this Convention cannot and will not work during the holidays. Now, I would ask, in all seriousness, if we are boys, that we must suspend our labors Christmas and New Years, and employ ourselves in wasting time foolishly? I am then, sir, for giving our undivided attention to the business of the Convention; and if we labor faithfully during the next four weeks, I believe we can bring our labors to a close, and make just as satisfactory a Constitution to the people of Indiana in that time, as though we stayed here ten weeks longer.

Mr. GIBSON moved to amend by adding the following:

"No one member shall speak longer than five minutes, nor more than once on the same day."

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I do not see, sir, why any gentleman should wish to tie up his hands by fixing a day of adjournment, so that he will be compelled to do that, which, under other circumstances, he would not wish to do. I stand as ready to adjourn this Convention at an early period as any other member, provided our business be through with in that period. For one, I do not desire, by adopting this resolution, to declare to the people that we wish to adjourn before our business can be completed. This is a very simple matter, sir. As the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) remarked, we have come here to perform certain duties—in accordance with the wishes of the people—and these duties have not as yet been performed.

Are we to permit certain gentlemen, sir, who may desire to see important reforms passed over, to circumscribe the limits of our sessions, so that we may be effectually debarred from carrying out those reforms? I refer to reforms in banking, sir, in laws in the organization of our courts, in the regulation of circuits, of the probate system, and other important reforms that we are expected to act upon. I am ready to work late and early, to get through with our business, and to adjourn as soon as our business is completed; but I am not disposed that gentlemen should, by fixing upon a certain day for adjournment, carry by stratagem what they cannot by open and direct action. If the members of this Convention take time to investigate questions, they can accomplish many important reforms; but if they suffer their hands to be tied up by fixing upon a day of adjournment, obstacles will be thrown in the way of many important reforms, so that they will be defeated for want of time to consider them. If I desired to bring in Buncombe resolutions, I have no doubt I could do so, and have them voted down; and to this class, I consider, resolutions of the character of the present one appropriately belong. I do not wish that any such resolutions should appear upon the journal. I shall vote against this resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to lay the resolution and pending amendment on the table.

On this motion, the yeas and nays being demanded, were ordered and taken, with the following result—yeas 60, nays 60:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Blythe, Bourne, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hendricks, Hitt, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Snook, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Walpole, and Mr. President—60.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carter, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Conduit, Davis of Parke, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Gibson, Gootee, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Logan, March, May, McClelland, Mooney, Morgan, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—60.

So the resolution and pending amendments were not laid on the table.

Mr. RARIDEN said that, as there were several committees that should meet in the afternoon to attend to necessary business, he would move that the Convention adjourn until nine o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. GREGG: Will the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) withdraw his motion for a few moments?

Mr. RARIDEN. Certainly, if the gentleman will renew it again.

Mr. GREGG. I understand, Mr. President, that the officers of State, who were to procure rooms in this city for the meetings of this Convention, have decided upon packing us in the Supreme Court room, against which action I most decidedly protest.

The PRESIDENT. The only business now in order is the consideration of the resolution and pending amendment having reference to the final adjournment of the Convention.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to say a few words with reference to the room that has been selected for our sittings.

The PRESIDENT. Is it the pleasure of the Convention that the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson) proceed with his remarks?

It was so ordered by consent.

Mr. GIBSON. I have a brief mathematical statement to make with regard to the size of the Supreme Court room. I took the trouble to make an actual measurement of its dimensions, and I found it to contain eleven hundred and forty-four square feet. From that take sixty-four feet for the offset in the south-west corner, two hundred and fifty-six feet for the President's and Secretary's desk's, two hundred and eighty-eight square feet for space around the fire-places, and one hundred and fifty square feet for aisles, and it leaves barely four hundred and fifty square feet, which will give three and one-fifth square feet, or about twenty-two inches square to each member. If the Senate is packed in there, it will give each Senator a space of a little more than a yard square.

It seems to me, sir, that these facts show conclusively that it is barely possible to crowd the Senate into that room, and utterly impossible for this body to be forced in there by any means short of a steam screw. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GREGG. I now renew the motion to adjourn, although I hope it will be voted down.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question then being upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson).

Mr. KELSO moved to amend the amendment by inserting the words, "Provided, we are through with the business which we have assembled to perform."

The question being on the motion of the gentleman from Switzerland,

Mr. PETTIT. I really hope, Mr. President, that this Convention will not adopt this resolution and the pending amendments. Let us look, sir, at the source of this resolution. From whom did it come? Was it submitted by a gentleman who has prepared and proposed even one trifling section to our Constitution? What has the author of this resolution done here? What does he know about our business? Sir, resolutions of this character are presented merely to gratify a miserable ambition to secure a few votes at the expense of everything that is lasting and valuable. What, sir, have you already accomplished? Not one-half of the provisions of the new Constitution have as yet been acted upon. The great questions of banking and currency have not as yet been reached. The subject of law reform has not been considered. The reports from the legislative and executive departments have not yet been fully considered. And then the miscellaneous provisions, such as those relating to the school fund, education, public seminaries and institutions, have not been touched at all.

And is this Convention, in view of all this labor, to be told that in four weeks from this time it will have completed its business and be ready to adjourn? We might just as well pass a resolution saying that we were unable to perform the business we were sent here to execute, and go home at once to our constituents and tell them so, as to pass such a resolution as is now before us.

Sir, it is this miserable pandering for place, this ambition to secure the few votes of those at home who are unacquainted with the arduous duties that have devolved upon us in framing a new Constitution, that brings up these resolutions retarding and delaying our business. A half a dozen times have resolutions like the present one been introduced, for no earthly benefit whatever. Now, sir, as sensible men, I ask the members of this Convention if there is any possibility of getting through with our labors in the manner in which they should be performed, in four weeks time? Will you allow the credit of Indiana thus to be assailed? Will you suffer her capacity to form an organic law which shall serve for the government of the present and of future generations, to be questioned and brought into contempt not only abroad, but among sister States at home, by consenting to an adjournment before we have half completed our business? [Great applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the resolution and pending amendments be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that a motion to indefinitely postpone places it beyond the power of this body to act upon the subject again.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. The motion will only have the effect of postponing to a day certain.

On this question a division being called for, it was decided in the affirmative, ayes 61, noes not counted.

So the resolution and pending amendments were indefinitely postponed.

On motion of Mr. MORRISON of Marion, The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Mr. BASCOM offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after Tuesday next the Convention will meet at 8 o'clock A. M. and half-past 1 o'clock P. M.

Mr. FOSTER moved to amend by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting the following: "That the Convention will meet at half-past 5 o'clock A. M., adjourns at half-past 12 M.; meet again at 1 o'clock, and continue in session until half-past 7 o'clock P. M."

The amendment was concurred in.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the resolution as amended,

Mr. PETTIT moved to lay it upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention meet at half-past 8 o'clock on Monday next, and every day thereafter; and that the Convention keep no holidays, but proceed to discharge the duties the people sent us here to perform."

Mr. GIBSON moved to amend by striking out the words "half-past."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved to amend by inserting after the word "holidays" the words "Sundays excepted."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DOBSON moved to lay the resolution, as amended, on the table.

And the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMBACKER offered a resolution providing that the Convention, to prevent further waste of time, take up the order of the day.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. KELSO moved that the Convention adjourn until Monday morning.

The motion was lost.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. NEWMAN, pursuant to notice given on yesterday, offered the following amendment to the standing rules of the Convention:

"No section of the new Constitution shall pass unless the same shall be voted for by a majority of all the members elected to the Convention."

Mr. N. said: It is well known to the members of this Convention that a section has been passed providing that it shall require a majority of all the members of both branches of the Legislature to pass a law. Now, sir, that rule is of a very doubtful character. I myself have many doubts as to its propriety; and therefore, as we can test the correctness of the rule in this body, e're we finally ingraft it in the new Constitution, I have submitted it in the form of an amendment to our standing rules.

If it shall be found to work well, we can incorporate it in the new Constitution; but if it is found to operate detrimentally to the public service, we can re-consider the vote by which it was passed, and reject it. It does seem to me we should test its efficiency before we apply it to the proceedings of the Legislature.

Mr. FARROW. I opine, sir, that this rule is offered with a view to inflict a kind of chastisement upon the Convention because of its having adopted certain portions of the Constitution having reference to the Legislature.

Sir, this Convention has proceeded to a considerable extent with the business before it, and I would inquire if it is to be expected that we shall go back and re-consider every vote taken upon sections that have passed where a clear majority of the Convention was not in favor of their adoption? I think not, sir. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. KELSO demanded the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 63, nays 39.

YAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Beach, Berry, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Elliott, Farrow, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hovey, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Mather, May, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Trimby, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—63.

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Bryant, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Foster, Gregg, Harbolt, Hitt, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, March, McClelland, McLean, Milroy, Morgan, Mowrer, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ristine, Shoup, Steele, Tague, Taylor, Watts, Work, and Wunderlich—39.

So the motion to lay upon the table prevailed.

Mr. KELSO. It being apparent, from the vote just taken, that there is a disposition on the part of many of the members not to attend the sittings of the Convention this afternoon—probably arising from the fact that several of our committees are in session—I move that the Convention adjourn until Monday morning.

On this motion a division being called for, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 50, noes 35.

So the Convention adjourned until Monday morning 9 o'clock.

MONDAY, DEC. 16, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRARY.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the motion of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) to re-consider the vote on the passage of the section in relation to the rights of married women to hold property, &c. The gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) being entitled to the floor,

Mr. NILES. I desire to remark to the Convention that I was not aware when I made the motion to postpone the consideration of this subject, of the rule under which I would be entitled to the floor this morning. But I desire to submit some remarks upon this section, and if the Convention will permit me to conclude now what I have to say, I will undertake not to occupy the floor again upon this question, unless it might be by way of personal explanation. I shall proceed with the hope that the Convention will allow me to exceed the fifteen minutes allotted by the rule.

Mr. GIBSON. Without intending any discourtesy to the gentleman I want to have the yeas and nays upon the question of suspending the rule. If a gag law is to be imposed upon us I want to have it strictly enforced.

The PRESIDENT. Those in favor of suspending the rule will say aye.

Mr. GIBSON. I have asked for the yeas and nays, Mr. President, and the Chair has taken no notice of it.

The PRESIDENT. One gentleman is not enough to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. BORDEN. It is the duty of the Chair to put the question upon recording the demand for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair, generally, undertakes to define its own duty. (After a count.) The yeas and nays are not demanded.

Mr. GIBSON. There are certainly twelve or fourteen gentlemen rising.

The PRESIDENT again put the question on recording the demand for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NILES. I will withdraw my request. [Cries of "no! no!"]

Mr. BORDEN. I wish to say this: Some other gentleman may hereafter ask a suspension of the rule in his favor, and if the yeas and nays are taken we may turn to the journal and see who are discourteous enough to refuse.

Mr. COOKERLY. Would it not be well to specify for what length of time the rule shall be suspended. [Cries of "no! no!"]

Mr. NILES. I must say that my feelings of delicacy will forbid having such a vote recorded on the journal. I withdraw the request.

Mr. OWEN. I hope the gentleman from Laporte will not withdraw the request. I am sure the Convention will be willing to suspend the rule.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman withdraw his request.

Mr. NILES. I feel compelled to do it.

Mr. NILES addressed the Convention during the time prescribed by the rule. His remarks are incorporated with other remarks which he afterwards made on the same day, in relation to the same subject.

Mr. NILES having occupied the fifteen minutes allotted by the rule,

Mr. OWEN moved that the rule be suspended for the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Laporte to proceed with his remarks.

I hope, said Mr. O., that the Convention will agree to suspend the rules. The gentleman has told us that he is firmly convinced that he can show us conclusive reasons why this section should not be passed—reasons which he says will be entirely satisfactory to every delegate in this Convention. I desire to hear the gentleman's reasons.

Mr. GIBSON demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rule, and they were ordered.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I merely wish to state the reason why I cannot vote to suspend the rule. There is no man in this Convention whom I would sooner hear than I would the gentleman from Laporte, but if we suspend the rule for one gentleman, we will be obliged to do it for others.

The yeas and nays were then taken, with the following result—yeas 76, nays 40:—

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Watts, Wolfe, and Mr. President—76.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beeson, Bowers, Bracken, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Farrow, Fisher, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, McClelland, McLean, Moore, Morgan, Prather, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Sherrod, Spann, Thomas, Trimble, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—40.

So the rule was not suspended.

Mr. HOLMAN said, I regret that the rule was not suspended to enable the gentleman from Laporte to finish his remarks. That the subject under discussion is an interesting one, is manifest from the feeling that has been exhibited in this body, and to some extent throughout the entire State, since it became the subject of a distinctive proposition, through the report of the committee, of which the very able gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) is the chairman, and if it be a subject of such interest, any gentleman who has thoroughly investigated its effects and tendencies, should have an opportunity of being fully heard.

When the original section, as reported by the committee, was under investigation, I received the courteous attention of the Convention while I attempted to discuss what I deemed to be the ultimate tendencies of the principle involved. The question has now, by the amendment, assumed a different character.

The section as reported, recognized in broad terms, the principle of the civil law: "Women hereafter married in this State, shall have the right to acquire and possess property to their sole use and disposal," &c. The arguments urged against this part of the section, were, that it would create separate interests in the same household; that it would destroy that identity of interest in the marriage relation from which results the highest degree of domestic happiness, and that it would induce a refined and complicated system of laws for the protection of the wife's separate property, inconsistent with the republican simplicity of our institutions.

I was opposed to both the language and spirit of the section, believing that as the happiness of the wife is peculiarly dependent on the sanctity and happiness of the domestic circle, any change calculated to impair the unity of her interests with those of her husband, and thus destroy a vital element of the harmony of home, could only be productive of the deepest misfortune to herself. The happiness of home—the various joys of the domestic relation, can only result from this unity of interest. But the question now before the Convention has assumed a somewhat different character. The section as adopted—the re-consideration of the vote on the adoption, which is now pending, reads as follows: "The real and personal property of women, whether owned before marriage or afterwards acquired by purchase or gift, (except from the husband, in fraud of creditors,) devise, or descent, shall be and remain secured to them under equitable conditions, by law." The real difference between this section and that reported by the committee, is this: the one confers upon the wife an absolute right to acquire and dispose of property, independent of the husband, and a direct separation of their interests—the other confers the right to acquire property by all the various modes known to the law, but only directs the enactment of laws securing to the wife on equitable conditions, the property so acquired. The right to acquire by purchase and the power of disposal places the wife on the same footing with her husband. The right to acquire "by purchase," as used in the section under discussion, independent of the power of disposal, is inconsistent with the entire integrity of the conjugal relation as recognized by the common law. On a former occasion, I attempted to show that it is not in the possession or exercise of these rights, which pertain to the more masculine departments of life, that the wife or mother finds her highest happiness.

I am, therefore, opposed to the section as adopted, and for one reason only—that the use of the word “purchase,” in the connection in which it stands, confers rights and powers inconsistent with the common law identity of the interests of husband and wife, and inconsistent with that domestic harmony which it is the interest of the wife, above all others, to maintain; for I believe that the identity of every interest of the husband and wife, as established by the common law, has wielded a potent influence in giving to the Anglo-Saxon race that moral, social, and intellectual elevation, which for centuries has marked its progress.

But, while I would oppose the adoption of any principle tending to create separate rights and interests in the domestic circle, yet I would rejoice to see every right of property—every interest of the wife secured, to the utmost extent consistent with the indissolubility of the marriage relation.

I should be in favor of the section if it were amended so as to read as follows:

“The real and personal property of women, owned at the time of marriage, or afterwards acquired by devise, or descent, or by gift, except from the husband, in fraud of creditors, shall be and remain secured to them by law on equitable conditions.”

I should be in favor of such a section, for the following reasons: It would leave the relation of husband and wife as created by the common law. It would tend to produce more just and equitable laws of descent and distribution, and, being made the basis of wholesome legislation, it would, when equity requires it, protect the property of the wife from the debts of the husband; and lastly, as incidental to the two last propositions, it would at least secure to the widow her just claim upon the husband's estate.

By the common law, the wife may acquire property by the several modes specified,—“by devise, or descent, or by gift,”—except in one instance, and then she may acquire, through the intervention of a trust. The wife, in all of these instances, remains the passive and not the active agent in the acquisition of property, and it is but common justice that the estate which descends to the wife from a father, or which is devised or given to her by a relation or friend, should be secured to her at least on such equitable conditions as wise legislation might prescribe.

Even now, the claim of the widow upon her husband's estate, results in part from the presumption of law, operating on general principles, that a portion of that estate came to the husband in her right; and by securing to her her right of dower, her one hundred and fifty dollars as a claim, above all others, upon his estate, and her ultimate right as a distributee, the law intends, at least, to secure on equitable conditions, the widow's just claim upon the estate of the husband. That the law, however, in many instances, deals illiberally, if not unjustly, with the widow, is too manifest to require discussion; and while I have abiding faith in the common law as a system, and would not absolutely abrogate any one of its principles, unless it were wrong or unwise beyond question, yet reasonable modifications of those principles, as experience may suggest, would only be in consonance with the spirit of the age in which we live. In this State the common law, as it affects the rights of the wife and the widow, has been materially modified, and, in my humble opinion, the section, if changed as I have suggested, will go but little farther than the statute laws of the State; and I will call the attention of the Convention to several statutes having in view the securing of the wife's property on “equitable conditions,” at least in practice, and still consistent with the integrity of the marriage union. By a statute enacted in 1849, if the husband die intestate and without children, the wife takes one-half of his real estate, acquired otherwise than by descent, in fee simple; and by a statute enacted at the same time, the wife, after the debts of her husband are paid, if he die intestate and without children, has a legal claim upon his estate, for the value of the estate acquired by the husband in her right. This is one of the modes of securing to the wife her property on equitable conditions, though I admit that the power of the husband to defeat the effects of this law by a will, does not leave the equity of the conditions very apparent; and by the statute of 1847, the wife's real estate is secured to her separate use, and in that case the rents and profits of such real estate would be received by the husband, as trustee for his wife. I am, therefore, in favor of the adoption of the section in such a modified form as leaves the union of husband and wife unimpaired, and secures the sanctity and harmony of the domestic relations; and while we oppose the adoption of any principle which might invade, with unholy effects, the divine relation of husband and wife, we should still remember that the same God who has declared of the husband and wife, that “they twain shall be one flesh,” has enjoined upon us “charity” to the widow. If, therefore, the only effects of adopting a principle on this subject, shall be to secure just laws of descent and distribution, a most desirable end will be attained.

Sir, no man who has enjoyed the varied endearments of the domestic circle, who has sat at his own cheerful fireside, and felt, year after year, the warm, patient, and endearing affection of a wife, whose smiles have illuminated and the purity of whose love has sanctified his home, and made it, however humble, "a green spot in memory's waste," can but desire that when she whose life is entwined within his own, can no longer lean upon his arm for support, when "the light of her spirit has flown," that the laws by which her rights are to be determined shall at least be just, if not influenced by the divine teachings of mercy.

I trust, Mr. President, that the motion to re-consider will prevail, and that a section will be adopted which at once leaves the union of the husband and wife unimpaired, secures every just interest of the wife consistent with that union, and equity to the widow.

Mr. HOVEY. I shall not detain the Convention but a few moments. It is extremely difficult after this question has been so thoroughly discussed, to say anything that can either interest or instruct delegates in regard to the course they should pursue. I shall attempt neither; and had originally intended to have left the discussion to those more able, and let my votes answer for my opinions. Although I have agreed with my colleague (Mr. Owen) in the general, as to the rights of women, I have thought that this subject more appropriately belonged to the Legislature than to this Convention. But as there seems to be a decided majority in favor of making this a constitutional provision in some shape, and as the law-making powers have been wofully derelict in protecting the property of women heretofore, I have been willing and am ready to aid the friends of this measure, provided the section is framed in such language as will meet my approbation. The section originally reported by the committee on "rights and privileges," and the amendment of my friend from Vanderburgh, (Mr. Blythe,) which is now under consideration, I have considered too broad, as giving to women more power than the friends of that section and amendment have seemed to demand. When that amendment was under discussion some weeks ago, I moved to strike out the words "purchase or," which failed, and on its passage I voted against it for the reasons then given. I have heard no argument that has convinced me that the position I then assumed is incorrect, and shall still vote against the section in its present shape. Strike out the words "purchase or" and I will support it.

I cannot refrain from remarking that the progress of this question is fraught with many lessons to the uninitiated in the art of legislation. I have watched its course from its inception to the present hour, and must admit that I have been both mortified and amused at the course some honorable gentlemen have thought proper to adopt. Many have opposed it from the first under honest convictions, I have no doubt, of its impropriety. Some have opposed it on account of the language in which the section and amendment were clothed; but, sir, to the most unobserving it must be apparent that it has met with no small amount of its opposition on account of its progenitor.

"A community of interests between husband and wife is about to be established," says one, and he launches forth in a learned argument to show the evils of a civil law system, and the harmony, perfection, and beauty of the common law of England.

At the bottom of that section, cries another, lies all the poison of "the social system;" beware what you do!

"Why you are striking at the very vitals of the Christian religion," vociferates a third, "you are sinning against Heaven with a high hand and an outstretched arm if you adopt a section like that!"

Now, sir, I ask, with all submission, if arguments like these ever would have been adduced had the section originally reported come from the pen of some other delegate than my colleague? I think not. I am fearful there has been an undue current at work, one that did not originate in the fountains of reflection and reason—a current that is tending towards a certain time and place where possibly he might be found to occupy a station in the estimation of the people far more exalted than many might desire.

I shall not attempt to go over the arguments urged by the friends of this section. They have been expressed much more beautifully and forcibly than I could hope to do. I cannot, however, resist from saying that under the practical workings of the common law in regard to the rights of married women, I have seen instances and hardships that every feeling and reflecting man would willingly avoid. I could give names did not propriety forbid, where women who were wealthy when married, have been left destitute by the sheriff for their husband's debts.

Under the common law as it has existed, and now exists in this State, the whole personal estate of women upon marriage rests in the husband. Let me give an instance: A poor man marries a wealthy woman, who we will say is worth ten thousand dollars in cash. As soon as that money is in his hands it becomes absolutely his, and if he should die the next instant afterwards it will descend to his heirs and not to hers. Surely every father in this Convention, and to such I now appeal, must deprecate that system of laws which makes matrimony a speculation on the part of the husband, and which may eventually leave his daughter a helpless outcast on account of her husband's profligacy. Although I am as bitterly opposed to the homestead principle as any delegate on this floor, and was as much gratified at its defeat, yet no one will more willingly and more cheerfully vote for any provision which will provide a home for the widow and the orphan in their affliction. A provision placing the property of married women beyond the reach of their husband's debts would in many, many instances produce that happy result.

I cannot close without alluding to the Scriptural argument used by the gentleman from Putnam, (Mr. Badger,) when this subject was discussed a few days since. I had thought that I could vote for a section like the one reported, or the one adopted, without committing any sin either before God or man; but I assuredly cannot if that gentleman's argument is correct. Now, sir, I would ask that gentleman, for what purpose Christ came into the world? Did he come to establish new laws and new principles of government for the people? Certainly not. If I understand the purpose of his mission, he came not to interfere with civil laws or governments, but to establish a system of religion, the holiest, the purest, and the most perfect that the intellect of man was ever permitted to comprehend. And, sir, such has been the opinion of the greatest divines that the world has ever produced. What a lamentable condition would Europe be in were the arguments of that gentleman correct! Italy, Greece, France, Spain, Portugal, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, Switzerland, Prussia, and Scotland, if I mistake not, have had laws in existence, century upon century, giving to married women a control far more absolute than the section would, which has received the anathema of the gentleman from Putnam. All the South American republics, Mexico, California, Lower Canada, several of our States, Louisiana, Maine, New York, Texas, Alabama, and others, have recognized the right of the wife to her separate property in stronger terms than the section under debate. What a large host of sinners this world contains if that gentleman's arguments are correct! The gentleman could not have been serious; if serious he should remember, being a divine, that "Christians have burned each other quite persuaded,

That all the Apostles would have done as they did."

It seems to me that such opinions receive their birth in that school where the "higher law" is taught—that "higher law" which, being correctly interpreted means individual opinion right or wrong, the conscience law of the northern fanatic—a law which they pretend to set above all the laws and institutions of our great Republic. Thank God we have no such "higher law" in that part of the State where I reside. The people there, sir, love the Union—love the free institutions of this country and do not understand the laws of God contained in the Scriptures as applying to the political condition of society. No northern fanatic or southern madman is there brawling for secession or disunion, but the united sentiment is, "The Union of the States, one and inseparable, now and forever."

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I wish only to say a word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey). He complains that the subject under consideration is opposed because his colleague introduced it, and intimates that the opponents of the section are fanatics, higher law men, conscience men, who would dissolve the Union. Now, sir, for aught I know, the people in the sections of the State the gentleman comes from, may discard all divine law—and deny the existence of a conscience in the minds of men—they may regard all those professing a reverence for the higher law, and who talk of conscience, as fanatics. But I thank God that my constituents are not ashamed to have a conscience, and a reverence for the higher law, and a belief in the existence of a Supreme Being to whom men are accountable [applause].

Mr. HOVEY. The gentleman must have misunderstood me. I said that "higher law," which being correctly interpreted means individual opinion, right or wrong, the "conscience law" of the northern fanatic. I said nothing disrespectfully of the law of God, but alluded to that class of men who would break through all laws and attempt to justify their acts by religious scruples.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. The gentleman said he was for the Union of the States, and not for the higher law which fanatics have set up. Well, I say my constituents are for the higher law, and for the Union of the States, and for the union of husband and wife too [applause]. These are the higher laws they acknowledge. They do not deny the existence of a Supreme Being. They admit his laws to be superior to human law. I trust there are none here who deny that there are such laws.

The gentleman has said that the opposition to this section, was connected with an opposition to his colleague, and to socialism. Now, sir, if his colleague is so identified with socialism, that to oppose socialism is to oppose his colleague, why then, sir, I am opposed to socialism in all of it, that I believe tends to uproot the foundations of society, and to dissolve the elements of the political fabric, and the destruction of the domestic ties. But, sir, I had not in my mind connected the gentleman's colleague in any way with socialism, either as its inventor, or the champion of the system. I have not opposed this section merely because the gentleman from Posey offered it. I have opposed it because of reasons which I regarded as very substantial objections against the thing itself.

I ask if it is any sin to oppose anything which the gentleman's colleague may offer? Are we bound to take everything that he proposes as the higher law? I acknowledge no such obligation. I acknowledge no law here, but the law of equality. I acknowledge the right of every man to represent his constituents, and to oppose everything which he considers to be wrong, no matter by whom it may be presented here.

Sir, the law we are defending has been the law of our ancestors for eighteen hundred years. It is the Christian law—the law that was promulgated by our Divine Master, and the gentleman sets up the assumption here, that we oppose it on personal grounds—because his colleague advocates it. Sir, I oppose it because, like socialism, its legitimate offspring, which prevails to a great extent in France, it divides and destroys families, removing all sanctity from domestic relations—destroys the domestic virtues, and then subverts States, and overturns Governments. Look at the convulsions in France—their tumults and revolutions. Has freedom, has republicanism flourished there? there where men denied the existence of a Deity and the higher law—and rejecting Christ, set up human reason as an object of worship? There, sir, tumult, confusion, and discord reign. They have not hitherto established or maintained a free government. And those other countries which the gentleman holds up for our imitation, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Mexico, have the people of those countries exhibited a proof of their superiority over us in the freedom of these governments, or in the purity of their morals—and in their regard for human rights?

Now, sir, compare the Anglo-Saxon race with those nations whose domestic and social virtues gentlemen are so desirous to emulate, sir. Throughout all its history, the Anglo-Saxon stands forth pre-eminently, far superior to those nations who have denied the law of conscience, and perverted the precepts of religion. This proud pre-eminence I trust we and our posterity will maintain forever. I trust, too, sir, that we shall not only have patriotism enough to be united as a people, but virtue to preserve the union of families.

Mr. NAVE. I regret very much, to see any excitement growing out of the re-consideration of this section in relation to the rights of married women. It is well known that on the adoption of the section, the only opposition that I gave to it in the shape in which it passed the Convention, was opposition to the word "purchase." If that word be stricken out, I pledge myself to give my support to the section. And why will I do so? Because I maintain the ground that the legislation of this country has long enough denied to the wife, the widow, and the orphan, that which justly belongs to them.

In the absence of the word "purchase," we propose to do nothing more and nothing less than can be effected by a Court of Chancery, by the interposition of a trustee, than what may be done by the interposition of a trustee in the Court of Chancery to guarantee to the wife her separate property. I am willing, for one, to give my vote for the incorporation of the section into the organic law of the State, if the word "purchase" be stricken out.

It has been truly remarked on this floor, time after time, that married women in this country have been imposed upon by reckless and improvident husbands; who had married them, not for the sake of the wife but for the sake of the money or property that she possessed, and as soon as that was squandered, that the peace and happiness of the family is destroyed. I have opposed the section thus far, solely on the ground that the word "purchase" was included in it; and believing that it will be but doing an act of justice to a portion of the inhabitants of Indiana to whom, hitherto, justice has been denied in the organic law of the State, I am for the incorporation in the organic law of a provision which shall secure to them their property against execution for their husband's debts—against the recklessness and improvidence of the husband. I am willing to record my vote for such a provision; and if the Convention adopt a resolution instructing the committee on revision to amend the section by striking out the word "purchase," and refuse the re-consideration, I shall be satisfied in regard to it. But if a re-consideration of the vote has to take place, I ask gentlemen to ponder well before they declare that married women shall have no rights granted to them in the organic law. When the Legislature have from time to time declared, by solemn enactment, that they are entitled to certain rights, if the word "purchase" be stricken out, I ask, what occasion is there for our becoming excited in relation to this matter? What occasion is there for a difference of opinion on a proposition to extend to married women in the State the same privileges that they have heretofore enjoyed? I should be ashamed to vote against the simple proposition to secure to married women property which may hereafter come to them by descent or by gift, and for that cause will give my hearty support to the section under consideration, with the modification that I have suggested.

Mr. COOKERLY. I have not heretofore occupied the time of the Convention with any remarks of mine in relation to this subject, but I believe I may as well take occasion now to make one or two remarks in reference to it. As time passes along men are subject to change, and you, no doubt, sir, as well as any delegate upon this floor, must be very much surprised at the speech that has just been delivered by the gentleman from Hendricks. But a few days have passed away since that gentleman ranted and raved against this section; now he is as docile as a lamb; now he is in favor of it. Now under the expectation that the word "purchase" will be stricken out by a resolution calling upon the committee on revision, he is willing to support the section. Sir, if anything be stricken out, it must be done by the Convention, and not by the committee on revision.

Mr. NAVE. What difference does it make?

Mr. COOKERLY. It is a question to be settled by the Convention, because it involves a principle.

Now, sir, from the first introduction of this provision until now, I have been opposed to it; first, from principle, and secondly, because the Convention ought not to ingraft such a provision into the organic law, even if the provision be right; for it is clearly a matter of legislation. These are the two reasons why I opposed the section. It is now proposed to strike out the word "purchase." If that word be stricken out, the section will be less exceptionable. But what is the proposition of the gentleman? I understand that his solicitude is for the widow and the poor orphan. He says that the widow is not sufficiently provided for—that there is not enough of the property secured to her. But I ask him and you, does this change the law of descent? I consider that it is not so beneficial to the women as the statute law is at present. If the gentleman wants to change the law of descent, if he wants to give to the widow more than one-third of the property of the husband after his death, why does he not introduce a section for that purpose. I will vote for it. I believe she ought to have one-half, and where there are no children, she should perhaps have more. There are two sides to the question. There are men, as well as women and children, sometimes to be provided for. I know this is a theme upon which gentlemen can talk, as the gentleman from Clark has done, to please the ear of the ladies, but when you come to the matter of justice and right, it is proper that before we act, we should look well—we should weigh the matter before we take the step. Now there is no greater admirer of the ladies than I am. No man loves them better. ["Consent."] But where their interest comes in conflict with the interest of children, and the other members of community, I am against it. I love my children as well as I do my wife; and I go for the interest of children, as well as for the interest of married women. If you adopt this section as it is, what will be the result? Women will become speculators in real estate. I hesitate not to assert on this floor, that it will destroy that unity of interest and feelings which should exist between husband and wife. They will each set up a different establishment; they will become rivals in trade; and they will find themselves placed in hostility to each other.

Now, sir, so far as regards my action upon this subject, I hope the section will be reconsidered, and if it is to pass at all, I hope the word "purchase" will be stricken out. Why, sir, what doctrine was it that the gentleman from Posey endorsed here the other day? And let me say a word to the other gentleman from Posey. He says the proposition is objected to because his colleague introduced it. Why, sir, has it come to this, that everything that he introduces here, has to be voted for? Has it come to this, that everything that the gentleman from Posey introduces, has to be supported by the delegates of this Convention? He comes from Posey, I from Vigo; we all have different views and opinions, and is it not our right as well as our duty to state our opinions here upon this floor, and to vote as we please, it matters not who may introduce the subject? I have not opposed this section because he introduced it, and I do not think that it is right and proper for the gentleman to get up and make the assertion that he has made. Sir, it is an indignity. It is an insult to the representatives of the people.

Mr. HOVEY. Will the gentleman allow me to explain. I have voted against the section and amendment, from the first to the last, for the reason I have given.

I have followed no man as my guide in this Convention, and have been under the necessity of differing from my colleague as often probably as any delegate upon this floor. I did say, that I thought there was an under current at work in regard to the section under debate, but I made no personal allusions to any particular gentleman. I made no accusation against the gentleman from Vigo, but must again repeat that I think that this measure would not have met with the opposition it has from some quarters, were it not from the fact that my colleague is regarded as a prominent candidate for the United States Senate, and fears are entertained that this measure, if adopted, may add to his strength.

Mr. COOKERLY. Well, sir, I do not speak for others, but I have a great deal of charity for others, and I do not believe a single delegate here voted against the section for the reason that the gentleman from Posey introduced it. Now I say that if the section is to pass, I want the word "purchase" stricken out. If this be done, I will make no further opposition to the passage of the section.

Mr. BADGER. It seems, sir, that my Bible argument on this subject, is acting as a thorn in the side of more than one of the honorable delegates on this floor, and, notwithstanding there seems to be a disposition on the part of several gentlemen to assail me, I feel that I am on the right side of the question, and, as a consequence, I thank God and take courage. [Applause.] I would that I had time to discuss this question, in its bearings upon the civil, social, moral, and political condition of society. I was not aware until a few moments since, that the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) had a missile to hurl at me, nor do I think that portion of his remarks worthy my notice. He thinks I oppose this measure because his colleague introduced it. This, sir, is a poor compliment to his worthy colleague, but I can assure him that such is not the fact. I should have opposed the measure, let it have emanated from whom it might. Nay, more; had I known as much of the life and productions of the gentleman who introduced this matter, then, as I know now, I should have spent, at least, a small part of my time in noticing principles connected with this one, of which he has for years been the advocate. For I am prepared to demonstrate, to the satisfaction, as I think, of all present, that this law is the entering wedge to the accomplishment of the doctrine recognized by the gentleman in his marriage contract. And if the honorable gentleman (Mr. Hovey) thinks his colleague unable to defend himself, and desires to assail me or my position, he will find me ready at any time for defense. Mr. President, I regard the evil tendency of this doctrine upon the civil and religious conditions of society as a matter of vital import. And I am exceedingly sorry, sir, that we have those among us who are disposed to trample sacrilegiously under foot, the relations which by divine authority exist between husband and wife.

Sir, tell it not in Indiana, publish it not in the streets of this beautiful city, that the learned and the elite ones of the land, are the votaries of a system which is rife with mischief to the best and holiest interests of society—a system which, if adhered to, proposes entire obliteration of that identity of interest which is founded in reason and common sense, because it is in strict accordance with the teachings of the laws of nature and of nature's God.

I propose now to quote from a work before me, the marriage contract of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and would be pleased to know if he has any objection to its being read; if he has I shall, of course, not read it.

MR. OWEN. If the gentleman wishes to introduce irrelevant matter into this debate, I shall be extremely glad to hear him quote anything he pleases, although I am sorry to have the time of the Convention occupied with matters purely personal.

MR. BADGER. Well, sir, we have presented to us here, the marriage contract of the gentleman from Posey. I will read it.

MR. HALL. I call the gentleman to order.

THE PRESIDENT. It is not in order to read from a newspaper or any other publication. The gentleman must obtain the leave of the Convention before he can read it.

MR. HALL. If it were permissible to read extracts in reference to every point that is debated here, when should we be able to close our labors?

SEVERAL VOICES. The gentleman from Gibson is out of order.

THE PRESIDENT put the question, Shall the gentleman from Putnam have leave to read the extract?

The yeas and nays were demanded.

MR. WALPOLE. Sir, this is not the first example that we have had on this floor, where a gentleman has been prohibited from reading a document in the support of the position which he assumes. I maintain that he has a right to read, whether it be from a newspaper or not, and that what he reads is to be considered as being legitimately a part of his argument. The gentleman is attempting to show that if this proposition be carried out, it will have a tendency towards socialism, and he proposes to read the marriage contract of the gentleman from Posey, which recognizes the principle of socialism. He has as much right to read it without interruption from the Chair as any gentleman here has to read a document, touching upon any other gentleman, that may be under discussion. The other day a certain gentleman assailed me, and I attempted to reply, and to show that he had assumed false data. The Chair called me to order, although the same privilege had been extended to every other gentlemen and the privilege had really been assumed by some to read documents that were not legitimately in order, and now, a gentleman proposes to read an extract, and he is called to order because the matter that he proposes to quote has reference to a prominent member of this Convention. Let us not adopt one principle for one particular case, and another for another. Let us not make flesh of one and fish of another. If one gentleman can legitimately read extracts, let the rule be universal. I object therefore to the gentleman from Gibson interposing. He, of all others, should not interpose, for there is scarcely a question that comes up for discussion here, that the gentleman does not refer to the resolutions of the county of Gibson, and no one calls him to order. Let us act fairly. The gentleman from Posey, the other day, was permitted to read a long list of extracts, and not one voice was raised to call him to order. But this morning when we have a most important question under consideration, affecting the principles of socialism, as inculcated by the gentleman who introduced this section, and a member is called to order by the gentleman from Gibson because he proposes to read an extract.

THE PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark in relation to this matter, that it is not within the province, nor is it the distinct right of any gentleman to read extracts from newspapers, or any other documents written or printed, if any member objects to it. It has been done repeatedly, however, and the Chair did not and does not now think it proper to interfere; but when the reading is objected to it is the duty of the Chair to call the gentleman to order. The reading of the extract by the gentleman from Putnam having been objected to by the gentleman from Gibson, it is for the Convention to determine whether the gentleman from Putnam shall have the privilege of reading it or not. Upon the question of granting the gentlemen leave the yeas and nays are demanded.

MR. BADGER. Sir, as there is a manifest determination to deny my right to read, I must content myself with quoting such extracts as I can remember, without opening the book. I presume this privilege will not be denied me.

First, then, in this contract, the following language occurs: "We have selected the simplest ceremony which the laws of this State (New York) recognize, and which, in consequence of the liberality of these laws, involves not the necessity of calling in the aid of a member of the clerical profession—a profession, the credentials of which we do not recognize, and the influence of which we are led to consider injurious to society."

In the next place it is said, that "the ceremony involves not the necessity of making promises regarding that over which we have no control, the state of human affections in the distant future, nor repeating forms which we deem offensive, inasmuch as they outrage the principles of human liberty and equality, by confirming rights and imposing duties unequally on the sexes."

Most assuredly, Mr. President, these sentiments need no comment at my hands.

But in order to prove beyond a doubt that I do the gentleman no injustice in my remarks, I quote once more:

"Of the unjust rights which, in virtue of this ceremony, an iniquitous law totally gives me over the person and property of another, I cannot legally, but I can morally, divest myself, and I hereby distinctly and emphatically declare that I consider myself, and earnestly desire to be considered by others, as utterly divested now and during the rest of my life, of any such rights."

Sir, let me now ask delegates if they are prepared to endorse this doctrine? Are gentlemen prepared to give their sanction to a law which is, as I before remarked, the entering wedge to the establishment of a state of affairs, the fundamental principles of which are contained in what I have just quoted? I know not what may be the feelings and views of other gentlemen, but if my very existence were suspended upon the rectitude of my views and my course upon this subject, still, sir, I should maintain them unmoved.

Gentlemen seem to be disposed to discard the higher law; but, Mr. President, I am proud to say that I recognize the obligations of a Divine law, and especially so in its bearings upon this subject; a subject in which is involved not only our peace in time, but our happiness in eternity.

Sir, I hope it will not be considered vain in me to express a willingness that my principles on this subject, in contradistinction with those of the honorable gentleman from Posey, were written in characters of light athwart the noon-day's heavens, that all the world might read them. [Applause.]

I have in my drawer numerous other extracts from the writings of the gentleman from Posey, but am not allowed to read them; and indeed, sir, under the circumstances, decency forbids their use. But if I were permitted to read them, and show their worse than damning influence upon society, in conjunction with this system of separate interests, I venture to aver that gentlemen would turn from them with disgust; aye, sir, they would shun them as they would shun man's worst enemy, and flee from them as from a poisonous reptile. My position is now defined and unmistakable. And I confess I have some feeling on this subject, for it is one, sir, upon which I am conscientious. And hence it is that I feel bound to combat this or any other principle that has for its object the seduction of society from those feelings and views connected with the marriage relation that emanate from a pure and honest heart.

But it is said that women themselves feel that they are degraded by the operations of the present law—that they desire a separate interest in order to their elevation and happiness.

Sir, I mean no disrespect whatever to any lady, but will venture to predict that in most cases when such separate interest is desired, the woman belongs to that class to which reference has been made, or, she wears the breeches at home.

Mr. President, should this section remain in the new Constitution, if the Convention should refuse to re-consider this vote, although all things else should be in strict accordance with my views, I pledge myself not only to vote against the adoption of that document, but, sir, my voice, if capable of being raised at all, shall be raised in opposition to its reception. [Applause.]

But, sir, my time has nearly expired, and before I sit down, I wish to make one more appeal to delegates, and beseech of them to pause and reflect soberly upon this matter, the effect of which, if adopted, will most certainly be the contamination of the entire moral atmosphere. I ask gentlemen if those wives of theirs, who are the partners of their toils, their feelings, and their fame, are prepared for its reception? Are those lovely daughters of yours, around whose well-being is entwined the very pride of your existence, prepared for it?

Mr. President, unless assailed again, I now close my remarks on this subject; and so far as I am concerned, I leave its destiny with the wise heads and honest hearts of the honorable members of this Convention. And, sir, I do humbly trust that the vote by which it was passed may be re-considered, and that, upon its final passage, it may be defeated—that it may find a resting place where it properly belongs, and be numbered with the things that were.

Mr. HALL. I had no other design in calling the gentleman from Putnam to order, than to facilitate the business properly before this Convention. The gentleman from Putnam stated in advance, that the article he proposed to read from a newspaper was of a personal character, having reference alone to the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). Had the gentleman been indulged in his wishes, then the gentleman attacked would, as a matter of course, claimed the right to reply, and thus the time of this Convention would have been taken up in the discussion of a question wholly irrelevant to the subject matter before us. This Convention has already been in session nearly eleven weeks, and we have not advanced one-third through our labors. It is time we should pause, and reflect upon this matter. We are daily wasting time and money in useless discussion. Shall there be no end to this folly? Each day we sit in this Convention costs the State upwards of six hundred dollars. Is this not worth a serious reflection, when members propose to introduce subjects wholly foreign to the business the people sent us here to perform?

The gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) who takes ground in opposition to my course on this occasion, has said that I ought to be the last man on this floor to object to reading anything from a newspaper; for, says he, scarcely a subject comes up before this Convention that I was not upon my feet, reading, without objection, certain resolutions which emanated from the people of Gibson. Sir, the gentleman is unfortunate, both in his reference to me and to the resolutions he referred to. As to myself, I can assert before this Convention that I have occupied as little of their time as any other member, and so far from the resolutions I introduced affording the gentleman a precedent for what he is now urging, it might well be quoted as an authority against him; for I will say to that gentleman and to this Convention, that the resolutions referred to by the gentleman, emanated from the people in a primary assembly, that they were introduced at an early day in the session, and became and are now a part of the journal of its proceedings. What I have occasionally referred to, has been a part of the journal of this Convention.

[Mr. BADGER made a speech, which is withheld for revision, but will appear in Tuesday's issue.]

Mr. BASCOM. I had intended to read an extract, but as it is deemed out of order I shall refrain from doing so. And perhaps I should not have said a word upon this occasion had it not been for the observations of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Hovey,) who remarked that there was an under current at work in this Convention operating against the section. Now I undertake to say that the current is setting the other way; it is working towards the other side. I undertake to say that the gentleman who is pretending to be the father of the proposition, and who is getting all the honor, is himself, and those who act with him, making that under current, and I know not what the result may be. I presume that we will all vote against the re-consideration, in order to get our names inscribed upon this spout of this tea pot. [Laughter.] I am not contending for the rights of women for the sake of having a memorial presented to me to hang around my neck. I have been as strong an advocate of the rights of women as the gentleman from Posey, and perhaps if the word "purchase" was stricken out of the resolution, the provision might be of some advantage to them. The provision would then be, I think, a very good one. If it was in order I would read a short extract from Macaulay's History of England. [Cries of "Read! Read! Read!"]

The extract reads as follows:

"All the peculiarities of his character fitted him (Burnet) to be the peace-maker between William and Mary. Where persons who ought to esteem and love each other are kept asunder, as often happens, by some cause which three words of frank explanation would remove, they are fortunate if they possess an indiscreet friend who blurts out the whole truth. Burnet plainly told the Princess what the feeling was which preyed upon her husband's mind. She learned for the first time, with no small astonishment, that when she became Queen of England, William would not share her throne. She warmly declared that there was no proof of conjugal submission and affection which she was not ready to give. Burnet, with many apologies, and with solemn protestations, that no human being had put words into his mouth, informed her that the remedy was in her own hands. She might easily, when the crown devolved on her, induce her Parliament not only to give the regal title to her husband, but even to transfer to him by a legislative act the administration of the government. 'But,' he added, 'your royal highness ought to consider well before you announce any such resolution; for it is a resolution which, having once been announced, cannot safely or easily be retracted.' 'I want no time for consideration,' answered Mary. 'It is enough that I have an opportunity of showing my regard for the Prince. Tell him what I say, and bring him to me, that he may hear it from my own lips.' Burnet went in quest of William; but William was many miles off after a stag. It was not till the next day that the decisive interview took place. 'I did not know till yesterday,' said Mary, 'that there was such a difference between the laws of England and the laws of God. But I now promise you that you shall always bear rule; and, in return, I ask only this, that as I shall observe the precept which enjoins wives to obey their husbands, you will observe that which enjoins husbands to love their wives.' Her generous affection completely gained the heart of William. From that time till the sad day when he was carried in fits from her dying bed, there was entire friendship and confidence between them."

Now I ask gentlemen if they desire to extrange husbands and wives? If you adopt this section as it is you will assuredly excite difficulties. If, as the gentleman from Dearborn remarked, the section be re-considered; and the word "purchase" be stricken therefrom, I shall vote for it. But I hold that the Legislature has the power now, and has had for the last twenty years, under the old Constitution, to remedy the defect, if any defect there be in this respect.

Sir, this provision has nothing to do with the law of descents; this section proposes no change in the law of descents, and I wish by no act of mine, by no vote that I may give, to give occasion to estrange in the least possible way the feelings of husband and wife. Sir, I have no faith in the section as adopted, unless you strike out the word "purchase." I look upon it as a dead letter. Upon a man and wife who live together as they should live, your section will have no effect. If the husband treats the wife as she should be treated, she has got all the right she needs. She needs not the protecting arm of this Convention, so long as she has the protecting arm of her husband. But if he should prove to be a fiend in human shape, no law, and no constitutional provision, will reach him. I hope that the section will be re-considered, and that the word "purchase" will be stricken out. If so, I shall then vote for the section.

Mr. STEELE. I rise for the purpose of making a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Putnam. I have no earthly doubt that it is a very honest impression that is made on his mind in regard to this matter. But I claim that I have feelings and opinions as well as the gentleman from Putnam, and I fancy that before I am through with these remarks I shall satisfy the gentleman that he is as blind in regard to this matter, as Paul became when he was journeying to Damascus. [Shouts of "good," "consent," "go ahead."] And first, I ask gentlemen if these common law distinctions exist in that future state of existence to which he has referred. Have you any of those distinctions there? No, sir, you have none of them. The union there in regard to all matters is perfectly pure. And I will moreover say in relation to some remarks that the gentleman has made in a Scriptural point of view, that from his own remarks there is nothing more evident than that the duties that are to be performed in the marriage contract by both male and female, are set forth in one single text, where Paul speaks of the obedience of the wife to the husband. He says it should be the same as the obedience that Christ requires of the church. He enjoins upon husbands that they love their wives as Christ loves the church. How does Christ love the church? He loves the church so well that He gives all things by free grace, and He gives them good measure, heaped up and running over. He so loves the church that He gives them all, not a part; and the same is required of the wife. What is required of you, ladies, after your husbands give you all things—after he has done all he can do—after he has given you all he possesses? This is required of you, that as the church is obedient to Christ, even so shall you be obedient to your husbands. That illustrates the whole matter. And another text that has relation to this subject is "ye shall keep yourselves unspotted from the world."

Now, sir, a few words in reply to the gentleman from Tippecanoe in relation to his theory. He compares the relation of husband and wife, with the union of the States of this confederacy. The comparison is a very good one; and I ask, what is better calculated to destroy that union than to create a diversity of interests? Consider for a moment. Two individuals enter into a partnership—one puts in a larger portion of stock than another. But suppose the one who puts in least converts to his own use the whole of the partnership stock—will it not have the effect of producing ill feeling?

Now the word "purchase" seems to constitute the great difficulty in this case, and it appears to me to be a small matter to re-consider the section for. It is a matter of indifference to me in what manner the gentleman from Posey formed his marriage contract. I go upon the ground of the principle itself, and let me at once show you how trivial the objection to the word "purchase" appears to be in my view of the matter. For instance, a man marries a wife, and I have known many men to get married. ["Consent"]. Gentlemen are consenting too soon. They ought first to hear me out. [Much merriment.]

[Mr. Steele proceeded to relate an instance that had come within his own knowledge where a man married for the sake of the property owned by the lady whom he married, and where the husband, having contrived to get the property into his possession, converted the whole of it to his own use and benefit, and prevented it from descending, as it should have done, to her heirs, she having been previously married.]

I can see no good reason, continued Mr. S., why the property of the wife should not be secured to her and her heirs.

The gentleman from Putnam talks about the Divine law in connection with this question. Sir, Christianity works nothing but love. But if you create a diversity of interest you destroy the very principle upon which the married contract rests.

Mr. RARIDEN. This sir, is the last kind of subject that can come before the Convention, that ought to produce irritation. Does any man doubt that there is any other inclination prevailing in this body in regard to this subject, than an inclination to do justice to women? Does any man suppose that we have any other view than to promote the good of both husband and wife? I entertain no such idea.

It is a mere difference of opinion among gentlemen as to what will redound most to the happiness and contentment which should rest in the marriage relation.

And this being the only consideration, I say I believe there is not a member of this body who has not that object in view. I say, then, I can see no cause for irritation. That the members of this body have been and are influenced by the highest and purest motives, I have not an earthly doubt; and it is my object in rising at this time to show the practical effects of the principle that is proposed to be adopted. I said in the beginning that the proposition was insidious. I said that the gentleman proposed one thing, while another was disguised under it; and that the result would be to create a separation of interests which would lead to continued strife. I would be willing that a provision securing to the wife her own property during the coverture, should be incorporated in the Constitution, but I am not in favor of creating distrusts between husband and wife, and permitting a married woman, during the life time of her husband, to have any special control of property independent of her husband. It is not the proper sphere of a woman in it; she would lose her loveliness, and most likely her property and reputation, for who can love a jewing bargain-making woman. Whenever a lady travels out of the proper line peculiar to female character, she lays off the ermine which God gave her, and descends from the character of an angel to the character of an amazon. I would not place her in a situation that would tend to destroy, or to lessen the love and mutual dependence which should exist between husband and wife. Under the present system of things, the man is bound to love and honor his wife, or he degrades himself, and it pertains to his marital rights to control the property and the conduct of the wife. This is a part of the contract, and it is so provided, for wise ends. The husband becomes responsible for the conduct of the wife when he assumes the marriage relation. But if you give her the right to manage property without consulting the husband, and yet hold him responsible for the conduct of the wife in all things, do you not see that your law will be inconsistent? Of all persons the husband is the most interested in the preservation of the property of the wife, and of all persons the husband would be the most disposed to prey upon the rights of the wife, if their interests were separated, and the intimacy of the married relations, doing away with all diffidence on her part, to prey upon his rights. There will necessarily arise strife and turmoil about property.

Now he might or might not be bound for her support. Admitting, then, that they have a separate interest in the property, I ask gentlemen what they propose to do in regard to their support? Is he to support her? Or are they under mutual obligation to contribute from their private resources for the support of the establishment, just like common partners in trade? This is a matter that must be regulated by law. The husband is, as the law stands now, bound for the support of the wife, and you find few men who are not proud to acquit themselves honorably of this duty, and to render the situation of the wife as easy and comfortable as it is in their power to do. I speak of husbands as they ought to be, which I suppose embraces a large majority. Well, what do you propose to do after you dis sever the interests of husband and wife in relation to property? The husband will no longer have control of the person and the property of the wife. You strike out an article from the marriage contract that undoubtedly should exist: for when a woman under the present system agrees to take a man, it is just the same as if she should say, "I agree to surrender to you my person and my property—the control of my life and conduct," and the husband on his part takes her for his supreme Empress—and undertakes to be responsible for the property and the conduct of the wife. If the wife should slander a neighbor, the husband would be liable to an action. The wife is not answerable, but the husband is. If she commits a trespass, or does any act that is contrary to law, the husband is responsible. She is in this respect, himself. Now what do you propose to do when you dis sever the interests of husband and wife? What kind of laws must the Legislature pass to carry out the principles which you here inculcate? In the first place, the Legislature must give to the husband a right of action against the wife in a suit at law, and they must give a similar right to the wife, because they will trespass upon each other if they are such as thus desire separate interests. She has not the physical strength to contend with him personally. She must have the right of action in a suit at law. The law must provide her a remedy for all trespasses committed against her. Will not this tend to disturb the harmony that should prevail in families? Suppose we yield the point that the husband shall support the wife, and that she shall have the undisputed control of her part of the property. Her doctrine is to keep all she has and get all she can, for she cannot love her slave as she can her lord. You must either indemnify the husband and make her responsible for her debts in a court of justice, or else nobody will trust her, and that disgraces her ten times more than if she had no separate property of her own. I am speaking of the practical effect of this principle, if carried out. Sir, it is a covert assault upon the holy state of marriage, and an attempt to strike from it that feature which constitutes it the most blessed and the most sacred of all human relations.

Gentlemen have alluded to the law of descents. I tell them I will go with them for a change in that law, for I have ever entertained the idea that as husband and wife have been one during life, one should succeed to the other in the inheritance of property. That is my doctrine. Well, I say, then, that it is because I would not place the woman in a situation which would tend to diminish the attachment of the husband, and make her less idolized, for what is property with a woman, compared with feeling that she engrosses the whole soul of the man with whom she has entwined her destiny, and whom her children look up to and call father.

I would go further. If you say that the wife shall have separate rights in regard to property, you should also allow her to participate in the making of the laws to protect it. If you give her the rights that you propose to give her I see no reason why she should not have a hand in making the laws. I say that the result of such a principle will be to bring woman down from the character of an angel to that of an Amazon, to teach her to deal in bonds and mortgages—instead of the graces. They are to be permitted to enter into competition with the husband in the business transactions of life, to enter the marts of trade, and to look out for bargains. Where is the man who can love in them what they now adore—who can make an idol of such a being? Look around, and see how much woman, lovely woman, will lose by descending from the high ground she occupies, and becoming an adventurer in the marts of trade. I tell you it is a mistake when you talk about woman's rights being in dominion over property—it is to engross hearts and affections that are proud to lay offerings at her feet of all they have the powers they possessed. I have once described the source of that power. I shall not go over it again. It has been my purpose to point out the effects of giving them those extended rights which you propose to give, and I say that gentlemen cannot fail to see that after recognizing those rights it is necessary that she should take a part in making the laws of the country. You must make them eligible to office, and give them a potential power at the ballot-box, if they are to maintain those rights.

Nothing less than this will answer, and the moment you introduce litigation in regard to these rights, you strike from the marriage relation that which has always formed its chief happiness, and I go further and say that it tends to lower the character of women. They have won their way to an influence that is as powerful and potent as any influence that ever was exercised. Do you not see at this day, when our galleries and lobbies are crowded with fair listeners—do you not see gentlemen, as in the days of chivalry, ready to break a lance in their cause—ready to do battle in defence of their supposed rights! in order to win a single or even smile of approbation or an approving glance from them? I speak of it not in a derogatory sense, but I say they have attained a high degree of influence in the only way in which females ever can or will acquire influence in society; and if you grant them the so-called rights that are here proposed to be granted, you will at once and forever destroy the best part of that influence.

These are the views that I entertain and believed, that it is a covered attack, calculated to disturb the present married relation. I am opposed—utterly opposed to make such innovations.

Mr. OWEN. There are two things which may happen on the present occasion. They are: that the vote may be re-considered, and the widest range again given to debate, on a subject that has already claimed much attention from the Convention; and, in that case, I pledge myself that not an assault that has been made, whether on the section before us, or on myself individually, but shall be replied to—ay! to the very letter! [Applause.] Or it may happen that debate will remain restricted, as at present, to fifteen minutes; and while this is so, one can but glance at the charges, personal or otherwise, that have been just employed in the attempt to reverse a deliberate decision of the Convention.

Yet, brief as the time is, it is due alike to myself and to my fellow members, that I notice, by a word or two, the attack, alike irrelevant and unprovoked, made upon me this morning by the delegate from Putnam (Mr. Badger).

I have no reply to his unmannerly and insidious allusions to a little word of mine, which the ignorance or the grossness of some men cannot appreciate. There are subjects, however useful—however proper—nay, eminently moral in themselves—which demand a proper selection of time and place for their discussion.

The delegate speaks of what he is pleased to call my "Marriage Contract," but what was, in fact, but a memorandum of my sentiments, written in the privacy of the closet, the morning before my marriage, some eighteen years ago; never intended for publication; shown accidentally to a friend of mine, named Gilbert, and by him published some months afterwards, during my absence on a marriage trip to Europe; published, I cannot doubt, from the best motives, as evidence of sentiments which he conceived did me honor, but without my knowledge or consent. I say this, not, very certainly, in the way of apology for a document that requires none—only in explanation of the appearance, in print, of what I had not the slightest intention of ever obtruding on the public.

But to what amounts the railing accusation brought against me here by the delegate from Putnam, in connection with an old and a private matter like this? First, he charges that I had, in that paper, expressed my unwillingness to call in the aid of the Church in the performance of the marriage ceremony. That is true. I was not married by a clergyman; I was married in my father-in-law's house in New York, in the presence of some twenty or thirty friends, by a notary public. We are accustomed—we of the West, especially—to do in this matter as we please. Some choose to be married by a minister of the Gospel; some, by a justice of the peace. I doubt not many of my fellow members have called in, on occasion of their marriage, the services of the latter. I never heard before that it was a crime to select, on such an occasion, a magistrate instead of a preacher. Sir, this charge is simply ridiculous.

What is the second count in the indictment? It is, that, in the document in question, I declared that, though I could not legally divest myself of the unjust and tyrannical rights which an iniquitous law—dating from barbarous times—gave me over the person and property of another, I desired to be considered as disclaiming and renouncing these. Sir, I trust that, in my conduct, through long years of wedded life, toward as good and true a partner as ever husband was blessed with, I have acted up to the spirit of that disclaimer.

I am indebted to the delegate from Putnam for the unwilling testimony he has thus adduced of my sincerity and consistency. He proves to you that I felt and wrote eighteen years ago as I feel and speak to-day. He shows you that I then renounced, in my own person, those feudal rights to property justly belonging to another, which I now seek to abrogate, not only in my own case, but in the case of all my sex. I thought and felt, at the moment of my own marriage, that the law which denies to the wife all right to her property was a relic of barbarism, a disgrace to modern civilization. I think and feel so still. That conviction it was that induced me to pen the document which the individual on my right (Mr. Badger) has dragged into this discussion. That conviction it is which still urges me to do battle in this just and righteous cause.

Sir, the delegate may find, perhaps, in the paper he attempted to read, certainly in other portions of my writings, sentiments—opinions—which by many are deemed heretical. Some of these, written in earlier years, I adhere to, now as then; others I should write differently, if it were to do again. He must have been a careless thinker—he must have profited little by the teachings of experience—who finds, after twenty years, nothing to modify—no word to take back. But if my maturer judgment cannot endorse all that in my more youthful days I may have said, I call to mind with satisfaction, mingled, it may be, with pride, that not one sentiment, whether just or not, was uttered—not one word, whether wise or not, was penned—save with intention the most upright; from pure motive, for justifiable end. I make no pretention now, any more than I did then, to orthodoxy. I claim for myself, as the good and the noble Roger Williams did of yore, that right of private judgment and free speech which it is our country's proudest boast, that every American citizen—be he citizen by birth, or citizen, as I am, by selection and preference—has a right to DEMAND of his fellow citizens. To the greatest it has not been refused; to the humblest it may not justly be denied. Jefferson claimed it, when he asked your fathers' votes for the office of Chief Magistrate of the Republic. I am equally entitled to its sacred shield, though I stand here but a simple delegate to this Convention.

Sir, there are two courses that may be pursued in debate. The one is marked by uprightness, candor, and generosity. Its prompting motives are a love of truth, a sense of justice. And, let a man be right or wrong, if, in urging his sentiments he pursue such a course, his opponents—or that portion of them whose good opinion is worth having—cannot choose but respect him. There is another course, to which men sometimes stoop, wholly different in its character, and as different in its effects. It has no fairness, no straightforward honesty about it. Its sole aim is success, at any cost, by any means. It looks round, not for argument, but for prejudice. And it employs such prejudice much in the same way, (to adopt a homely illustration,) as a mischievous boy may tie a stone around the neck of some luckless cat, doomed to be drowned in the nearest pond. A proposition which would succeed on its own merits, is loaded down by the weight of extraneous irrelevancies, and sunk in the stream of turbid debate.

The delegate from Putnam may inquire and welcome, if it interests him, into my early life—may scrutinize my personal habits, past or present. Errors we all have; yet, as to what I have done, or what I have written, there is nothing of which I am ashamed.

He may do this, if he will. But, for myself I say, that if his biography, written by his worst enemy, lay before me on this desk, I would not open a page,—I would not read a line. Detraction and ribald abuse are within any man's reach. Nothing is easier than to use such weapons. The brutal bully, the disgrace of the bar-room, is an adept in their use. The difficulty—with a gentleman it is an insuperable one—the only difficulty is, in resolving to use them. [Applause.]

Sir, a strange turn has been given to a remark made this morning by my colleague, (Mr. Hovey,) the remark that the section now under debate has been opposed on account of its patermity. This has been twisted into a claim set up by my colleague, that whatever I brought forward was infallibly right, and should be received without scruple or question. No construction can be more unfair or less warranted by the gentleman's remark. It is absurd in itself, and not very creditable to those who make it. Whether correct or incorrect, my colleague's inference was certainly not complimentary to myself. It was an intimation that in other, less heretical heads, the section might have escaped much denunciation now employed to defeat it. The attack of the delegate from Putnam is some proof that the remark was not wholly without foundation.

A word now, since a few minutes are still left to me, on the merits of the question. Here is the vote on the law passed four years ago, and securing to women, so far as regards real estate, all, and more than all, that we claim for them in this section. First, there is the vote in the House; I read from the House journal of 1846-7, at page 360; it stands 72 to 17; more than four to one, in the popular branch. Secondly, here, in the Senate journal for that session, at page 470, is the vote of that body on the same bill, 38 to 9; again a majority of more than four to one.

You can scarcely find, sir, in the records of our legislation, an instance of a more overwhelming vote in favor of a novel and untried principle of this importance. There could not be adduced a stronger proof that the bill was regarded as a beneficent reform, eminently in accordance with the humane spirit of modern civilization.

Is there any chance that such a law as this, passed by a vote so decided, should ever be repealed? None, sir; not the slightest. Such reforms, once fairly commenced, ever go on. There is no example, so far as my reading extends, in all modern history, of a change from the mild rule of the civil law as to the wife's property, to the harsh despotism of the common law on the same subject, while changes from the common law rule to the provisions of the civil law are of continual occurrence. You might as well attempt to stop the sun in his course, as to arrest the progress of a principle like this.

The statute I have referred to will remain the permanent policy of the State. And protection for personal property will be added; possibly not in this Constitution, though I confidently believe that the section, in some shape, will finally triumph ere we separate. But whether by organic law or by legislative act, the wife's property of whatever kind, will, beyond all question, be protected by law in this, our State of Indiana.

Sir, I know that a majority of this Convention are opposed to the incorporation in the new Constitution of a definite homestead exemption. But say that we had decided to adopt such a provision; and suppose the question to be, whether the exemption should be of personal property as well as of real estate. Should we not decide that question affirmatively? [Cries of "Yes," "yes."] I am sure that we should. I am sure that two-thirds or three-fourths of the Convention would decide that, while we exempted the farm or the dwelling, we should exempt also the mechanic's tools and the renter's farming utensils. But if that be a just principle as regards exemption, so is it also in regard to the wife's property.

The law already protects land. We propose—and that is all we propose—equally to protect the property of women who have no land. Upon that issue I am willing to go before the country.

Mr. HOLMAN. I simply rise to say this: I intended, when I had possession of the floor a short time ago, to move, before taking my seat, that the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology be instructed to amend the section by striking out the word "purchase," and also the words "any other way." The section would then read as follows:

"Securing to them under equitable conditions, all property, real and personal, whether owned by them before marriage or afterwards acquired by gift, devise, or descent; and also providing for the registration of the wife's separate property."

This will be a provision in accordance with the provisions of the common law in reference to this matter. The word "purchase" is an innovation upon the common law. The balance of the section provides that the property thus acquired—that is, by gift, devise, or descent—shall remain secured to the wife upon equitable conditions.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark, as the inquiry has been made as to whether it would be in order for the committee on revision to amend the section as proposed, that the Chair entertains no doubt that it is perfectly competent for the committee to make the amendment under the instructions of the Convention. It is within the power of all deliberative bodies to instruct their committees in regard to their duties. And the committee is bound to do only that which they are instructed to do. It is for the Convention to determine whether they will take that course.

Mr. PETTIT. I have not risen to discuss the principle that is involved in this question. It would take a longer time than is allowed, under our rule, to discuss the many points that suggest themselves in connection with it. I shall, however, briefly notice a few of them.

The first thing that suggests itself to my mind is this: Is it desirable to make the family one, to secure unity, harmony, and chastity? I shall undertake to answer the question in the affirmative. Whether the common or the civil law tends most to accomplish this end, or the reverse, will also be a question to be answered, and it can only be answered by a comparison of the social condition of people living where the civil law prevails, and of those living where the common law prevails. What is the condition of the marriage relation in England and the United States, on the one side, where the common law obtains, and its condition in Italy, Spain, Mexico, Brazil, and other countries where the civil law prevails, on the other. These questions will naturally suggest themselves to the minds of those who propose to discuss the question; but I do not. With the main features of the section I am content. I am not content, however, with this or any other law that shall enact a separate interest between husband and wife—that shall give to the wife, during the life of the husband, the control of property, either real or personal. I am willing to put the wife's property both real and personal while the husband lives, and after his death, beyond the reach of the creditors of the husband or his legal representatives, and further than that I am not willing to go. Sir, I need pass no compliment on the heart or the head of the gentleman from Posey. I believe that he has introduced this matter with feelings of sincere philanthropy. But as I understood the section when it was first introduced, there were words contained in it that were clearly objectionable to my mind. I said so at the time to the gentleman who introduced the section, in private conversation. There is no man who is more ready than I am to vote for a provision that shall secure to the wife the benefit of her separate property; but I am not for giving to the wife the control of property real or personal during the life of her husband.

But if you allow this section, as it now stands, to be incorporated in the organic law, you make it necessary that she shall be a party to all legal transactions in reference to the property, that all leases shall be given by her, and that the rents shall be collected by her, or in her name. All suits in ejectment must be brought against her; the sheriff must serve the writ on the wife, and not on the husband; all writs of replevin and detinue must be made out in her name, and her's alone.

With the present section I am not content. I would amend it so that it should provide that the property, real or personal, of the wife, shall be secured to her from the creditors of the husband. And I would secure it as well against the executor and administrator of the husband after his death, as against the husband's creditors during his life; and the section which I have proposed, the meaning of which cannot be misunderstood, for it is plain, simple, and definite in its character, would leave the matter where I think it ought to be left; that is, during the coverture the husband shall be at liberty to control the real and personal property, he shall have the absolute and undisputed control of the property, and shall take the rents and profits for the maintenance of the family, for the maintenance of the wife and her offspring.

Sir, this section will supply the defect in the law in regard to this subject; it will accomplish all that is necessary. I doubt not it will accomplish all that the gentleman from Posey himself desires. I cannot believe he wishes that after the marriage the wife should continue to control the property. It is not her sphere. The management of her household is her appropriate occupation, and if she be driven into boisterous action, into the stream and turmoil of life, to manage and transact business relative to property, it is imposing upon her a burthen which is unsuited to her and which she is ill qualified to bear.

This section, then, if it be substituted for the one which has been adopted, will secure to the woman all her property, real and personal, against the creditors of the husband and against the executors and administrators of the husband. So far I am willing to go, and farther than this I will not go.

On motion by Mr NILES, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the motion to re-consider the vote by which the section in relation to the rights of married women was passed.

Mr. NILES. A section has been adopted by a vote of this Convention, which I believe to be of overruling importance, and to which I am earnestly opposed. It is a section, in its spirit, changing the relations of domestic life among us, and in its silent and ultimate influences, superseding the condition of society which we have inherited from our ancestors. It is now proposed to re-consider the vote by which that measure was adopted. Upon a question of such vital interest, I feel that it is my right to be heard, not for myself, but for the sake of every man, woman, and child, whom I in part represent. Though it will be impossible to condense what I desire to say upon the subject into the short space of fifteen minutes, I shall commence my remarks with the hope of being able to obtain the floor again before the close of the debate.

Before proceeding to the main question, I desire to state explicitly what I would not be considered as opposing when I oppose the section which has been adopted. In the first place, by opposing it I do not question the propriety of protecting, by legislative enactments, the property of married women from execution for the payment of their husbands debts. In such a measure I can see no essential wrong. Such protection would come in conflict with no law of our being. It would have little or no tendency to build up and perpetuate in families, separate interests and estates, to breed dissension or to affect the purity of the marriage relation. Neither would I be understood as opposing, with some slight alterations, our present statute in reference to the real estate of married women.

Again, I would not oppose a modification of our law of descents, so as to give to the widow, at least during her life time, a larger share of her deceased husband's estate. I think our laws in this particular are defective, and cannot doubt that the Legislature will, at an early day, provide the proper remedy. Some further provision for the benefit of the widow does not conflict with my idea of the unity which should exist in the marriage relation, but coincides with it fully.

I even go further than all this. I would not be understood as opposing, but as a legislator, would favor the idea of giving to married women, by suitable statutory provisions, some further power than they now possess of protecting property against a profligate or drunken husband. At present, whenever the case is of such a character as to justify a divorce, the wife can obtain protection by an appeal to a court of equity. I would not drive her to so desperate an alternative. She may be attached to her husband; she may cling to him for the sake of their common children, however abandoned his character, and in the hope that he may ultimately become reformed. Under such circumstances, I would give her the right to require the aid of some impartial tribunal, in protecting, not only her own, but his property, against his extravagance and folly. By some such means a lesser evil could be substituted for a greater. But such interference would still be an evil, and could only be justified in contrast with the greater evil which it would be intended to remedy.

Such measures as these would only be legislative expedients, designed to remedy defects in our present laws, without introducing any new principle at war with the whole spirit of the common law as it affects the domestic relations. They would introduce no new and dangerous element into the general condition of society. They would afford special remedies adapted to special evils. Such provisions of the law would have nothing in common with the spirit of this section.

The section under consideration provides that "the real and personal property of women, owned before marriage or afterwards acquired, by purchase or gift, (other than from the husband in fraud of his creditors,) devise or descent, shall be and remain secured to them under equitable conditions by law." When it was first reported by the committee it contained the words "to their separate use." These words have been stricken out, and it seems to have occurred to several gentlemen that their omission makes an essential difference in the character of the section. Now, sir, I consider it a difference in form, in words and in nothing else. The spirit of the section remains unchanged and its influence upon the domestic relations will be precisely the same as if the words had been retained as reported by the committee. In its present form it is a provision to guard and protect the wife against her husband, not in the isolated cases of great wrong calling loudly for such protection, but as the universal rule, and as if the husband were the worst enemy of the wife; as if such protection were always necessary.

The section provides that the property of married women is to be and remain secured to them—secured to them against whom? Against strangers only; or against the husband equally as against strangers? It means the latter, or it means nothing. The section, if carried out in good faith by the Legislature, must vest property in the wife, to her sole and separate use, and it must, as to property, divide every household against itself. The words "equitable conditions," ingeniously thrown in, have no essential force. They cannot be so construed as to annihilate the spirit of the section, and they can have no other effect than to quiet the apprehensions of some gentlemen who would be startled at a proposition to adopt at once, in all its length and breadth the civil law, to govern hereafter the relation of husband and wife. True, it is said that the husband would be made the agent of the wife to manage her property; but the agency must be subject to be revoked by her at any moment, else during the interval when she could not revoke the agency, he might dispose of all her personal property, and the whole effect of the section would be defeated. The mere words "equitable conditions" are utterly unmeaning. It cannot be presumed, if they were omitted, that the Legislature would enact laws upon this subject, in violation of equity and good conscience, unless compelled to do so by the spirit of the section, which as part of the Constitution they would be sworn to support. Your proposed section is to be a matter of strict law, having nothing to do with equity. I would rather vote for it without than with those words, because without them, it would be more concise and intelligible, while its meaning and operation would be the same.

It has been suggested that the friends of this measure will consent to strike out the word "purchase." I admit that that would be some slight improvement, but it would be very slight. It would look somewhat less as if you intended to make women partners in trade with their husbands or with other men. But the evils of the new system of things would hardly be mitigated.

I take it for granted that this section will not reach the condition of the poor. It has no application to them. The poor do not ask you, as the universal rule of society, to protect to the wife against her husband, the few plain dresses, the family cow, and the little keepsakes—the tributes of parental love on the bridal morning. To them, with their simple views, happiness counts more than wealth, and the bride is committed to the affections of the man with whose destiny hers is to be united. But with the rich it is not always so. The possession and the love of wealth, or rather its engrossing pursuit, does often dry up the fountains of the heart. Under the system which you propose, marriages among the wealthy will become, even more than now, the appointed means of perpetuating great estates. The marriage obligation will degenerate more and more into the idea of a civil contract, bringing together partners equal in point of fortune, to perpetuate a hot-bed aristocracy, instead of a sacred union between congenial spirits, becoming one in their affections, their hopes and destiny. Adhere to this section, and let it be faithfully carried by the Legislature into statutory provisions, and in all such cases, as indeed in every case whatever, the wife, in the control of her property, will be as independent of her husband as of any other man. Her separate authority will extend to the estate of millions, and will reach down to the smallest article of personal property—even, as was remarked by a countryman in the streets the other day, to the hog fattening for the butcher. She must have the power, in every case, to say to her husband, "That is mine; don't meddle with it, sir! I revoke the agency which the law has given you."

Then, sir, I repeat again, that this section does affect an entire and perfect separation of interests. It utterly and forever subverts the rule of the common law which merges in the husband the legal existence of the wife.

To such a policy I am uncompromisingly opposed, not merely as a constitutional provision, but as a legislative provision, in all its forms, now and at all times. You may as well argue to me that minor children should be separated from and made independent of their parents, because parents are sometimes inhuman, as that, by one universal and sweeping rule, the interests of the wife should be separated from those of the husband, because some husbands are unworthy of the name. In the present condition of the human race, all general laws, however wholesome, are liable to operate badly in individual cases. But do not dispense with wholesome general laws to meet those cases. You don't send all men to the penitentiary lest some men should commit crimes. Provide for the exceptions by proper laws, but do not disturb the good order of a thousand peaceful homes to punish one unworthy husband.

[Here the President's hammer fell, the time, under the rule, having expired; but in the afternoon Mr. Niles resumed, and concluded his remarks as follows:]

Mr. President: In the remarks which I submitted this morning, I endeavored to show the real character of the section now under consideration, and that, in reference to property, it affects an absolute divorce of husband and wife. I must not now recapitulate or dwell longer on that part of the subject. I oppose the measure, then, as antagonistic to the social and domestic habits and sympathies of our people; as, in its essential spirit and ultimate influences, a violation of that law of the Divine order announced in the Sacred Scriptures, "They twain shall be one flesh," and as tending towards a condition of things in which every wife shall have her separate mansion, her separate equipage and separate servants; and when, as in some of the cities of Continental Europe, every husband shall have his mistress, and every wife her lover. And, sir, seeing the measure in such a light, sooner than fasten it upon the country, I would breed a perpetual pestilence throughout the State. But let me not be understood as questioning the benevolence of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and those who have acted with him on this question. Our sympathies are naturally enlisted in favor of those who seem to be the weaker party, and whose voices are not heard directly in our legislative halls. Our laws in regard to widows and married women do, as we all admit, require amendment, and should this discussion lead to the proper legislation without adopting this radically subversive measure, the gentleman from Posey will be entitled to our thanks.

In our legislation we should be fully careful never to violate, however remotely, the laws of nature, or as I prefer to say, the laws of God. Such violation never goes unpunished. One generation may seem to escape, but succeeding generations must suffer.

By the common law of England, which has hitherto prevailed in this State, husband and wife are recognized as one person; she takes his name; she cannot sue him; he is bound to cherish and protect her; he is liable for her acts; his interest is her interest; his destiny is her destiny; he is the recognized head of the wife and head of the family. Under this law it must be admitted that woman has attained a higher influence and secured more profound respect, that the marriage obligations have been more faithfully fulfilled, and homes more united and happy than elsewhere, or ever before, in the history of the world. And I insist, sir, that this doctrine of the common law, in its essential spirit, accords with the teachings of Revelation—the Divine Law itself.

The Sacred Scriptures have often been referred to in this debate. While I admit their genuineness and authenticity, I do not claim that we can always infer from isolated passages their mere letter, true rules of legislation. If the Bible is what it claims to be, it is a book addressed to man's spiritual nature—to communicate to him spiritual truth, though all the precepts for the government of our moral conduct may be found upon its surface. While I would not engage in controversy on such a question, I must say, that to my mind no doctrine stands out more luminously on all its pages, than that which teaches the perfect oneness of the marriage relation, and that the husband is the head of the wife. But, sir, we need not go to Revelation to learn this law. It has been written on all human hearts since before the period of history, and it will remain written there forever. You may violate its spirit in your legislation, but you can never obliterate the law itself.

But it is said that under the common law, which recognizes fully this law of our being, the condition of the wife is akin to slavery; and I have been personally appealed to in this debate as, in my opposition to this measure, acting inconsistently with the doctrine for which I most earnestly contended, on another occasion, that all men are endowed by their Creator with equal rights. Sir, as I do not reason with that proposition which asserts American slavery to be a blessing, so I do not reason with the proposition which assumes that the condition of the wife, under the common law, is a state of slavery. I simply pronounce it absurd. The wife is equal with the husband, not because she occupies the same sphere and fulfills the same offices; not because her nature is identical with his, but because she is in all things different from him. In those very differences, reaching to their inner life, which are always recognized by the terms male and female, masculine and feminine, consists not only their equality but their fitness to become united; not by a cold, civil contract; not as partners in trade, but as one, indissolubly, in the most sacred, most endearing and enduring of all relations. We can see a resemblance of this union and of these differences, in the elements which make up this water. [Here Mr. N. held up a glass of water which was sitting on his desk.] Their qualities and offices are different and opposite, hence their union in the new and beautiful compound; a union no more complete than, according to the beneficent design of Providence, the relation of husband and wife was intended to be. Will you then introduce between them a principle of disunion and separation by your laws?

It seems to have become fashionable in this Convention, to refer to the ancient classics, and something valuable may have been gathered from those old storehouses of truth and error. There is one incident in the early history of the Roman Republic, of which I have been forcibly reminded during this debate. When a portion of the people had rebelled against the government and encamped beyond the Anio, and when, as we are told by Livy, no hope was left except in concord between the citizens, Menenius Agrippa was sent as an ambassador to persuade them back to their allegiance. Being admitted into their camp he related, as all will remember, in homely style, the fable of the dissensions which arose among the members of the human body against the stomach, because their sphere and offices were different. That speech was not without its influence upon an excited Roman populace, and it may well be pondered by us before we adopt this measure. Perchance there was more of truth in that fable than was seen by the orator himself. Similar illustrations occur in the Sacred Scriptures. It may be that it throws light upon a law of the Divine order extending throughout the Universe.

Gentlemen who undertake to argue that the essential principle of the common law, in relation to husband and wife, is unsound, might as well attempt to convince me that the human body should have been made without a head, or that my hand and eye are unequal, because their offices are different. True, in your Asylum for the blind, the unfortunate pupil is taught to see and to read imperfectly with the hand. But is that a reason why my hand should assume the office of the eye, when the eye is perfect? Woman can learn to be the head of the household; she could learn to mingle in the strife of politics, and in all the rugged scenes of outdoor life. But it needs no argument to prove that such is not her sphere. Woman loves to have an arm on which to lean. What is implied in the very name of widow, but the idea of one who has lost her protector and head? God has made woman a help-meet for man; to be the delight and ornament of home; to rule by love and not by law. There lies her happiness. God has made woman what she is. Would you, by legislation, transform her into a man? Above all things, would you introduce a principle of disunion between her and her husband? You might, with equal propriety, attempt to transform the ivy into the oak around which it twines, or to make the ivy independent of the oak.

There is a beautiful Indian allegory, of the grape-vine and the oak, intended to illustrate the relation of husband and wife. While the vine clings to and is supported by the oak, it is loaded with fruit—a delightful object in nature, but independent of the oak, it trails upon the ground, losing all its beauty. Sir, we may well learn a lesson from the children of nature.

By any principle of disunion between husband and wife, incorporated into the organization of society, you will do far more injury to woman than to man. Her life and wealth consist pre-eminently in the fullness of reciprocated affections. Her empire is home. Unless I have wrongly read the female character, mere outside splendor palls upon a woman's heart. It is to her like a palace of ice in the Polar regions, beautiful as the diamond on the surface, but cold and desolate within. I never think of the women who have occupied a conspicuous place upon the rough theatre of the world, from Semiramis and Cleopatra to Elizabeth and Maria Theresa, but as of beings out of their place and thrown ajar. Sir, I will confess it, I never think of Jenny Lind, spiritually beautiful as she is, but with a feeling akin to sorrow. And I would not name her in this public manner, except that it is her misfortune to have become an historic character. I should think of her with far more satisfaction, as fulfilling the conditions of her own happiness, had she married some noble Swedish youth and emigrated to our Western frontier, becoming the light and music of her neighborhood, and the centre of a delighted and happy home.

[Here again Mr. N.'s time expired, but by consent the rule was suspended, and he proceeded as follows:]

I thank the Convention for their courtesy, and will endeavor to be brief. The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) has read to us the opinions of Kent and Story in favor of the justice and propriety of this measure. While I cheerfully admit my profound respect for those eminent men, I must believe that they were no more competent to form a sound judgment upon this question, than if they had followed the plow instead of spending their lives amongst the misty volumes of the law. They might be very competent to determine rights as between partners, and at the same time overlook the great distinction between the relations of partners to each other, and of husband and wife.

This is a question to be determined in the light of history and of reason, not by judicial authority. But the opinions of many eminent jurists can be produced that the whole policy is wrong, and that even marriage settlements are the result of excessive refinement, and generally pernicious in their influence. Here I may remark that whenever a case does arise which, in the opinion of the parties or of their friends, requires something like the provisions of this section, the same object can be substantially secured by means of a marriage settlement. It is secured in that way without disturbing the general condition of society for the sake of the individual cases. But such marriage settlements are unsuited to the habits of our people, and are hardly less objectionable than the law of primogeniture.

If gentlemen go to history for evidence in favor of this policy, the concurring testimony of history is against it. Who would exchange the condition of women of the middling classes in Great Britain and the United States, for that of women in France and Italy? Where is the marriage tie held most sacred? But we are told that this principle has been adopted in several of the States of this Union. Though it may have been adopted, its consequences have not been developed. It has been longest in operation in Louisiana, and it is, to my mind, a sickening fact that a large portion of the litigation in that State is by wives against their husbands.

But, sir, as law-makers, we should look no less at the interests of the husband than of the wife. How many a man's destiny for good or for evil, is fixed by the influence of his wife.

In the present condition of the world, woman, like man, is imperfect. Let her destiny be bound up with his and she will guard him from the beginnings of vice with all the solicitude of a woman's nature; but let her fortune be independent of his, and in those capricious moments to which all are liable, she may abandon him to his fate.

Make this separation of interests, and many a hasty and ill-judged remark, which might otherwise be soon forgotten, will rankle in the husband's bosom, till sharp-toothed unkindness shall supervene and domestic peace be sacrificed forever.

The gentleman from Posey excited our just indignation at the conduct of two young men from the South, who married sisters in this State, and on their way home, sold the property of their wives, at public auction, in the town where he resides, and left for parts unknown with the proceeds. But, sir, what was the real wrong done to those confiding sisters? Are we not forgetting the reality while we chase the shadow? Suppose that those young men, instead of being scoundrels, had proved to be worthy of their wives, and that their little property had been destroyed by fire, or any other accident; who would have thought of it as a great calamity? Would not those sisters have still gone on their journey to their new home, full of joy and full of hope? The real injury was that their affections had been trampled upon; their love, which was their life, had been betrayed. Property has its value, but in this money-loving age, we are liable to give it undue pre-eminence. Let that example be a warning to parents and to daughters. A woman can never be too careful in ascertaining the character of the man who is to be her husband. But the wretch who would betray a woman for her fortune, would find means to obtain it from her, in spite of this section. And, indeed, this measure would afford no protection to those affectionate and confiding women who alone would need it.

The gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) tells us that we would do well to deal out to women a little more justice and a little less flattery. Now, sir, I admit that sensible women are sometimes compelled to listen to flattery, which is never an evidence of genuine respect; though I mark a wide difference between a manly sentiment of approbation, and that crawling sycophancy which, with serpent tongue, flatters only to beguile. But I do believe that there is no spot on earth, where women are treated with more real deference and respect, than in the United States. I once heard Miss Dix, of whom you all know something, and whose name has become a synonym of charity, say that she had traveled through nearly every State in the Union, and generally alone, and that she had never met with anything approaching to rudeness or imposition but in a single instance—that was at Little Rock in Arkansas. Some one carried her trunk upon his shoulder, from the house where she had stopped, a short distance, to the boat. He charged her fifty cents for the trouble. She inquired, as she handed him the money, if it was not a large price? when a rough looking man, standing by, interfered, and told the servant that he ought to be ashamed, to impose upon a lone woman, and she, for what he knew, a widow.

Sir, the age of chivalry has not, in the doleful language of Burke, departed forever. Let woman occupy her appropriate sphere and fulfil her appropriate offices, in the spirit of hope and love, and, in a far higher sense than that ridiculed by Cervantes, ten thousand swords shall yet leap from their scabbards to avenge even a look which threatens her with insult. Within that sphere she is clothed with omnipotence, for her armor is love—but without that sphere, her power and influence are gone. Within that sphere, she can almost say, with the Lady in Milton's Comus,—

That He, the Supreme Good, * * *
Would send a glistering guardian, if need were,
To keep her life and honor unassailed;

but without that sphere, she has no protection.

It is not because I love justice less, but because I love woman more, that I oppose this section. It strikes at the foundation of her power and happiness. Sir, I make no professions of what is called gallantry, but I do profess a profound respect and love for the female character, as who does not, that has known of woman, in all the relations of mother and sister—of neighbor and of friend—of wife and daughter—in sickness and in health.

One fabric of political authority may be destroyed in a day, and another may rise in a night; but changes in the elemental condition of society are affected slowly. Pass this section, and no shock will be produced upon the public mind; its influence will not be felt by the present generation, but its evils will be fearfully visited upon our children's children. Remove, if you will, all the old land-marks of government, but do not experiment with fire-sides and homes. The relation of husband and wife is of Divine appointment; it takes hold upon our spiritual nature, and reaches far into the future. Experiment with anything else, but do not tamper with a subject so vital and sacred. [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON said—

MR. PRESIDENT: The gentleman from LaPorte (Mr. Niles) has illustrated his views of the relations of husband and wife, by a simile drawn, as he informs us, from the rude literature of the aborigines. The source from whence he derived it struck me, sir, as one peculiarly appropriate to the end for which he pressed it into his service.

It is fitting and proper, that those who seek to perpetuate the injustice of our laws, in their relation to woman, should turn to the annals and the language of the barbarian, for precept and example.

If a poetic simile affords to the mind of the stern stoic of the woods, his justification for converting his wife into a beast of burden, I know of no reason why those of us who emulate his example, should not profit by his argument.

Far more appropriate is it, sir, that the opponents of this measure should seek to sustain their views by savage arguments and savage example, than that they should desecrate the pure and holy religion of Jesus, by seeking to justify injustice from disjointed texts and distorted meanings.

What, sir, shall we be told that a religion, every precept of which is purity itself, inculcates love, justice, and mercy to all others save her who was "last at the cross, and first at the sepulchre!"

A thousand years had rolled over the sepulchre of Christ, before the world ever heard of the common law of England, and yet we are told by the reverend delegate from Putnam, that that law had its foundation on the teachings of Him who summed up the whole duty of man in his social relations, in that matchless precept "do unto others as ye would have others do unto you."

Strange, passing strange is it, sir, that the fathers of the church should not have so read the oracles of their faith—that for a thousand years the rules of the common law should have lain dormant and unperceived in the writings of the apostles—that such a system, so inculcated by divine authority, should have escaped the observation of the thousands and tens of thousands of Christian martyrs whose blood cemented the foundations of the church, and should have first come into practical use among the feudal barons of a semi-barbarous isle, where the name of Christ was not heard for hundreds of years after his crucifixion.

Wonderful, indeed, would this all be, if it were only true. But, sir, it is not true; it has not and it cannot be proved. There is not the shadow of a shade, not the faintest semblance of an argument in the slightest degree tending to prove it, in aught that has been urged here, by the peculiar guardian of religion upon this floor, the reverend delegate from Putnam (Mr. Badger).

And here let me dismiss this branch of the subject with this remark, that whenever he, or any other man, can prove to my satisfaction that the existing provisions of the common law, robbing women of every legal right, are inculcated in the pages of the New Testament, he will have succeeded in convincing me at the same time of another fact, that they are not the edicts of a just, a righteous God. A just God could never have been the promulgator of unjust laws.

The whole argument which we have heard from the opponents of this section, from first to last, has been based upon that most despicable of all grounds, expediency. It has been the tyrant's plea in all ages. No one has dared to affirm on this floor, that our existing laws are not unjust. As well might they face the sun, and deny that he was shining in the heavens. They do not, they cannot, they dare not deny it.

Sir, we have had declamation upon declamation, but I deny that we have been met with argument. Take as an instance the assertion of the gentleman who preceeded me, (Mr. Niles,) that the tendency of the proposed amendment would be to build up an aristocracy. Did he show how or why such would be the tendency. Did he offer a reason or an argument for his position? Nothing of the kind—nothing but his mere broad assertion. I am free to confess that I am totally at a loss to guess by what process of reasoning the gentleman arrived at such a conclusion.

So it has been, sir, with the ten thousand other evils which the fertile imaginations of gentlemen have conjured up, as likely to follow the change proposed; we have assertion, broad vehement assertion and nothing more.

And here let me remark that these assumptions of anticipated evils are themselves built upon an assumption that is false in itself—that has been again and again proved to be false; and of which no one has attempted to prove the truth. Time after time, and day after day, gentlemen set out in their speeches with the assumption that the section under consideration provides for a separate property in the wife, under her uncontrolled authority. Again and again, has it been proved that such is not the meaning or effect of the section as it now stands, and yet the very next gentleman who rises in opposition to the measure, without an attempt to prove it, makes the same assumption; sets up the same man of straw, that he may have the pleasure of knocking it down again.

The sections reported by the committee did, it is true, provide for a separate and distinct property in the woman, but they are no longer before the Convention, and I assert unhesitatingly that the present section, neither directly or indirectly, contains any such provision, nor can the ingenuity of the most subtle lawyer, torture from it any such meaning.

It simply provides that the property of the wife "shall be secured to her."

Now, sir, let me ask the legal gentlemen who oppose this measure, if the real estate of the wife is not "secured to her" under the common law as it exists. The husband cannot sell the fee, and at his death it reverts to her or her heirs. But will any lawyer contend that because it is thus secured to her, that she has a "separate property" in her real estate.

Sir, I do hope that we shall not hear this assumption of the meaning of the section again made, without at least some faint attempt to sustain it by argument.

I ask the Convention now calmly to review all the objections which have been urged against the adoption of this reform, and say whether every one of them are not based upon the assertion that this section provides for a separate property in the wife. If so, and if it is not true that the section has any such meaning, I ask what becomes of all the declamation, loud, long, and furious, with which it has been assailed.

The gentleman from Laporte told us a touching story this morning of Miss Dix, the celebrated philanthropist, who stated that she had traveled through every State of the confederacy and had never been insulted but once during the whole period of her wanderings. I do not doubt its truth. It is characteristic of our countrymen. It is the noblest trait in their character, and one sufficient in itself to atone for a multitude of faults.

But, sir, I regret to say that it is not without exceptions.

What shall I say, sir, of the reverend Delegate from Putnam, (Mr. Badger,) who this morning so wantonly and grossly insulted every one of our countrywomen who have dared to hope for justice at our hands?

Gentlemen cannot have forgotten the low-bred vulgarity with which he assailed them, in language that would be inexcusable in a gentleman anywhere, and pardonable in a blackguard only in the drunken orgies of a bar-room. [Applause.]

But the reverend Delegate's proclivity for vulgar abuse was not satisfied with this wholesale insult to the women of our land, and he must needs take a tilt at my friend from Posey (Mr. Owen).

And here let me remark upon it as something strange that a gentleman whose every act and word has ever been characterized by the most extreme courtesy—who never, even in jest, indulged in language calculated in the remotest degree to wound the feelings of others—should have been more often perhaps than any other gentleman on this floor the subject of personal attack.

It may be, it doubtless is, gratifying to some men to hear their political opponents abused; but most men like to have it done with some little regard to decency, and I believe I do this Convention no more than justice when I say that I do not believe there was a gentleman on this floor who listened this morning to the assault made by the Delegate from Putnam (Mr. Badger) upon the gentleman from Posey and his wife, who did not, in his heart of hearts, spurn and despise the assailant.

They might some of them have secretly rejoiced to hear the gentleman himself abused, but when his wife's name was dragged in for no other purpose but to add to the bitterness of the insult, disgust and contempt were written in legible characters upon every countenance.

Sir, I have no words to express the deep, utter, and unspeakable loathing and contempt I have for such a man—who soils the very carpet, foul as it is, upon which he treads.

["Cries of "order," "order," "good," "good," "consent," "go on.""]

If gentlemen don't wish personalities let them check them in the outset. If they don't want their dogs hurt, let them keep them up.

We have had also, from the same source, an attack upon the social system. Does the Delegate who traveled out of his way to make that attack know where we have the first foundation of it? Has he ever read of a society of men some eighteen hundred years ago, of whom it is written that all that believed were together, and had all things in common, and sold their possessions and goods and parted as every man had need? If so, where did he find it? Was it not among the disciples of Christ themselves? That was the origin of socialism, if socialism consists in a community of goods. The Delegate from Putnam belongs to a sect—I believe however they disclaim that name—a religious society which claim to themselves the exclusive name of Christians, and profess to have revived the early practices of Christianity, and to have eschewed all modern innovations, and to teach the only true Christianity of the present day. Why does he not follow out then the example of the first disciples of Christ in the matter I have referred to, having all things in common. But here let me be understood as saying that I do not favor socialism. I do not believe in the doctrine. I am no advocate for it. I merely quoted the texts to show that possibly socialism was not such a monster after all. Again, we are told that this is a matter for the Legislature to determine—that that body may and should change the law of descent. Is it not singular, sir, that men cannot or will not perceive that the laws of descent and this question are totally different things. No change in the law of descent can reach the evils we are seeking to remedy. The law of descent can only say what portion of a husband's property a wife shall have. The present section simply declares that she shall have her own property, and leaves the question of descent to the law.

The present section, sir, does not secure to woman, under any circumstance, the power to control her own property, unless the Legislature choose to give it to her. It simply secures to her her property ultimately. It provides that the law shall not wrest it from her by the act of marriage, but that it shall revert back to her upon the death of her husband. This is all the section proposes.

I am willing, as a matter of compromise, that the word "purchase" should be stricken out of the section. The effect of it will be that the wife will have the right to purchase property, with the concurrence of her husband, and not otherwise.

Mr. BADGER. It seems, sir, that I am to be made the subject of personal attack by all the gentlemen who are advocates of this measure. And in relation to the effusion of the gentleman who has taken his seat, (Mr. Gibson,) I would remark to this honorable body that having been blessed with a kind father, he taught me when young this lesson: "that from the character of those with whom I associated, my own would be estimated;" and I feel disposed to act on this occasion, not only in reference to that rule, but also to obey a very beautiful text which says: "Cast not your pearls before swine." [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRACKEN said:

It may be considered presumptuous in one of my age—young in political experience—excitable and diffident as I am—to address this intelligent body on a subject of so great importance as this is acknowledged to be. But I hope I shall be pardoned, if I trespass for a few moments upon the time of this honorable body.

I was one of those who voted in the affirmative on the final passage of this section. I then considered it somewhat objectionable; and, sir, on more mature consideration, I am fully convinced that the section, as it has passed this body—honest, intellectual, and learned as its members may be—is fraught with a sirocco breath to the homes of the good people of this Commonwealth. Therefore, I shall go for the re-consideration of the section, and I hope that the motion for its re-consideration may prevail, so that the section may be modified.

My desire, from the time that the subject of woman's rights was first broached in this body, was, to be a silent voter thereon; nor should I at this time depart from that rule, if I did not believe that the vote I gave was wrong—radically wrong in principle.

This being the case, I believe it is due to a constituency that I am proud to represent—to myself as an humble member of this body—to state a few out of the many reasons that I have for wishing a re-consideration of the entire subject. Some gentleman may and no doubt will taunt me with a want of consistency in reference to this matter. If it will satisfy them, I will acknowledge it. But I wish to say, in all candor, that I came into this body determined, for one, to do what my conscientious convictions of duty might prompt me to do—to seek diligently for the truth, and to do right, though the heavens be clothed in darkness. For I would rather go back, find what is right, and do it, than to be consistent at the expense of the best interests of those whom I represent. Self I love, it is true, but I love my native State much better. If this, my apology, be not sufficient, come, you who have not had a new idea for the last quarter of a century—come, you who never change, though wise men do—and cast the first stone. I'll be a willing sacrifice.

My first objection to the section is based upon the fact that it constitutes, and is intended as a radical departure from the time-honored principles of the common law. Now, sir, for one, I revere age; and our institutions that have become aged, deserve respectful consideration. The common law of England has stood the test of a thousand years, and it still retains its youth and vigor—it still commands the respectful consideration of the learned and the good. Wherever the Anglo-Saxon race is found, it has always been considered, as without doubt it has been, the bulwark of the rights of the citizen, whether subject or sovereign. It deserves something better than a taunt. It is well to recollect that all change is not improvement. From the concurrent testimony of gentlemen learned in the law, it has been made to appear that the rights of females are governed by two diverse laws, acting in different portions of the civilized world. First, the common law governs wherever the Anglo-Saxon commands; and secondly, the civil law governs Continental Europe and her colonies. Now it has been assumed in this debate that the effect of the common law is to degrade the female—to lower her in the scale of being—to make her as the goods and chattels of her lord—worse than the hired servant, the slave of her husband—not fit to be the companion of man, but the instrument of his convenience or pleasure. Now, the panacea for all these dire ills, in gentlemen's opinions, is the civil law remedy. They cry out in their ecstasy: "Eureka"—I've found it out. There is the great, good, glorious remedy that cures all social ills in relation to the female. It will infallibly make all husbands thrifty, good, loving, lovable, fine looking, intellectual, &c., though those husbands have the tempers of cynics, and the forms of hunchbacks, and the intellectual qualities of driveling simpletons, acknowledging and recognizing the inalienable right to curtain lectures ad libitum.

The advocates of the civil law remedy put me in mind of the charlatan praising some favorite nostrum: "The sovereignest thing on aith," says he.

Well, fortunately for us, as a Convention, both these law remedies have been administered to the body politic for centuries. We propose at this time to inquire into the social health of nations under this diverse treatment.

First, we will look at the condition of the females of the Anglo-Saxon race. What is the social position they occupy? They are everywhere revered, respected, loved—as mothers, sisters, wives; the boast of fathers, the pride of brothers, the delight of husbands. As such, they are our chief joy—our household deities. Conjugal faith, purity, and truth is loved and practiced by all. This, and this only, is the effect of the common law wherever the Anglo-Saxon lives. I am too fast—there is an exception—that exception is the nobility of proud Albion. I have been curious to ascertain the difficulty with them as a class. I find that centuries since, to keep up the wealth of their houses, and the purity of their blood, they threw away the common law remedy, and practiced on civil law principles, reducing matrimony to a mere civil contract. The result is what was to be expected. This conjugal infidelity is the eyesore of the nation, the source of perpetual discord, and the unmistakable cause of the extinction of families. Let us leave the home of the common law, and take a view of Continental Europe; and first at La Belle France. France is the heart of Continental Europe; and Paris is the heart of France. When she throbs, all Europe quakes. What is the condition of women there—in Paris—the home of the brave, the intellectual, and the polished Frenchman—the city that essays to give laws governing etiquette throughout the civilized world? What is the condition of woman in Paris, and in rural France?

We find her in all the avocations of life, from carrying on the most extensive commercial and manufacturing establishments down to mere street scavengers. Having no word for home in their language, there are no homes in Paris. In our acceptation of the word, marriage is a matter of taste or convenience. The parties have often no knowledge of each other until they meet at the altar. It is merely a civil law contract. The result is conjugal infidelity. This is the rule and not the exception. True, they have no jealousies there. What jealousies can men feel where there is promiscuous intercourse? Amiable result, truly. I speak ironically. What of Vienna, the Capital of Austria, and the home of the Hapsburgs? There were fifteen hundred more illegitimate births than legitimate, in the year 1849, as shown by her own police reports. Glorious result of the civil law remedy! But it may be remarked in reply that the countries that I have instanced are Roman Catholic. True; but look at Sweden, Denmark, and Protestant Germany, and face the light and say if their females, as a class, are not the merest drudges imaginable. Now, sir, Continental Europe has adopted the civil law, and has administered it with assiduity for hundreds of years. Yet their females are, in point of social privileges, a thousand per cent. below their sisters of the Anglo-Saxon race. Of all the pathies in medicine, this has been the most unfortunate in its application. It has not prevented, and does not at this late hour prevent, woman from being yoked with the ass to the plow; while the sturdy husband holds the handles on fair Italia's plains.

Doctors of the law, do n't you think you are mistaken either in theory or practice? Or it may be that gentlemen are like Gil Blas' Preceptor, or Sangrado. Now this Doctor was a renowned professor of the healing art, and had written a book setting forth the fact that bleeding a patient twice a day to sixteen ounces, and keeping him filled to the throttle with hot water was an infallible remedy in all diseases. So after Gil Blas had graduated and entered into partnership with his preceptor in the practice, he was not long in making the discovery that their patients all died, while the patients of other physicians generally got well; and as a consequence, business was leaving them, and starvation looking in at the door. One day after his usual round of vexation he suggested to his preceptor the possibility that the treatment was an error, and that he was accountable for the misfortune of losing their patients. Mark the coolness of the answer: "I know it," says he, "but I have written a book and must stick to it." I fear that we have political Sangrados still living.

Now gentlemen viewing the results of the application of the principles of common and civil law on a stage truly grand, no less than Continental Europe and her colonies on one side, and Great Britain and her colonies, and the United States on the other, tested for the last thousand years. Tell us, yes, tell us, where woman holds the highest social condition, and the triumph of the common law is complete.

This is a question eminently practical in its effects; as such I wish fairly to meet it. It must and will have its influence on man from the cradle to the tomb. Now what I object to in this section is that it enables the wife to enter into all the strifes attendant upon the varied pursuits of life, upon an equality with and against her husband. It will require the separate registration of her property, and the passing of laws affording all the legal remedies now known to the law. For if she has separate personal property, she of necessity must have the right to sue the husband, to make money out of his property, by distress and sale; she must have the benefit of writs of trespass and traverse, so that she may be able to obtain damages of her husband for sleeping in her bed, or for sitting in her parlor. And the same must be true of the husband; he must have the same right and the same privileges. Husband and wife must be competent witnesses for and against each other in courts of law. A pretty state of society, truly.

I want the word "purchase" stricken out of the section, so that it may read "women shall have and hold to their sole use and benefit, all the real estate that they may own at the time of marriage, or that may come to them during coverture by gift, devise, or descent." That is just as far as I am willing to go with my own consent. You may force me, but for that I am not accountable.

I am firmly of opinion, that if we go further than this the word "home"—that word which sends a thrill through the Anglo-Saxon wherever he may be, will become obsolete. If woman will force herself into all the rough pursuits of life to contend with man, she may find, when too late, that she has gained a legal position at the expense of her social position. The result will be here, as in Continental Europe, merely civil equality, and social degradation. May God forfend my loved country-women from such a result.

I too could flatter, for flattery it would be by calling them angels. They are in this world subject to its vanities, its frailties, and its foibles. Yet in the positions of mother, sister, daughter, wife, and friend, the cheerer of our home, our solace in affliction, we, the rougher part of creation, forget their earthly origin, and think them all divine. My country-women, recollect that your first flatterer said you should be wise; your second says you shall be legally great. Beware, lest similar evils fill your cup of sorrow, and fail not to avoid the error.

Mr. BLYTHE. In contrast with much of what has been said to-day, I wish to give the simple history of this section as it has been passed by the Convention.

The gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) remarked that this section, as passed, is in substance, the same thing with the section as originally reported by the chairman of the committee on rights and privileges. To that section, Mr. President, as I stated some few days since in some few remarks upon the subject, I was opposed, for the reasons which, during the first debate on this question, were given by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman). After listening to the arguments adduced on both sides of the question, it occurred to me that a section could be drafted which would unite the opinions and meet the wishes of all; and in conversation with the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) I adopted the form which I first introduced as an amendment to the original section. Without consultation with the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) I offered that amendment, which, together with the original section, was a few days since laid upon the table, on the motion of the gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom).

This section, as it has been passed by the Convention, is, in effect, precisely the same thing with the section which I first introduced, and which was laid upon the table, as I have stated. That amendment, as I before remarked, the gentleman from Posey knew nothing of, until I offered it; and it was drafted with the express view of freeing ourselves as far as possible from the difficulties which I, in common with many other gentlemen, apprehended would arise out of the section as originally reported; and yet we are now told that the two sections are in substance the same.

What is the section as it has passed?

"That real and personal property of women, whether owned before marriage, or afterwards acquired by purchase or gift, (except from the husband in fraud of his creditors,) devise, or descent, shall be and remain secured to them under equitable conditions by law."

That is the section as it has been passed; now what is the section originally reported by the committee?

"Women hereafter married in this State shall have the right to acquire and possess property to their sole use and disposal, and laws shall be passed, securing to them under equitable conditions all property, real and personal, whether owned by them before marriage, or acquired afterwards, by purchase, gift, devise, descent, or in any other way, and also providing for the registration of the wife's separate property."

Are these two sections the same? If they are, surely I cannot understand plain English. Here in the original section as reported, we have the power conferred on married women to acquire property in modes now unknown to the law. To much of the language of that section no technical signification is attached; and our courts in deciding upon it, would be governed by the plain every-day signification of the words used. But a labored effort is made to confound these two sections together. Gentlemen affect to treat them as one in spirit and design. Suspicion and fear have been awakened; and against every proposition which is made, the object of which is to further this great reform, all our antipathies against the doctrines of the socialist are called up to do battle. Eloquently have our passions and our prejudices been appealed to; denunciation and the cry of infidelity have been awakened. These, Mr. President, are the weapons to which men resort when they find themselves without those more suitable to the contest. Sir, declamation, however much it may please us, or however beautiful it may be, or denunciation however terrible—is not argument. I know of nothing, the indulgence of which is easier than declamation and denunciation; but cold, hard, stern, logical argument is another and a much more difficult thing.

The gentleman from Laporte, learned as he is and eloquent as we all know him to be—has committed the radical error in his argument of assuming as true, that which the friends of this reform have utterly denied from the beginning, to have the slightest semblance of truth about it, and which should have been proved, not assumed, and upon that assumption basing his argument. How is it? Says the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Clarke,) and the reverend gentleman from Putnam, (Mr. Badger,) the effect of this section is to sever forever the interests of husband and wife—introduce discord where God and nature designed there should be harmony—sunder the strong bonds of affection—in a word, make twain of those whom God and God's word have declared to be one flesh. And upon this assumption is based the whole of their argument.

Now I call upon these gentlemen, when they seek to defeat the ingrafting upon the Constitution, of this great, fundamental principle of right, to show how and in what way that separation of interest and introduction of discord is to be brought about, to be produced by the language we have used in this section. I fearlessly assert that the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) with all his eloquence, his legal learning, and his skill as a debater, will find himself incompetent to the task.

Then if the very foundation upon which the argument of these gentlemen is based is of this worthless material, what is the value of the superstructure built upon it? What becomes of their argument? It falls, sir, to the ground.

Now, Mr. President, let us look at this section and see what its legal effect is. The wife shall have the right to acquire property by purchase, gift, devise, and descent; in all of which modes she may now acquire property. Now, to each of these words there is attached a definite, specific, legal meaning, and no man can mistake it. Through every one of these modes enumerated in this section, married women today, in the State of Indiana, may acquire property. Now, the section, as originally reported, goes much farther than this. It declares her right to acquire property, not only in the enumerated modes, but in any other way or manner in which persons, who do not labor under the disabilities peculiar to married women, may acquire it; and when acquired, it is to be secured to her sole use. As I have already said, there is, to many of the words used in that section, attached no definite legal signification, and the courts would give them a liberal construction. It is true that, under such a law, the wife might buy, and sell, and claim the profits of her labor and traffic as secured to her own use and control. But how is it under the section passed by the Convention? Is any new mode pointed out? Do we throw wide open the doors of public trade, and bid her enter! No such thing. We start out with the avowed purpose only of securing to married women their property. Surely this purpose is easily enough comprehended. But we say that this property, no matter in which one of the modes now known by the law—and to all of which it is admitted she may lawfully and without danger acquire it—shall be secured. And this is all. But much stress is laid on the word "purchase." Strike it out, if you please; I care very little about it, although I insist that it is properly in the section. Whenever a married woman acquires property by gift or devise, she is said to take it by purchase. Now show me—for the burden of proof is upon you—how its use enlarges her right. Common sense, and the courts, in adjudicating questions arising under this section, say that the word is used with reference to those modes in which a married woman may now acquire property by purchase, and was designed to secure the property so acquired.

But gentlemen say that this is an experiment, and that there is danger of corrupting the fountains of domestic purity and happiness, and overturning the most cherished of our social institutions, by the introduction of a new principle. But have they read the legal history of the country in relation to this principle? Do they know that other States have led the way in the recognition of this right? Are they aware that they are now gravely predicting results which the experience of others has shown are not likely to follow from the adoption of this doctrine? Do they know that Pennsylvania, Florida, Arkansas, Wisconsin, New York, Maine, and perhaps other States, have recognized the right of married women to be secure in their property?

And yet gentlemen speak of this as an untried experiment. Sir, in many of the States which I have named, the right of the wife is declared in terms far stronger than any used in this section. Not only is her right to acquire property, in the several modes here pointed out, declared, but also her right to receive and enjoy, as though she were sole, the rents and profits of her estate; and the husband has no power to interfere. This is going far, very far, beyond anything proposed by the friends of this measure. And yet, sir, we hear nothing from those States, which have adopted this enlarged and liberal policy, of those consequences which some gentlemen here seem to fear so much. We hear no alarm of danger to their social institutions. Because justice, simple justice, is done to woman in those States, we do not find that she fills her appropriate sphere with less grace, less modesty, less affection. No, sir; not until you reverse the great laws of moral order, can misfortune follow as a natural consequence, a strict compliance with the rule of right, and a rigid obedience to the requirements of justice.

Well, sir, this alarm is raised not only in this Hall, but it has been sounded from more than one pulpit in this city. The strange doctrine has been promulgated, that, if we secure to woman that which belongs to them—belongs to them by every principle upon which we claim to be secured in our own property—we violate the law of God. Strange doctrine this! It bears its refutation upon its face. Mr. President, I will only say for myself that, if I believed that the Bible—a book which, from my earliest infancy, I have been taught, by those who now are saints in Heaven, to reverence and to cherish as I would my own life—if I could believe that that book forbid the enactment of a law like this, either I would submit myself with a blind, unmanly credulity to its teachings, and the teachings of its commissioned interpreters, or else, in the exercise of my reason and judgment as a man, reject it as a fable, and its every exposition as a fraud. But, sir, I know that it teaches no such monstrous absurdity. I know that its precepts, which have elevated woman from the life of a menial to the fulfilment of her destiny, point us to the discharge of this duty. Therefore it is that I have taken the position on this question which I now occupy.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe says, that he will go so far as any one to secure the property of the wife against the debts of the husband, but he will go no further. Yes, sir, you say it is right, and it is just to secure and protect the property of the wife against the debts of the husband, although these debts may have been incurred through necessity or under the pressure of misfortune, and not by any crime. You will say to the sheriff when he comes to seize upon the property of the wife whose husband may have been unfortunate, Stand back, this property you may not touch. And yet you will not say to the scoundrel who has sought her alliance with the sole object of obtaining her money the same thing! [Applause.] You should protect her against sheriffs, and constables, but against the cold blooded and heartless fortune seeker, who may seek her hand only because it can bestow upon him wealth, you will afford her no protection. You will protect her against the misfortunes of the husband, but not against his crimes. You will say to the honest creditor, this man has been unfortunate, but it is not right that his wife's property should pay his just debts, so you shall not touch it. But you will fold your arms, and stand calmly by, while the friends of the card table madden him with the wine cup, and then strip him of the last remnant of his wife's fortune. You are willing that this subject should be referred to your Legislature, and that statutes shall be passed better to secure the wife in her property. Yes, and in this very concession, the principle for which we contend triumphs. I thank you for it, and turn it against you. Every weapon which you take in your hands, shivers to the hilt with the first blow you give.

Here Mr. BLYTHE's time having expired,

Mr. FOSTER moved that the Convention give the gentleman from Vanderburgh liberty to continue his remarks.

It was so ordered, and

Mr. BLYTHE said: Mr. President—I voted to suspend the rule limiting the time of speaking this morning so far as it applied to the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) not because I thought it was just exactly right, but because I happened to be the author of this section. And I knew very well, that if I voted against the suspension of the rules I should subject myself to the charge, that I was unwilling that the discussion should be continued by that gentleman. I thank the Convention then for the courtesy they have extended to me, but beg leave to decline it.

MR. BARBOUR. I have risen, Mr. President, to present my views on this important question as plainly as I can. While the gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Blythe) declaimed so eloquently against declamation, I could not forbear thinking he had caught some of the vein himself, though his argument in the main was quite logical. I shall endeavor then to avoid if possible any thing like declamation.

Lest I should be misunderstood or misapprehended on this absorbing question, I will here remark that I will go as far as any gentleman on this floor to elevate the condition of both sexes. And most especially do I desire to see the ladies clothed with every grace and beauty which renders them ornaments of society. But while I entertain these views, I must be permitted to oppose the section now under consideration. It requires no small degree of bravery with so fair an audience around me, to stand up here and oppose what some of our fair auditors desire should become a law. But believing that in doing so, I am promoting their interest, as well as the interest of mankind, I shall be under the necessity of giving my voice against it.

It is asserted, sir, that the division of property between man and wife is not calculated to produce discord between man and wife. And we are called on to produce arguments to show that it will have that effect. What is it that moves the world—that excites the activity, the industry, the vigilance of man? Is it not our vast scramble for wealth. Will not the wife when she comes to have a separate interest in property, personal property, that she can identify as her own—will she not feel all that attachment for property which man is accustomed to feel. If that property in her imagination, or in fact, was handled a little more roughly than the husband treated his own, would it not tend to produce a little excitement in her mind, and call forth some ill-natured remark? Would it not be more likely to have this effect than if the property had all belonged to the husband? I think there can be no question about it. The world have been taught some by experience, and some by the current news of the day, that under the present happy system of government, there are occasionally family laws, domestic dissensions, certain lectures, and some unhappy marriages. Would not these domestic dissensions, and certain lectures, be greatly multiplied and aggravated by introducing this new element of discord into the family circle? Have not remarks been made during these little altercations that have planted a thorn in the bosom of one or the other, which after kindness has not always been able to extract! Let us remove then, so far as we are able, every cause for dissension.

The gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Blythe) says, he desires to protect the property of the wife from a spendthrift husband, who would spend his property at the brothel or gambling house. I would also protect her property, that she had brought her husband, but in a different way. I would make home a paradise to him. I would make the domestic fireside the altar around which all his hopes and affections cluster. The gambling house and the brothel will have no charms for him. Their leisure moments would be those of comfort and felicity, passed in the society of each other. Would this not be the case? How is it in France, where man and wife have a separate property? There, sir, married women are found at the gambling tables, betting their separate property. Why is this? It is because home is not what it should be. It is because woman has abandoned the sphere in which nature has designed her to move. It is because the heart, the home of the affections, has been neglected. Let us keep, then, this apple of discord away from the fireside. There are already sufficient causes of trouble, without seeking to add others.

The gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson) says, he is proud of his country, because of their deportment and delicacy towards the female sex. I thank him for the compliment, and in return would ask: Who moulded the character of our countrymen?—Who taught them this delicate appreciation of the female sex?—Who, but woman?—Who, but a loving and love-inspired mother? It is in infancy that the germ of virtue and self-respect is planted. "Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

How is it in France, where the civil law prevails—where man and wife hold separate property? An examination of their history and condition of society, will prove that both sexes in that country do not occupy the same elevated position in morals that we do. Almost every evil that society is heir to has preyed upon that people; while in the United States, the condition of society is that of progress and enlightenment. Morals are in their highest state of purity: our governments are firm based on the virtues and affections of the people. Turn we now to France. Wars, civil wars, desolation, carnage, and bloodshed, have been the bitter fruits of their institutions. Why is this? It is because of the deplorable state of morals. Had the French people been virtuous, their government would have been kept firm and secure. A government which has for its basis a virtuous people, has nothing to dread; and where, I would ask, is virtue inculcated in all its strength and purity? Where, but around the fireside, in that place called home? It is in this sanctuary our first impressions are imbibed. It is here that the affection of the fond mother pours into the soul of her child, love, generosity, and virtue. Oh, then, poison not this fountain with dollars and cents. Clog not this stream of affection with mercenary drugs.

What has produced the great men of this country and of England? Kind and affectionate mothers, who have trained up their sons in the practice of virtue.

It is not a union founded on pecuniary interest—where the wife daily spends her leisure moments in casting up the debtor and credit accounts of her property—that gives use to the oft-repeated instructions and virtuous training by a mother to her children? Oh, no! When her labors are confined to her proper sphere, then do we find that the youth of the land grow up to mature age, pure in heart, intelligent, industrious, and wise. And, sir, a statement has been made that a woman feels degraded when thus the mentor of the family circle asks her husband for means to distribute—say in charity. Now, sir, I deny utterly this assertion. I contend that, in our Union, based upon affection and virtue, the husband esteems it a privilege to assist her in the glorious work of relieving the wants of men, and administering charity to the deserving and suffering poor. It is a pleasure for her to call forth his virtuous feelings; and a virtuous feeling prompts him always to anticipate her wishes. There is not the slightest feeling of dependence on her part, but a feeling of mutual equality and confidence. Permit me here to bring in the testimony of a woman, which, though not perhaps strictly in point, will serve to illustrate the doctrine for which I am contending. It is the production of Mrs. Hall, an English lady: “The frequent observation of foreigners is, that in England we have few celebrated women. Perhaps they mean we have few who are ‘notorious,’ but let us admit that in either case they are right; and may we not express our belief in its being better for woman, and for the community, that such is the case. Celebrity rarely adds to the happiness of woman, and almost as rarely increases her usefulness. The time and attention required to attain celebrity, must, except under very peculiar circumstances, interfere with the discharge of those feminine duties, on which the well-doing of society depends, and which shall so pour a halo around our English homes. Within these homes our heroes, statesmen, philosophers, men of letters, and men of genius, receive their first impressions, and their impetus to a faithful discharge of their after callings as Christian subjects of the State.”

There are few of such men who do not trace back their resolution—their patriotism—their wisdom—their learning—the nourishment of all their highest aspirations to a more hopeful, loving-hearted, and faith-inspired mother. One who believed in a son's destiny to be great. It may be impelled by such belief, rather by instinct than reason; who cherished (we can find no better word) the hero feeling of devotion to what was right, though it might have been all worldly; and whose deep heart welled up perpetual love and patience toward the over-boiling faults, and frequent stumblings of a hot youth which he felt would mellow into a fruitful manhood.

The strength and glory of England are in the keeping of the wives and mothers of its men. And when we are questioned touching our celebrated women, we may, in general terms, refer to those who have watched over, moulded, and inspired our celebrated men.

Happy is the country when the laws of God and nature are held in reverence. Here allow me to remark that if the Scriptures teach any one thing more strongly than another, it is that in relation to marriage—is that they twain shall be one flesh—the husband shall be the head of the family—shall have the right to control and direct the action of his wife in an appropriate manner. But again—“Where each sex fulfils the peculiarities, and renders its sphere a sanctuary! and every such harmony is blessed by the Almighty—for which other nations writhe in anarchy and poverty, our own spread with her armies to view all who seek protection or need repose.”

I concur in every sentiment here expressed. And here a direct allusion is made to the want of virtue and stability of character in the French people. And why is this? Why is it that the males and females of our country are so immeasurably elevated in point of morality and intelligence above the French people? It is, sir, because of an affectionate and virtuous household—and of domestic firesides where the lessons of truth and wisdom are imparted, fostered, and matured in the youth of the nation by wise and virtuous matrons.

Sir, it is not for a moment to be supposed that the institutions which have been in existence during the whole period of our lives are to be changed in a day. Great and intellectual minds may cause the change in laws, but the habits and customs of a people cannot be so readily changed, and systems under which generations have been reared, cannot be so easily altered. The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) very well knows that public sentiment cannot be suddenly changed, even if the efforts of men of extraordinary talents and influence are brought to bear upon that sentiment. It is out of the order of things that the action of society can so easily fluctuate. The proposition here presented is but an experiment; it is a novel, and, in a great degree, an untried measure.

Gentlemen say that a provision of this kind has been adopted in other States; that may be true, but do gentlemen suppose that the effects of such a provision could thus suddenly be perceived, should we adopt the section in question? Its baleful effects might not be felt or perceived in this day or generation. It would only be when a series of ages had passed away, to hear the historian come to compare the morals of to-day, with that of some remote period, that he would be able to detect when the serpent entered the garden of Eden. In France, they may truly be said to have some experience. Is there anything in that experience which we desire or love? Would we change our virtues and claims in institutions for others? I trust not. For one, then, I prefer that it be left to the action of the people through the Legislature.

Mr. NEWMAN. I may vote to re-consider this subject, but by so doing I do not wish it to be inferred here, or elsewhere, that I am opposed to the principle involved in this section. It may be so modified as that it will meet with my hearty support, or I may vote for it as it stands; but at all events, I am in favor of the spirit of the provision. Gentlemen may vote, if they please, against it, but it is in accordance with the spirit of the age, and better provisions will yet be made for the protection of the more helpless portion of mankind, the female portion, than can be made by this body or have been made by the Legislature of this State. I have no fears but that if this subject is left to the Legislature, that appropriate provisions will be made in reference to it, and I am not sure, by any means, but that is the appropriate place for it.

We all know, sir, that in many instances injustice is done to individuals, and in this case the injustice which it is supposed will result to women from the rejection of this section, can be remedied by a provision which will not give rise to the great evils which gentlemen seem to anticipate. We are very apt to foresee evils that never come to pass, that never happen, as the consequence of the act that is done. No great measure of reform can be advanced without evils being predicted to result from its adoption. This has been the case in all past time, and will continue to be the case in the future, I have no doubt, so long as free discussion is allowed. I think gentlemen anticipate too many evils to arise from the adoption of this provision, and give too much dignity to the possession of a little property that may be held either by the husband or wife.

With regard to this subject, Mr. President, I think there is a higher law, that over-rides all considerations of property. Property is but as dust in the balance compared to the attachment that should exist between the sexes, no matter in whom the right to property rests, or who has the control of it. I am sorry to hear any gentleman in this enlightened age, prefers to adhere to the doctrine that the husband has the right to control the actions of the wife, (if they mean any other control than that arising from the influence of his opinions,) particularly when we take into consideration the strong ties of mutual confidence and affection that should exist between the two parties. It is an expression worthy of an age of barbarism, but one unworthy of this age.

It is said that woman has all the privileges she ought to have, and that her virtues, if nothing else, will secure them to her; but, sir, does it follow that when these virtues are not appreciated by man, that she should not have the means afforded her, if necessary, to claim them through the medium of the law? We all know that a wife, no matter how degraded or improvident may be the husband, or what disgrace he may have brought upon his family, as my friend from Laporte (Mr. Niles) beautifully remarked, clings to the husband as the vine to the riven oak, and when he falls she will trail in the dust with him. Does it follow that the little pittance that might support her shall be taken away because the husband has become degraded in the eyes of all mankind? It is within the experience of all of us, that high-minded and intelligent women, through the improvidence of the husband, have been left to eke out a precarious subsistence for themselves and their children. Any property that may be left in her charge is constantly under the eye of the constable, or officer of the law, who is watching her dwelling to see what he can secure over and above the petty sum of one hundred and twenty-five dollars worth of property, secured to the husband by law; not secured to the family, but to the husband. He can appropriate even that small sum remaining to his own uses, and squander it in the grog-shop, or at the gambling table, leaving his family to suffer all the pangs of poverty and privation. Shall we not allow the friends of such a woman to secure her against absolute want, although she may cling with uniform tenacity to the degraded being who has brought despair upon her and her family?

Free a certain portion of property from the grasp of the husband and creditor, and she will have means to keep her family in decency—to support herself and bring up her children respectably. And in this, sir, not only is the wife interested but the neighborhood in which she resides—in fact the entire State, for are they not compelled to administer to her wants, and those of her family, which of course involves a considerable expense.

But further, sir. A father or mother or friend of the wife, may confer property on the wife, and yet the officer of the law under our present system may seize upon that property to liquidate the husband's debts, unless it is a kind of indian gift that is taken back when the donor may choose, or the husband takes the opportunity to sacrifice it for the indulgence of his vicious propensities. The wife has no right to go to the grog shop or the gambling table, or participate in scenes of debauchery, thereby expending the husband's means—and is she to suffer all the consequences of such a course that may be adopted by the husband? If he indulges in these vices she has to suffer all the consequences of his evil acts, without being a participant in the wrongs he has committed.

I assert, then, sir, my readiness to adopt any proper provision that will afford protection to the deserted or suffering wife, or bereaved widow. I desire such a provision shall be adopted as will not be stringent, and invariable and fixed in its character, but one that may be judiciously modified whenever such modifications shall give promise of resulting beneficially.

Mr. SHOUP demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being upon re-considering the vote on the passage of the third section of number four, the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 84, nays 43:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Batcom, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Bidle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—84.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Beeson, Blythe, Bryant, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Foster, Gibson, Hall, Harbolt, Hendricks, Hitt, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Wiley, and Mr. President—43.

So the vote was re-considered.

Mr. PETTIT moved to re-commit, with instructions to amend the section, so as to provide that the property, real and personal, of women, shall be secured against the creditors or legal representatives of their husband.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to amend the instructions by striking out the words "or purchase" where the same occurred in the section.

Pending this question—

On motion of Mr. LOCKHART, the Convention adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY DEC. 17, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. HULL.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section in relation to the right of married women to hold property. The pending question being on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) to the instructions moved by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit.)

Mr. HOLMAN modified his amendment so as to make the instructions read as follows:

"The real and personal property of married women shall be and remain secured to them on equitable conditions by law."

The question being upon the amendment to the amendment,

Mr. PETTIT moved that there be a call of the Convention.

The roll having been called, and the names of absentees noted, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. OWEN. I fear, sir, that it will be impossible for me, in the allotted quarter of an hour, to complete what I desire to say on the subject before us; and as the Convention yesterday permitted my friend from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) speaking in opposition to the section under consideration, to continue his remarks beyond the fifteen minute term, I trust they will extend to me, desiring to speak in its defense, similar permission to day.

Mr. BORDEN. We'll give you what time you want. Go on. [Cries of "consent, consent."]

Mr. OWEN. It is evident that the Convention will either select betwixt the two amendments offered to the original section by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) and the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) or else, wearied out, perhaps, and desiring to get rid of the matter, will vote down the section altogether. Before adopting the latter alternative, it would be well for gentlemen to consider, whether they can get rid of it in that way. On a deliberate vote, after the fullest consideration and debate, the section was inserted in the Constitution. Have those who now seek to reverse that decision so poor an opinion of its friends, do they ascribe to us so little perseverance, do they think so meanly of our spirit in a good cause, as to believe, that even if the vote should be against us to-day, we shall let it rest so? Do they imagine that by stirring up temporary excitement, by introducing personal matters and suborning prejudice against the section, they will deter us from renewed efforts to accomplish what we believe to be an act of duty and of justice?

Sir, I went into the contest with my eyes open. When I first submitted the resolution in relation to the property-rights of married women, true friends warned me of the probable result to myself; of the chances that my private opinions and character would be attacked, and that influences would thence be brought to bear against me, in connection with an approaching election. It was not that I did not see the danger; it was, that I was willing to encounter it, in the endeavor to secure to one-half of my fellow-citizens of Indiana rights of which an iniquitous law has heretofore deprived them.

I owe to woman, as mother, as wife, as friend, all the best, the happiest—yes, and the purest hours of my life. Sir, no man of sense or modesty unnecessarily obtrudes upon the public personalities that regard himself and his private habits and actions. But yet grossly assailed as my conduct and principles have been upon this floor, it may not be unfitting that I should say here, that to a good father, to an excellent mother, I owe it that my youth was preserved from habits of excess, from associations of profligacy. I will add—and in so doing I may excite a smile of ridicule in some, for that I care little—I will and, that never, from the day of my birth down to this hour, have I consorted, even for an evening, with those poor, unhappy beings, whom the brutal yet tolerated vices of man first degrade almost beneath the compassion of a coarse and a cruel world, and then curse for being what they have made them. I have no associations connected with the name of woman but those of esteem and respectful affection. I owe to her sex a debt of gratitude that can never be paid, though my days were extended even to the term of life assigned to the ancient patriarchs, and though all these days were spent in her service—were devoted to the vindication of her rights. Something I may do to lessen the debt, and that little shall be faithfully done.

Sir, even if I were the faint-hearted man which I feel that I am not, I might take courage from the evidences of sympathy and approval that reach me from every side. The press throughout our State, almost without an exception—indeed, so far as I have seen or heard, with one solitary exception, in the case of an obscure paper of small influence and limited circulation—the press where it has spoken at all has spoken in terms most favorable. Some ten or twelve such notices have been sent to myself. Two newspapers having reference to this subject, reached me within the last three days. One of them, the "Indiana Register," published at Lawrenceburgh, has a brief editorial, announcing that the ladies of that town were to meet on Monday the sixteenth day of December, in the basement of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to take into consideration "the propriety of inserting a clause in the new Constitution more effectually to secure the property-rights of married women."

It was yesterday, Sir; yesterday at two o'clock, that these ladies were to meet; on the very same day, at the very same hour, when the gentleman from Laporte arose in his place, and declaimed in his earnest and impassioned manner, against the policy or justice of securing to a married woman any property-rights whatever. Ah! if they, thus assembled to consult how their daughters might be secured in the property which parental care had laid by for their benefit—if these ladies, meeting for an object thus praiseworthy, to protect interests of such vital importance—had but heard my friend's eloquent casuistry—his denial of one of the most important of human rights to those whom, though he honors and loves, he will not, (with most strange inconsistency) trust with the ownership of property any more than the Southern planter will trust his purchased slave,—if they had listened to all this, what, I thought me, even while the gentleman was speaking, would have been their reflections how deep their regret, that one feeling so warmly, should yet judge so ill!

That was an intimation of public sentiment in an Eastern county, here is another, in a paper from the West, a number of the "Terre Haute Journal." I found it yesterday, in the post office, after our forenoon adjournment; an antidote it truly was to the torrent of abuse to which, an hour or two before, I had been condemned to listen. This paper contains some editorial remarks in connection with a circular it publishes, a circular signed by certain ladies in this city and other portions of the State, expressing their gratitude to those who aided their cause in this Convention, and tendering to me a testimonial little deserved by anything I have been able to do for their sex. With the Convention's permission I will read from that editorial, a few words.

Mr. BASCOM. I object to the gentleman from Posey reading anything from a newspaper.

Cries of "Read! Read!"

Mr. OWEN (laying down the paper). It is wholly immaterial. I can repeat the words from memory.

Renewed cries of "Read! Read! Read the document!"

The PRESIDENT. As many as are in favor of giving the gentleman from Posey leave to read the extract in question will say aye. (An almost unanimous aye!) Those opposed to it will say no. (Only a few scattering voices responded.) The gentleman has leave.

Renewed cries of "Now let us have it! Read! Read!"

Mr. OWEN. I thank the Convention for their kindness, but must decline reading to them the entire editorial, because a portion contains remarks of personal commendation towards myself.

Cries of "Never mind. Read it!"

Mr. OWEN. That portion of the editorial is irrelevant, and may be read by others, not by me. The words I desired to bring to the notice of the Convention, refer to the section now under consideration. The editor says: "It has our hearty approval, and is, we think, in accordance with the public wish." And again he speaks of it as "a benign measure, which marks an epoch in the advance of Christian civilization." This comes from Vigo county, one of the Delegates from which (Mr. Barbour) addressed us yesterday, in condemnation of the section.

Since I have had occasion to allude to the testimonial which it is proposed to offer me on behalf of the women of my adopted State, I will say here, that regarding it as the greatest compliment—if in so grave a connection a word often so lightly used may be properly employed—the greatest compliment I ever received in my life, or ever can receive till I die, it matters little to me what may be said of myself in that connection. I am accustomed to personal attack, and am proof against ridicule. But if any man—and here I have no individual specially in view, let the remark hit those who may feel its application to themselves—if, I say, any man, whether he disgrace a chair on this floor, or dishonor by his presence some of the bar-rooms of the city, utter an insinuation, cast a reproach, directly or indirectly, by open assertion or covert insinuation, against the motives or the character of those courageous women who may have met in Lawrenceburg or elsewhere, to consult regarding rights shamefully denied to them, or those who may have publicly expressed gratitude to the defenders of these rights—if such a man there be, within or without the walls of this Capitol, I say here of such an one, let him receive it as he will, that I would give my hand more freely to the inmate of the penitentiary than to him.

I pass to the consideration of the instructions with which it is proposed the section should be referred.

My friend from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) proposes to substitute for it a section which may secure property to married men, but assuredly does not to married women. Thus it reads:

"The property, real and personal, of women, shall be secured"—to whom, Mr. President? To them? Not at all—"shall be secured against the creditors and legal representatives of their husbands." Secured, therefore, this property is to be to the husband, not to the wife.

It strikes me that the property-rights of husbands are pretty well secured by the common law already; that law gives to the husband all the wife's available property, and this section secures to him a monopoly in it.

Suppose a girl about to be married is rich, bringing to her husband say ten thousand dollars cash in hand; at the moment of marriage the husband becomes the owner of that money, may spend it, may speculate with it, may squander it, at his pleasure. This section would declare that the property, though his own to use or to waste, shall not be liable for an honest debt. It may go through his extravagance, it may go to supply means for his debauchery, the law imposes no guard against that, but his creditor, no matter how equitable his demand, cannot reach it. Shall we sanction such a principle as that?

The fifteen minutes having expired, the President notified the gentleman from Posey of the fact. [Cries from all sides of the Chamber of "Go on! Go on!"]

The PRESIDENT put the question, Shall the gentleman have leave to proceed?

Leave was granted.

Mr. OWEN. I am indebted to the Convention for the courtesy extended to me.

I was speaking of a case of marriage, where the property brought to the husband was of considerable amount. But that is comparatively rare among us. Suppose the bride, as is usually the case in our new State, in humble circumstances; receiving from her parents, on her wedding day, but a few articles of household furniture, or a few head, perhaps, of stock. The sheriff comes with a writ, and proposes to take the cow that supplies the family with milk. It cannot be taken; for, though now the husband's, it came to him by his wife. So far, well. But scarce is the sheriff out of sight, when there comes along, perhaps, the keeper of some neighboring grocery, well knowing the failing of the man he addresses. "So the sheriff was after your cow." "Yes," the man might reply, with an oath, probably—"but he couldn't get it." "Glad of it," rejoins the grocery keeper; "I'll tell you what I'll do. Let me take her along, and you shall have credit for fifteen dollars. You owe me five, you know, already, and that's as far as my conscience will let any man run in debt to me. You'll have ten more to take out in liquor. Come over to-night, and we'll have a jolly time of it." The cow is taken; the debt remains unpaid; and how much, meanwhile, is the wife benefitted by the protecting section? But the property is to be "secured against the husband's legal representatives." What property? All the property brought by the wife. But, what if the husband, meanwhile, had squandered it all, as he had a legal right to do? Is the widow, in that case, to have her action against her deceased husband's legal representatives? And for all that was once her's?—or only for all that remains of it? If so, is it to be a preferred debt? Then, as to personal property that had passed into the husband's hands, how is it to be identified? Shall it be registered? Registered as what? Not as the wife's property, for she has no ownership in it. Is it to be as "the husband's exempted property?" That would be a new and singular distinction.

It is evident, sir, that whatever else may be adopted, this section will not do. It would give rise to endless litigation, if the law founded upon it be so framed as to be of the least service to the widow; and, as to the wife, she is not named or regarded in it at all.

I turn now to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman). It reads:

"The real and personal property of married women shall be secured to them, under equitable conditions, by law."

Presented in this simple form, there are two questions, and two only involved. The first is, shall we endorse the law passed four years ago, securing to married women their real estate, with its rents and profits, as their separate property? The second is, shall we add personal property also?

Let us suppose that, after the passage of that law, some member of the Legislature had moved to re-consider it for the purpose of inserting, in the proper placé, the words "personal property;" that proposition would have gone further than the present section does; for the words "separate property" do not occur in the section.

Now, do you not think, sir, that a member proposing so simple an amendment would have been astonished, nay utterly confounded, had he found his proposal met, in the Legislature, as this section is met in the Convention?

Suppose my friend from Laporte (Mr. Niles) to have been there, and to have taken the same course he has done here. Then the luckless author of that amendment would find thrown at his head such assertions as these: "You are about to do woman the greatest, the most irreparable injury you ever can do." Or again: "You subvert the obligations of society." Or yet again: "You violate a great and sacred law of order." And if, marvelling at such an attack, the author of the amendment were to beg of the gentleman some proof for these wild and vague assertions, what would be the reply? Something practical, we might suppose, (judging from the gentleman's legal reputation,) touching the relative merits of the civil and the common law doctrine on this subject; something in regard to the legal effects of the change proposed; some evidence of its legal inconveniences. But no, sir, nothing of the kind. Instead of such sober, matter-of-fact reasoning, we have the old allegory of the stomach and the members, once told to the Plebeians of Rome in proof, that a rapacious aristocracy was an excellent and a necessary portion of the body politic.

And what is the application here? The stomach, the great devourer, typifies man. The hands and the feet shadow forth woman, created to do his bidding. And still further to carry out the spirit of this most refined allegory, allusion is made to the queen of song, Jenny Lind. The recent triumphs, due alike to the marvellous talents and her private virtues,—triumphs without a parallel in history—triumphs that have made a simple Swedish girl the most popular human being in the civilized world—these my friend regards "with a feeling akin to sorrow." He would deny to the world those magical strains that elevate and ennoble, while they enchant; he looks with regret on the position of the songstress; on the honest enthusiasm that greets her wherever she moves; on the princely charities she dispenses. He would rather think of her washing dishes and darning stockings at Stockholm: [laughter,] and, perhaps,—for Jenny's original station in life was the humblest, and her public talents alone raised her above penury—perhaps, to employ the words of the author of the "Seasons," —devoted to the rude embrace

Of some indecent clown.

Ah! sir, I should like to sit beside my friend from Laporte, with his quick perception of the good and the beautiful,—I should like to sit beside him during the performance of that grandest among human compositions, Handel's "Creation," and witness the effect of that pure and matchless voice, stealing out upon him in some of the magnificent solos that relieve, with a magical effect, the massive, solemn splendor of the piece,—and, at the close, I should like to break in upon the reverie of his rapt senses, and bid him ask his heart, whether it dared endorse the sentiment he has here put forth, to point his argument against the rights of woman.

But why speak of the department of art alone? Let us turn to a Hannah Moore, teaching the world lessons of piety; to a greater than she, Maria Edgeworth, devoting a long and a blameless life to the sacred cause of education, and to the inculcation, sometimes in the graceful garb of fiction, of lessons of morality that have never been excelled by modern pen; to a Felicia Hemans, whose melodious numbers will live, while human hearts continue to beat, and while HOME is an English word. I might bring the argument nearer to ourselves, and speak of her whose poetic genius is the boast, not of this city alone, of our State, of the west—but I forbear. I turn to the gentleman from Laporte and I ask him—it repugns me, in such a connection, even to allude to the allegory he so strangely introduced—but I will ask him, whether these and a hundred other faithful hearted and gifted women, their sisters in intellect and in goodness, are to be regarded as the hands and the feet of society! fit only submissively to minister to the physical wants of the all-possessing lord and master, man? I ask, whether, instead of devoting the glorious talents God has given them, to improve, to instruct, to delight mankind, their highest ambition, their noblest avocation through life should be,—to make pies and puddings for the gentleman from Laporte and the rest of his high-minded and most generous sex! [Laughter and much applause.]

Household cares properly claim the wife's—the mother's attention; no true woman neglects these. So is it the husband's and father's first and bounden duty to provide support for the family. But it no more follows that a man of commanding talents shall tie down every energy of his soul to the one task of accumulating dollars and cents, than that the influence of a woman, fitted to aid in the civilization of her race, should be restricted to her parlor or her kitchen.

I cannot but think, sir, that my friend's Roman allegory, with all the deductions he would have us draw thence, would be considered a somewhat strange, and erratic, and irrelevant argument against the proposal to amend the existing law by inserting, in the proper place, the words "personal property."

But what further proof of his positions does the gentleman from Laporte furnish? The poetic image of the clinging ivy and the sturdy oak. To the argument—if, indeed, there be any—therein contained, the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) has already replied. We ask for bread, and my friend offers us flowers. We demand an argument, and are put off with a simile.

But now I will beg the gentleman from Laporte to reconcile, if such a thing be possible, two sentiments of his, put forth within ten minutes of each other. The one, as I took it down at the moment, reads thus:

"Separation of interests in a husband and wife cannot be endured in a perfect condition of the human race. I am opposed to the principle, even as a legislative provision, in any form, in every shape, now and forever!"

And the other, which I now place side by side with it, is in the following words:

"I am in favor of extending to women" (to women observe!) "some further protection against a drunken or profligate husband than the present statute affords them."

Now, sir, I pray you, how are we to understand this? The gentleman, in one breath, not only favors the present statute, but would extend further protection to women from a profligate husband, than its provisions afford, by the addition, we must suppose, of the words "personal property," for that is all it lacks. And in the very next breath he protests against the very principle of that separate property which the statute, in express terms, recognizes; and he declares that he is utterly opposed to it, even as a legislative provision, now and for ever more!

Mr. NILES. Will the gentleman from Posey allow me a word of explanation?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly, with great pleasure.

Mr. NILES. My idea was to provide for the special cases, not to adopt a rule which would be injurious to the general interests of society, for the sake of remedying occasional evils.

Mr. OWEN. Just so. I remember well, that was the very argument employed. And now, in reply to it, I say, that all laws for the protection of human rights—all laws against crime or injustice, though general in their character, apply, and are intended to apply, only in cases of individual exception. There are laws against murder, against larceny. They are and must be general in their character. Yet they take effect in individual exceptions only. What difference would it make in my privileges, in those of the gentleman from Laporte, in those of the overwhelming majority of our fellow-citizens, if murder, if theft were not punishable by law. We do not desire to take the lives or the property of any one. In one sense, laws against murder and theft are not made for us. If all felt as we do, such laws would be a dead letter. Their provisions come into play only in the individual exceptions of the murderer or the thief. Exactly so as regards laws to secure against a husband's profligacy the property of the wife. They are and must be general. They will be imperative in a majority of cases; for profligacy or improvidence in a husband, though far more frequent than either murder or theft, and therefore more necessary to be guarded against by law, is the exception, not the general rule. But not the less should such laws be of a general character, applicable in all cases, though applied, perhaps, only in a few.

Has the gentleman from Laporte brought further argument in defence of his sweeping assertions as to the evil tendency of these laws? None that I bethink me of, except this: that, in opposing them, he did so for the sake of the sex themselves; or, as he expressed it, "not because he loved justice less, but because he loved woman more."

This is, in effect, a repetition of the old argument, that woman cannot be what we all desire to find her, if justice be meted out to her as to rights of property; or, in other words, that pure domestic happiness can exist only where there is dependence and inequality. The reply must be found, to some extent, in each man's feelings. According to mine, the love of a noble mind—which has always, as its hand-maiden, respect—seeks to elevate its object, socially and legally, to an equality with itself. On the other side of the Atlantic, it is argued that political equality must eventuate in the destruction of any republic. On this side, the argument is, that legal equality must result in the disruption of those bonds which hold together the family circle. I believe neither the one doctrine nor the other. I desire to be no man's master, as I am no man's slave; and here I employ the word "man" in its generic sense, to designate both sexes. I know what I should feel, if I were condemned, under any pretence, to the bondage of pecuniary dependence, even on the friend I love most in the world. I can imagine what the gentleman from Laporte, with his sensitive nature, if he were a woman, might endure in similar circumstances. The beautiful words of Sterne, I am very sure, would rise to his lips: "Disguise thyself as thou wilt, still, slavery; still thou art a bitter draught! And though thousands in all ages have been made to drink of thee, thou art not the less bitter on that account."

I know what I should feel; and I call to mind, and I seek to obey the injunction of Him who said: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them."

But I must return from this digression to the case I first supposed; namely, a proposal to amend the present law, by adding to it the words "personal property."

What reply have others besides the gentleman from Laporte made, to a section embodying nothing more than such an amendment? The gentleman from Vigo (Mr. Cookerly) said, it would "induce women to speculate in real estate, and the whole marriage relation would be uprooted." If that assertion has any force whatever, it applies to the present law, and to a proposal to repeal it. That law, passed by an overwhelming majority, has been in operation nearly four years, unquestioned, uncomplained of; and if the gentleman has heard of any women, who, in consequence, have become speculators in real estate, or of any marriages that have been uprooted by the influence of its provisions, he has heard more than I have; and more, I venture to assert, than any facts warrant.

But there is the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Clark,) he sounds a trumpet blast loud and long. "It is a part," says he "of the social system, that overturns governments." Nay, his fears reach farther yet, and he proclaims: "You discard Christ, and the higher law."

We discard Christ! The law which already protects real estate we propose to amend so that it shall protect personal also; and this is to be construed into a "discarding of Christ." I am ashamed again to reply to arguments thus baseless, thus idly reiterated. When we protect the weak and the defenceless, we obey Christ; we act up to the very spirit of his injunctions; we reduce to practice the very essence of his morality.

Sir, let us descend from the misty clouds of imagination to the solid ground of fact. Let us answer two plain questions. First, is the present law to stand? Secondly, shall we do for the poor what we have already done for the rich? The gentleman from Laporte spoke of the "aristocracy of wealth." In nothing can it speak out more strongly than in a refusal to extend to the girl who has but one or two hundred dollars worth of personal property the same measure of protection which has already been meted out to her wealthier land-owning sister.

I am willing to make and to meet that issue, here or before the people.

Mr. READ of Monroe. Did I feel but an ordinary interest in the subject now under debate, I should not at this late period in the discussion open my mouth except to vote.

The question of giving married women the right to hold their own property is not a new one to my reflections, or to my action. Early in life, when reading the law just as it existed in the books, and was carried out in practice, I felt both indignation and shame.

Whenever I have had influence upon male or female friends and relatives, about to enter the marriage relation, I have advised the securing to the wife of her own property, as safest and best for both parties. This had to be done through the troublesome and cumbrous process of trusteeship. I never return to the place of my former abode, without receiving the blessings of one woman, who by my advice and aid, in this way, was saved from utter ruin in her property. I am, sir, but acting out in this body long cherished opinions.

I rejoice in the progress of just sentiments which on this subject has taken place all over the United States. You can no more turn back this advancing sentiment of the age, than as was yesterday well said by some gentleman upon this floor, you can turn back the sun in his course across the firmament. It is one of those principles of justice and humanity, which is triumphing over long established custom, and is finding a lodgment in our laws, as well as in our hearts and judgments.

If the common law is so humane and Christian in its treatment of women as has been represented, I would be glad to know, at what period of its history, its humanity and christianity, were in this particular, at their highest point.

Was it when wardships existed as incident to feudal tenures, and the guardian lord was permitted to sell out the minor heir in marriage to the highest bidder, and the heir was forced to marry whom the lord appointed. This benign and Christian feature of the common law existed down to the year 1660, when feudal tenures were abolished.

Was it when the husband was permitted to chastise the wife, the law deeming it reasonable that inasmuch as the husband was answerable for the wife's conduct, he should have the power to punish her? Was that the period of the law's highest Christianity?

Or, was it when the woman might be hanged for the very same offense for which her husband received a slight burning upon the hand? Oh, this sir, was but a Christain difference of punishment!

Perhaps the law is now at the epoch of its Christianity. It gives all the personal property of the wife to the husband, which the husband may squander or will away from his wife at his pleasure.

Or is this more Christian and more nearly coming up to the golden rule, quoted by the gentleman last upon the floor, that upon the death of the wife, the husband shall have all the rents and profits of the wife's lands, during life, while the wife shall have but a third of the husbands?

Then it was a sad time of declension, when, three years ago, our Legislature passed the law permitting married women to hold their own real estate. We need some Christian reform to carry us back to the primitive Christianity of the law. Mr. President, it is a libel upon Christianity to impute to it the monstrous injustice and cruelty, which it is sought, to affix to its name.

We have heard much of the unity necessary to the happiness of the married State. Greatly, I suppose, it will promote this unity, if the law take from the wife all her own, and she be obliged to beg her husband for each dime, or half-dime of her own money, yes, sir, her own money, which she may have occasion to use! This is the discipline of the law to keep married women mild and gentle, and graciously submissive.

But, sir, what is the object of all property? Is it not to supply the physical wants of our nature? Well, then, let us see how this unity of husband and wife in this view, requires the unity of property, or, in other words, that the wife should give up all her own rights. When the husband eats, it satisfies the hunger of the wife—when he puts on his garments, of course, in virtue of this unity, it clothes the wife—or if he even deserts her and finds a shelter for his own head, hundreds of miles distant, that shelter protects the wife and her babes! Until the unity so much spoken of in this debate, shall do this for the wife, some property for her wants would seem to be needed, and it would seem not unreasonable to give her, not her husband's, (that I am not pleading for now,) but just the property, and that only, which by every principle of right and justice belongs to herself.

The gentleman from Laporte, speaks of dollars and cents, as not for a moment to be weighed in the scale of happiness. That is all true. But those unhappily married, must still have the means of living. We will suppose that gentleman on the bench of our highest court, a station which he is eminently fitted to adorn. A woman is before him suing for divorce for cruel abandonment. When the question is in regard to alimony, will he say, your affections have been cruelly crushed—your young hopes have been all blighted—that is the real injury—dollars and cents are nothing—they can never restore you to happiness. Alas, madam, the court cannot in the case, consider so poor a thing as money. It is so trifling, it is not to be thought of. The court will grant you nothing. Money will do you no good in your unhappy condition. It will not restore your maiden affections, nor bring back joy to your heart.

Mr. President, woman needs property for her sustenance, just the same as man does, and because she has suffered a withering blight in her most cherished hopes, that is not a reason why the law should give her no protection in her rights of property. The argument is, if argument it may be called, that having suffered so much, you do her but little harm, in superadding to injury in all that a woman holds most precious, the loss of her means of support. It is an argument which never has been used, and never will be used, in the case of men and their rights to their own property as against other men.

I may ask the gentlemen from —— if they know no case in their own neighborhood, where the laws of another State securing the property of the wife, against creditors of the husband, that wife from means descending to her from her father, is able to furnish a support to her family. I might ask them if that accomplished lady is found engaged in the market, and driving bargains for the purchase of farms, or of produce. I might ask other gentlemen, if they ever knew a case, where some separate property having been settled upon the wife, she, in consequence, became a trader or speculator. That, Sir, is never the result.

That a woman must be deprived of all her own, and made the merest dependent upon the husband's bounty, in order to secure her proper womanly character, is a slander upon the sex.

Mr. President, I hope there will be some recognition in the Constitution, of rights which I consider just as sacred as any other, just as necessary for the happiness of those concerned and as much founded in principles which are acknowledged by every mind.

Mr. PETTIT. Having moved to re-commit the section with instructions, and it having been alluded to by the gentleman from Posey, I deem it my duty to make a short explanation. The gentleman from Posey complains that he has been wantonly assailed. I can only say, that the assault has not been made by me, nor shall it be under any circumstances. No man deprecates more than I do, any such course, particularly in reference to that gentleman, for, in my judgment, there is no man in this Convention who is less liable to censure. I may say that I am well acquainted with the gentleman from Posey. I have served with him on this floor, as a representative, I have served with him in the National Legislature for four years. I think, therefore, I may say that I am acquainted with the gentleman's character and disposition, and I take great pleasure in saying here, what I have often said in private circles, that I know of no man who is more blameless in his conduct and more pure in his moral character, than Robert Dale Owen.

That his motive and design in the introduction of this section were the promptings of a pure and guileless heart, I have no doubt. But that is not enough for me. That is not enough to induce me to vote for this measure. I look beyond that, and enquire, is the section right in itself? Will it produce peace and harmony and happiness in the marriage relation? Will it produce a just distribution of property? Will it put the property of the family into proper hands, or will it do the reverse? I do not, sir, intend to discuss this question; but I may be permitted to notice one or two remarks that have been made by the gentleman from Posey. He has compared the married relation to the condition of slavery. Sir, I think that most of the women in this country—for I like the good old English word “women;” it is in my estimation a better word than “lady”—I think, sir, that the happy wives, and the happy mothers of this land, will be somewhat astonished to learn that their condition has been all their lives like that of slaves. I do not believe they have supposed or imagined that such was the case. I certainly did not suppose any such thing.

Mr. OWEN. Will the gentleman allow me to set him right? The expression that I used was of a qualified character. I said that women, during the most of their lives, had no more rights of property than slaves.

Mr. PETTIT. I did not wish to misrepresent the gentleman, and if I interpreted his language in too strong a sense, the gentleman shall have the benefit of his correction. I was merely going to say, however, that I do not deem myself the holder of a slave, nor do I think that my wife has reason to consider herself thus situated.

The gentleman from Posey said, at the commencement of his remarks, that he was going to talk about this question in a business like manner. Well, sir, I was really glad to hear that, for I have heretofore heard the question discussed in what appeared to me to be anything but a business like manner. But upon hearing the gentleman I found that he was repeating precisely the same speech that he had made when the discussion of this subject first commenced. It is certainly the same speech that he made yesterday, and I believe he has made the same one several times before; and, sir, the gentleman is perfectly justifiable in doing so, for the subject has been wholly exhausted. It is one upon which you can make an appeal to our feelings of sympathy, but that is the whole subject; you cannot make an argument beyond that. If more could have been said, the gentleman from Posey would not have failed to say it. There is no gentleman who is more capable than he is of presenting the case to us in the strongest light that it will admit of.

There is no gentleman who is more capable of doing justice to any subject, and if any additional arguments could have been advanced he would not have failed to avail himself of them. I take it therefore that there can be nothing more said on this side of the question.

Now a few words and I shall have done, for I have no disposition to consume the time of the Convention, and it does seem to me that this subject has been talked about long enough, and if it had not been due from me, as the mover of the amendment, I should not have said a word. I moved that the section be re-committed with instructions to substitute the following: That the property, real and personal, of women be secured against the creditors and legal representatives of the husband.

I do not perceive that the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn, differ at all from the old section. The proposition is that the wife's property shall be secured to her separate use, that it shall be and remain to her, for her separate use and benefit during the coverture. I have not asked that there shall be any covert action about it. I do not want that as between husband and wife, during the coverture, there shall be separate property. I want, however, that the property of the wife shall be secured against the creditors of the husband; that an execution against him in the sheriff's hands shall not reach it; and that the executors and administrators of the husband, shall not take the property that the wife brought to the common and joint-stock. While both are living, I desire that there shall be but one head to the family. It is proper that the law should constitute the man whom the woman has taken to her embrace as her guardian and protector, through life; her agent for the transaction of all business, for the management of all property that may belong to her. It is proper that he should be her legal representative in this respect.

One word in reference to the statutes which the gentleman has read. Now I undertake to say that taking a common sense view of the language employed in those acts, no one can suppose that the Legislature contemplated that the wife should be entitled to bring suit for the recovery of rents or that suits should be instituted against her in relation to property, yet I say the language of the section that has been introduced here necessarily leads to that result.

But, sir, it cannot be successfully carried out in practice.

The whole difference between my proposition and the original section, is this: I propose that real property shall remain as it now is, subject to the control of the husband, during his life. But my proposition secures the property of the wife, against the creditors and legal representatives of the husband, while the other creates a separate control in the wife, making two heads, or managers in one family, the one selling a few sheep to-day, the other disposing of a cow to-morrow. I ask you how is this property under such circumstances to be divided or apportioned? Where the wife brings with her as a marriage portion, a small quantity of stock—a few cows, and perhaps a horse and some sheep, how are you to make distribution of the property? How many pounds of wool will you allow to the wife's separate use, and how many to the husband's? How often shall the wife have the privilege of riding the horse, and how often shall the husband have the privilege? Sir, I have reflected upon this subject with an ardent desire to co-operate with the gentleman from Posey in the support of his proposition. I was anxious to go heart and hand with him, provided it could be done without disturbing the harmony and unity of the married relation. But I find myself compelled to differ from him. Now the only thing for the Convention to do, it seems to me, is to vote down all these amendments, and adopt the proposition that I have offered. I say to the gentleman from Posey, and to the Convention, that I believe that the wife's separate property ought to be secured to her. I seek no credit for advocating the proposition. The gentleman from Posey may have it all. I am perfectly willing that he should have all the honor and glory arising from the presentation to him, of a testimonial of approbation on the part of the ladies. I have no desire to deprive him of the least share of the honor and credit that are justly his due.

I have thus briefly given my opinion in reference to the two propositions. I am not for giving the wife a separate control of property while the husband lives.

Sir, I am not without my feelings of attachment, although I confess I have no great gallantry. All of us have had mothers, and the most of us have wives, or ought to have; ["consent;"] many of us have daughters—would to God I could say I had a daughter. But believing as I do that the course proposed would be promotive of mischief—aye, sir, I will say of ruin, believing that it would make the domestic hearth desolate—I am opposed to it. I cannot consent to do an act that will tend to withdraw from the family circle the finer, and softer, and better feelings of human nature.

I have detained the Convention longer than I intended, and shall no longer trespass upon their time. I hope this matter will be brought to a close. It has been fully discussed by gentlemen on all sides of the Convention.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President: The gentleman from Posey says that in the remarks of the gentleman from Laporte there is much poetry and little argument. Sir, they are the profoundest remarks we have had on this subject. An Appelles or a Michael Angelo would have deemed it an insult to have been required to write under their master-pieces a description or marginal annotation. The appeal of the gentleman from Laporte was the strongest of all arguments—an appeal to the understanding through the sentiments and affections—and he touched a cord in the human heart whose vibrations proved the truth of the touch and the hand of a genuine master.

I have not, until now, spoken on this subject, and I will now, and once for all, state the reasons why I am opposed to, and shall vote against, the section relating to the rights of married women.

A Constitution is with us the law of laws—its object is to frame an instrument of government—protect political rights and those social rights which are in danger of being encroached on, or of such transcendent importance as to justly challenge such a high guaranty; and it may be safely laid down as an axiom that, in framing a Constitution, no changes from the present state of political or social affairs is to be invoked, unless sanctioned by reason and experience, their own paramount importance, and the inadequate protection of ordinary legislation.

I oppose this section because experience at least has not demonstrated its propriety in this country. Similar Constitutional provisions, it is true, have been adopted elsewhere, but time, which tries all things, has not yet practically tested their merits.

Again, ordinary legislation, already highly liberal on this subject towards married women, is abundantly adequate to effect all desirable changes in our laws on this subject as fast as these changes are sanctioned by experience in other States, and the habits of our people. If the measure were adopted in the Constitution, and should be productive of bad consequences in our social relations, it might be impossible to get rid of it until all the evil consequences it can produce are fully developed, and then though the measure die its evil will remain forever. These reasons are founded upon the assumption that the measure is for good or evil only doubtful, for I affirm that we have a right to demand of the advocates of a measure of proposed Constitutional reform the clearest demonstration of its utility. All change is not progress; yet it would seem to be so in the opinion of a large proportion of the American people.

But, sir, as to the propriety of the measure itself, I believe the whole weight of the argument is with its opponents.

Experience we have none, except in those countries where the civil law exists, and although in many of those countries the religion of the Romish Church prevails, and marriage is regarded as a sacrament, the marriage tie is nevertheless in point of fact notoriously weaker in those countries than here.

There is another objection. The change is opposed to every rule of the common law regulating the relation between man and wife. By this section, you would disfigure our law and destroy its unity. Either adopt the whole of the Civil law on this head, and abandon your own, or allow our present system to remain untouched. You might as well attempt to crowd Corinthian columns in the place of the solid buttresses of a noble Gothic pile. In fact, your whole law upon this subject would thus gradually give way. The consequences I have not time to discuss. I am only stating without developing my objections. Let me resort to the argumentum ad hominem, and ask the gentleman from Posey with what propriety he opposes a homestead exemption in the Constitution, and supports this child of his hopes—this favorite section? If the people have not yet advanced to the point which would make a homestead exemption popular, by what test does he determine the popularity of this section?

The measure proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, although far from being meritorious is preferable. It avoids the unanswerable objections of fostering separate interests. It is the policy of the common law to merge the legal existence of the wife in the husband, and never to place them, or allow them to be placed in a hostile attitude, and all its provisions are subservient to that end.

The Civil Law, on the other hand, starts with separate interests, and no merger of the wife's legal character, and it is consistent throughout, in not deviating from these main intents.

You never can have but one of these systems; you cannot have both. Which will you take? This is the alternative now presented. If you choose now, so far as effects and consequences are concerned, you choose for all time. The Civil Law may be in many respects a better system than ours—less artificial, and imbued to a higher degree with natural equity. But God forbid that we should irrevocably adopt a part of its provisions in this Constitution and make a patch-work system for the government of such a transcendently important relation! It is not the part of wise men. It is not the part of statesmen.

There is still another and weighty objection. Grant, if you please, that the measure embraced in this section is adapted to the wants of a very wealthy community, where an advanced civilization falsely so-called, prevails, and where large amounts of property are transferred by one marriage, it is certainly ill adapted to the simple and primitive habits of the great mass of our people. Such a change forebodes more, I fear, than is dreamed of in the philosophy of some gentlemen. Sound wisdom forbids the change.

Law is a vain thing, unless it meets a response in the hearts of mankind; but law and public sentiment react on each other.

The domestic relations may continue as perfect and as peaceful under your proposed change as heretofore, but it will be in spite of the law, for you thereby manifestly exhort to domestic discord, by furnishing a subject for it. Some evil consequences may arise from the present law, but suffer them, rather than diminish the sources of peace and quiet among those elements which compose the vast society of a State.

Ante-nuptial settlements of property can be resorted to by those who are not willing to run the hazard of misfortune or profligacy.

If a change in the law must come, let it be made calmly, deliberately, and safely in a code. Let a change be made in the whole structure of the law on this subject, and at the same time, if at all; and let able architects superintend the pulling down of the old structure, and the erection of the new one. But I trust this will never be done. No nation ever yet flourished by systematically abandoning its institutions. Time may work its changes in the fabrics of States and societies. Let us be wise and follow time.

This very time—this very day—when changes are most loudly called for by many—is the very time when they are most to be deprecated. Above all, let us not now adopt laws which will mar the simplicity of our habits. Instead of encouraging laws for the protection and accumulation of wealth, let us labor to establish those which will lead to private virtue and public happiness. A corrupt court and a simple people may stand together, but simplicity of manners and virtue of mind will alone sustain a republic. The opposites are corruption and selfishness. Our institutions, like all things human, will fall soon enough without the aid of the cohorts of luxury and refinement. Let us stick to our household gods. Wealth and luxury will come fast enough, with all their enervating and corrupting influences.

Let us remember the simplicity and the virtue of our ancestors—like the infant Hercules,

“—— In vice untaught,
But skilled where glory leads the way
To deeds of virtuous enterprise.”

MR. GIBSON. I have a word to say, Mr. President, in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). But little has been said with reference to it, and that almost all upon one side. The effect of the amendment is this that the real and personal property of the wife shall be secured to the husband and not to her during her lifetime, and at his death will be secured to her against his legal representatives. It should be secured against the creditors, as no man can have any legal representatives, as I understand the law, until after his death. This is the amendment :

"The property, real and personal of women, shall be secured against the creditors and legal representatives of her husband."

That means creditors during life and after death, and legal representatives after death.

As far as personal property is concerned, I would like the gentleman to explain to whom the personal property is to go to after the husband's death, if not to the personal representative. It says nothing about the heirs; proposes to secure it only against the legal representatives, meaning the executor's administrators. They are the mere channel through which the law distributes the property.

This, sir, will produce confusion in the appointment of the property. The provision cannot be carried out without complexity.

I would not accuse the gentleman who has introduced this proposition, of desiring to break down the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, because I think he has submitted it from proper motives; but I am satisfied the amendment can never become a part of the new Constitution and I shall vote against it in every form, and I believe I will be benefitting the females of this State in so acting. It takes away from them the only right the law has left them. We now have a law by which the deserted wife can obtain a sufficiency out of the fortune she has brought the husband, to provide her with the necessities of life; and this amendment proposes to take even that away. Under the law as it now exists, if a heartless husband deserts his wife, the law allows her a bare support by allowing her to purchase necessities upon his credit, and making him pay for them. But by this amendment her own property cannot be held liable by the creditors, and of course the right to buy on her husband's credit avails her nothing, for no one will trust her. For such a section, sir, I will vote in no shape or form.

We are met here, upon all hands with the reiterated assertion, and it is nothing more than an assertion, that by this section it is proposed to give the wife a separate property. Now, sir, I pledge my reputation as a lawyer, that no such construction would be given to it by a court of common sense. The common law now does for woman's real estate all we propose to do for real and personal, and does that give her a separate property? Answer me, ye who have proclaimed here that by this section it is proposed to give the wife separate property, stand up and say whether the common law gives her any separate interest in her real estate.

Sir, there is but one alternative for the friends of this measure. They must sustain the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Helman,) or the whole subject falls to the ground.

It is entirely out of the question to incorporate the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). It is possible it may draw off friends enough of the principle contained in this section to have it engrafted on the present section, but then the amended section will be rejected. I should infinitely prefer to have nothing at all, and leave the matter with the people and the Legislature, rather than have such a proposition incorporated in the Constitution.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) objects to the word "slavery," as applied to woman. I am free to admit that her condition is not that of actual slavery, but she need not thank the law that it is not so. What right has the southern planter over his slave? The right to take all his earnings. Has not the husband the same right with reference to the earnings of his wife? The planter has a right to flog the slave. Has not the husband the same right? Go to Blackstone and see if the right to whip a wife is not accorded to the husband. Point out the difference, in theory, if you can. All that she has, and all that she earns, is his. He has the right to restrain her freedom or punish her by chastisement. True, he has not the right to sell her, and therein lies the only difference your law makes between a slave and a wife.

MR. BARBOUR. The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) has referred to a paper published at Terre Haute, in the county which I in part represent, as indicating somewhat the sentiment of that county. I have not seen the paper and know nothing either of the editorial of that paper or the "communication" or "circular" to which he refers. That is a county in which I was raised from boyhood, and I think I know something of the sentiment of that county. Not from any expression of opinion on this subject, but from a knowledge of the general character of the people. I should say, then, in reference to the sentiments of the people of that county, if this question was submitted to them to-day, they would vote against incorporating it in the Constitution.

Now, sir, a word in reference to the indefinite postponement of this question. And first, I would remark that we have indulged in rather too much abuse of the legislative body. The Legislature is the popular arm of the government; it is through that body we learn the will of the people; the representative is supposed to reflect the sentiments and wishes of his people, and whatever we say calculated to bring that body into disrepute, is indirectly stigmatizing the people. I do not think this wholesale abuse is in good taste.

How stands this question now? The section was first passed by a very close vote; that vote has been re-considered by a large majority, and the question now comes up on a motion to indefinitely postpone its further consideration.

A great variety of arguments have been presented, both for and against the measure. In the opinion of a large portion of this body, this section is pregnant with evil, and likely to work a dangerous revolution in society.

The sentiments of the people on the subject, however, are not fully known to the delegates on this floor. The question was not even agitated in the county which I in part have the honor to represent. It has not been agitated in nine-tenths of the counties of the State, although it was probably agitated in the county from which the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) hails, and no doubt the people there are in favor of it. I know this much, sir, in relation to public opinion, that a proposition apparently plausible when presented, and advocated by a man of extraordinary talents, and all its favorable points exhibited to the people, there will probably be created a public sentiment in its favor. But this cannot be done upon all subjects.

Thus with the subject of a Homestead Exemption; although approved and strongly advocated by the gentleman from Posey, in his own county, he had the frankness to tell us that he believed his constituents were opposed to any considerable exemption of property from execution.

Now, sir, is there any danger in leaving this subject now before us to the consideration and action of the people, inasmuch as it is as yet a new subject with them? They will read our arguments—agitate this matter among themselves—consult together in regard to it, and hereafter elect members of the Legislature who will reflect truly their will in reference to it.—Most of the unwise legislation of Indiana and other States, has originated from the fact that Legislatures have attempted to legislate in advance of public sentiment. I hold to the doctrine, sir, that there is more good sense and greater wisdom among the masses of the people, manifested upon important questions, than can be found in any body of distinguished men selected from the people. Theirs is a general experience drawn from the whole body of the people. Every man brings to light some new idea, that aids in moulding public sentiment. When this sentiment is thus matured, it will result in wholesome laws, productive of the public good. But when we attempt, upon mere abstract reasoning, to frame laws upon subjects which have not been duly considered by the people, the consequence is, those laws will not be wise or beneficial in their results. Hence it is that Legislatures so frequently change laws they have passed. This is the cause of the efficient legislation in England; the legislators there follow, and do not lead, public sentiment. Taking this view of the subject, may we not safely trust to the action of the people upon it? We have lived and flourished under the present system for years, and may we not continue to live under it two or three years more, until we can ascertain what the public sentiment is, in regard to the radical change that is proposed? Is it not treating the people unfairly, not to consult their views in regard to the subject; and will we not hazard the adoption of our Constitution, (which we are making at such great expense,) by engrafting such a provision in it as is now submitted by the gentleman from Posey? If the people were assembled here to-day, and the facts were stated to them as I have stated them, would they not advise us to leave this matter out of the Constitution, to give them time to consider of the measure, and that if they approved it, they would send men to the Legislature to do what was right about it? Can any one doubt such would be their advice? If it was a matter that entered into the organization of the powers of government, it would be necessary to act upon it; but this is not the case. It is a subject which can more judiciously be acted upon by the Legislature, which body will always reflect public sentiment in regard to it. I trust this subject will be indefinitely postponed.

MR. DOBSON. I think, sir, that in all probability, the better plan will be to leave this matter out of the Constitution. The law as it now stands on the subject, is sufficiently satisfactory, as regards real estate; and it can be amended by an act of the Legislature, so as to embrace personal property. This section passed by a very close vote—that vote has been reconsidered, and the section is again open for our action; and the question to determine is, whether the public mind is prepared for the change it proposes to make, or not? It may be that it is in advance of public sentiment. I do not pretend now to argue the question of the correctness of the section, but simply whether it is in advance of public sentiment, or not. If it is, ought we to insert it in the new Constitution—thereby endangering the adoption of that instrument? If the Constitution should be rejected, not only will the people of the State have been put to a great expense for nothing, but they will lose the benefit of all the other reforms engrafted upon it. Now if the Legislature have not the power to pass a law securing the rights of women in the manner contemplated in this section, we can, by another section, give them that power; and it is my honest opinion that the subject should be left to that body.

Public sentiment in all instances should precede legislation, not follow it. In fact public sentiment never follows legislation; legislation made in advance of it hardly ever receives its approbation. Where a few individuals do all the thing as regards the character and execution of the provisions of government, and the people have no right to think, when, in short, there is no public sentiment, as is the fact in some countries, the case is different. It is not so in this country. Every citizen in this Union has the right to investigate and act in regard to the important functions of government. As this is a new subject and one in regard to which there is much opposition in large districts of the country, I think the only safe course to pursue is to give the people time to think and act upon it for themselves. Think they will; you cannot keep them from thinking. It is a doubtful matter and therefore it appears to me the better policy is to leave it out of the Constitution. It is possible that its insertion would ensure the rejection of the Constitution. When the people have made up their minds in regard to it they can, through their representatives in the Legislature, take such action upon it as they may deem right and proper.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I rise, sir, to make a motion which I have not as yet made in this Convention; but it does seem to me that it is time to put a stop to this interminable debate. The minds of members, I believe, are made up on the question, and I do not think any further talking will in the least degree change their opinions. I therefore call for the previous question.

The call having been seconded—

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the main question now be put.

It was so ordered by consent.

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) to the instructions submitted by Mr. PETTIT on yesterday.

On this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 60, nays 69.

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Ballingall, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Blythe, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, McClelland, McLéan, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Wiley, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—60.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliot, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon Gregg, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mather, May, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Wabash, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Rariden, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, and Zenor—69.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon re-committing the section with the instructions offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit).

Upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 35, nays 93.

AYES.—Messrs. Bright, Butler, Chandler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Farrow, Foster, Garvin, Gregg, Harbolt, Kelso, Lockhart, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Moore, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Taylor, and Walpole—35.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Logan, March, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Wabash, Mowrer, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor and Mr. President—93.

So the section was not re-committed.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, shall the section pass?

Upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 55, nays 75:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Beeson, Berry, Blythe, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Foster, Gibson, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hitt, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Mowrer, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Thomas, Wiley, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—55.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, and Zenor—75.

So the section did not pass.

On motion of Mr. PETTIT,

The Convention adjourned until 2 o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the orders of the day, the question being on the third reading of the following section:

"Every bill and joint resolution shall be plainly worded, avoiding as far as practicable the use of technical terms in the Latin, or any other than the English language; Provided, That the Legislature may publish the laws in the French and German languages, for the benefit of those who cannot read English."

Mr. BORDEN. It occurs to me that this should properly come up when we have the sections providing for law reform under consideration, and for that reason I shall move to lay the section on the table—not because I am opposed to the principle embraced in it.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I differ entirely with the gentleman from Allen in the views of propriety which he entertains in regard to this section. If you look at the previous sections you will see what is said in regard to bills, and the peculiar character they should have. This is only an additional feature, and I think it is quite as properly arranged under this head, as under the head of law reform. The committee on revision and arrangement have certainly a right to put it where they please, and they will doubtless take care that it goes in its proper place. The question is, shall we pass upon the section now, while the whole subject is fresh in our minds, or leave it until some other period when we probably will have again to go over this whole discussion?

Mr. BORDEN withdrew his motion to lay the section on the table.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I move to re-commit the section, with instructions to strike out the proviso. I hope that this proviso, having no kind of connection whatever with the section, will not be stuck upon it. I voted for the proviso yesterday, not because I thought it was a proper provision, but because I had hoped that it would break down the section itself, believing as I did that it was far from being a suitable provision to introduce into this Constitution.

Mr. BORDEN. If this proviso is stricken out, Mr. President, I shall be under the necessity of voting against the section. I have a great many German constituents, to whom it is important that the laws should be published in their own language, and I must say, that I feel disposed to renew the motion to lay the section upon the table. [Loud cries of "no! no! no!"]

Mr. WALPOLE. This is a question of great importance to many of my constituents, and I believe is equally important to a large class of our constituents in other parts of the State. If the gentleman says he voted for this proviso merely as a rider to break down the section, I wish to have the vote recorded, in order that we may see how many more gentlemen are of the same way of thinking.

Mr. BORDEN. Does the gentleman from Hancock allude to me?

Mr. WALPOLE. No, I allude to the gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Gibson.)

Mr. WATTS. I have perhaps as many German constituents as any gentleman upon this floor. I presume, in the district that I represent, there are not less than a thousand German voters; yet I am opposed to the proviso, not that I would not be willing that they should make themselves acquainted with the laws of the country, but because I hold that if we cannot give them those laws in full, it would answer very little purpose, merely to publish the statute laws of the country in German, without the Constitution, and the decisions of the Supreme Court. And if the legal meaning of the words "may," and "shall" are the same in regard to public acts—as appeared to be the opinion of many lawyers on this floor the other day—it makes it obligatory upon the Legislature to publish the statute laws in French and German and English. Now I am not prepared for such a proposition. I think that we ought, by all practicable and reasonable means to encourage the speaking of the English language.

I, sir, who am pretty well advanced in years, should be glad to know it better than I do. I trust therefore that the section will be re-committed with instructions.

The question was then taken on the motion to re-commit the section, with instructions to strike out the proviso, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. LOCKHART. I move to lay the section on the table.

On this motion the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and being taken resulted as follows—yeas 23, nays 87:

YEAS.—Messrs. Balingall, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bright, Carr, Clark of Tippecanoe, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Gibson, Hall, Helmer, Hovey, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, March, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Niles, Schoonover, Watts, and Mr. President—23.

YAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliot, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Jones, Maguire, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Trimby, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—87.

So the section was not laid upon the table.

The question then was on the final passage of the section, and the yeas and nays being demanded, ordered, and taken, resulted as follows—yeas 99, nays 21.

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Lockhart, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimby, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—99.

NAYS.—Messrs. Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Clark of Tippecanoe, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gregg, Hall, Helmer, Hovey, Kendall of White, Logan, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Rariden, Schoonover, Watts, and Mr. President—21.

So the section was passed.

Mr. WALPOLE offered an additional section to the article, to the following effect:

"That no President, Director, or other officer or agent of any Railroad, Bank, Banking or other monied incorporated company in this State, shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, so long as he shall continue President, Director or other officer, or agent of such Railroad, Bank, Banking or other monied incorporated company, nor for the lapse of six months after he has ceased to hold such office."

Mr. W. observed that he had nothing further to say upon this subject, but he certainly wished to have his vote recorded upon the question, and if he could obtain a sufficient number of gentlemen to back him, he would like to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARVIN. I move to amend the section, by striking out the word "six."

Mr. WALPOLE. The section which I have offered, is an exact transcript of one which is found in the Constitution of the State of Florida, with the exception, that in regard to time, it prescribes twelve months.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I would like to know what the gentleman means by the words "other monied corporations."

Mr. WALPOLE. I mean those corporations which have extensive privileges—not merchants who act without authority of any special legislative act, but all those who are incorporated by act of Legislature, and who enjoy exclusive privileges, under their charter.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I think the proposition of the gentleman from Hancock covers too much ground. If he would modify it so as to include officers of Banks and Railroads, I think I would support his proposition.

Mr. GARVIN withdrew his motion to strike out the word "six."

Mr. GREGG. I would like to offer an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Hancock—it is as follows:—"Nor shall any number of this Convention be eligible to a seat in Congress during the first five years after the adoption of the Revised Constitution." [Laughter.]

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat.) I do not see that there is any necessity for such a provision, for I think there is no danger of that honor being conferred upon any gentleman here.

Mr. DOBSON. If the gentleman from Jefferson would look at the Constitution of the United States, he will there learn that this is not a matter which appertains to the Convention. The Congress of these United States are the exclusive judges of the qualifications of those who may be elected as members of that body.

Mr. WALPOLE. If this Convention continues to proceed in the manner in which it has proceeded for the last two weeks, I think every gentleman on this floor will perceive that there will be no necessity for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson. Nor, sir, is it within the province of this body to determine a question of such a character. The design of the honorable gentleman is evidently to break down the proposition which I have offered. Now all that I ask is fair dealing. If there is not merit in the proposition, then let it be voted down. I do object to this method of attaching riders to a proposition, in order to make it obnoxious.

The gentleman from Jefferson is well aware that whatever Constitutional provisions we may make, we can place no restrictions here as to those who are to be elected members of Congress. This must be obvious to every gentleman who understands the A, B, C, of the Constitution of the United States; and, when they vote in favor of such an amendment as this, they only do so in order that my proposition may fail. The other day I stated, very briefly, the reasons why such officers as those I have enumerated should not be eligible to become members of the General Assembly. My only object is that the Legislature of Indiana may be entirely free from the possibility of the imputation of any interested motives.

I spoke also the other evening of the immense influence that has been brought to bear upon senators and representatives, in favor of corporations; and I think I showed, beyond question, that, under this influence, the interests of the people were lost sight of. When you bear in mind that, in future, all incorporations are to be regulated by general enactments, is it not wise that every reasonable precaution should be taken to prevent combinations which might be injurious to the interests of the State. If we were to remain under the provisions of the old Constitution, there might be less danger of the effects of such influences, because the conflicting interests of some of these corporations, might, in many cases, operate as a statutory check upon each other; but, seeing that they are now to be all regulated by general laws, you invite a combination of the whole of them to procure such measures as they may desire, and thus increase the influence in a tenfold degree. It is, therefore, to keep the Legislature pure and free from the effect of such combined influences, that I am induced to offer this section; and I assure gentlemen that I offer it in good faith, and with no other view than to preserve the great interests of the people of the State.

On motion of Mr. SHERROD, the amendment of Mr. GREGG was laid upon the table.

Mr. RITCHEY. I would like to ask the gentleman who proposes this section, whether it will cover companies hereafter to be organized under a general act of incorporation, seeing that we propose to do away with isolated companies.

Mr. WALPOLE. Unquestionably. I think it is broad enough.

Mr. BLYTHE. I propose the following amendment to the section:

"Provided, further, That no member of this Convention shall be eligible to hold any office provided for in the Constitution until the expiration of two years after its adoption."

I had hoped that some gentleman would have felt it his duty to attack the principle contained in the section offered by the gentleman from Hancock. I am not physically in a condition to do so; and I must content myself with simply pointing the author of the section, and the Convention, to some of those consequences which are likely to follow the adoption of the principle contained in it. Sir, what are we about to do? Has the gentleman from Hancock well considered the kind of legislation which may grow up under the sanction of a principle like this? Such a proposition, boldly announced in a Convention like ours, may well startle us. Stripped naked, the proposition is simply this: That those who pursue a certain private and lawful business, because they do pursue that business, shall be deprived of one of the most invaluable privileges of citizenship—the right to hold office. And the reason given is, that these men, if admitted to seats in the General Assembly, will legislate for their own interests, and not for the interests of the public. Do gentlemen not see that, if there is anything in this reason, it applies just with as much force to one class as to another?

This section aims a blow at a private lawful occupation. But, sir, if we exclude classes of men, because of their business, from the privilege of holding office, what is the next natural step? Why, sir, it will be to wage war upon opinion, and proscribe those who entertain opinions different from our own. To-day, we exclude the professional and business man, because of his profession or business; to-morrow, we assault those whose religious opinions differ from ours; and the reason which we give is, the public interest requires it. What next? Political proscription. All men must conform themselves to the political opinions of those who have power, under the penalty of political disfranchisement. Mr. President, I am unable to say more; but I sincerely hope that we will not disgrace ourselves and our State, by the adoption of this section. I protest against it as subversive of political equality, and most pernicious in its consequences.

Mr. WALPOLE. The gentleman from Vanderburgh asserts that the effect of the adoption of this section will be to exclude a certain portion of our citizens from the enjoyment of their political privileges. I offer the section on the grounds that all the powers conferred upon corporations must be conferred upon them by the Legislature; in a word, that they are the creatures of the Legislature; that by the provision contemplated by the Constitution it is intended that the legislative department shall reserve the power to amend, alter, or repeal any act of incorporation. These powers being given to the General Assembly the question is, is it proper that a gentleman representing one of these incorporated companies which derive all their authority from the Legislature, whose whole existence depends upon the good will of the General Assembly; is it proper to throw into the Senate and House of Representatives some twenty or thirty individuals whose whole object it will be to procure the passage of measures favorable to the interests of the companies whose agents they are! I say it is right they should be prohibited from being there, and I would appeal to the gentleman from Gibson, (Mr. Miller,) and to the gentleman from War- rick, (Mr. Graham,) and, indeed, to every gentleman in this Convention who was either a Senator or a member of the House of Representatives during the last Assembly, as to the immense influence which was brought to bear by men connected with the railroad and monied interests of Indiana. Will you allow the President or a Director of the Madison Railroad to come into your General Assembly? Assuredly not. And if he were there, which way would his interests lead? towards the stockholders or towards the interests of the State? So it is with your State Bank. Which way would their interests lean? Naturally towards the interests of those whom they represent. For this reason then, I think we ought to endeavor to keep the Legislature pure. The gentleman from Vanderburgh acknowledges that he offers his amendment merely as a rider to break down my propositions; that he considers the whole principle of prohibiting persons from filling any office as unjust, and yet he offers an amendment prohibiting the members of the Convention from holding a seat in the General Assembly, or any other office that may be created by this Convention; thus contradicting by his amendment the very position which he contended for as being right and just; he has given us his amendment, but has not ventured to say one word in support of its merits.

Mr. MOWER moved to lay the section and amendment upon the table.

Mr. HARDIN called for a division of the question.

The question was then taken upon laying the amendment of Mr. Blythe upon the table, and a division being called for, there were for the motion; ayes 84, noes 34.

AYES—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Graham of Warwick, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Owen, Rariden, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Walpole, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, Mr. President—84.

NOES—Messrs. Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Carr, Chapman, Conduit, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Foley, Gibson, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of White, Lockhart, March, Milroy, Moore, Nave, Niles, Read of Clark, Shoup, Thornton, Trimble, Wiley, Wolfe—34.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

The question then recurred upon the motion to lay the section upon the table, and it was decided in the negative, ayes 46, noes 79.

AYES—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Blythe, Bourne, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Gordon, Graham of Warwick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hitt, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Miller of Clinton, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Watts, Wiley—46.

NOES—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermilion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tague, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, Mr. President—79.

Mr. NAVE. I offer the following amendment to the section: "insert in the proper place, the words 'or Stockholder.'" [Cries of Consent, Consent, and No, No, No.]

Mr. N. said. It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we are to adopt the section offered by the gentleman from Hancock, it is also important that we exclude every stockholder in a monied corporation; because if those who hold the offices referred to are calculated to be effected, by the mere fact of their holding such office, I ask you if the stockholders themselves are not interested in the same sense, and perhaps to a much greater extent? It, therefore, we design to exclude from the Halls of Legislation, any men connected with these institutions, I hold that we ought to do equal justice to the whole of them, and exclude every individual, however remote his interest in these Corporations may be—no matter whether he is a stockholder in a bank, or in a railroad, or in a plank road; he must be interested directly, in reference to all legislation bearing upon those Corporations; and if this is the principle by which we are to be governed, then we ought to exclude the whole.

But, Mr. President, I never conceal my proper position. I, for one, will state to the Convention, that I am entirely opposed to the proposition offered by the gentleman from Hancock—but if it is to pass in reference to those who hold offices in these corporations, then it ought equally to apply to those who hold stock. I am opposed to the section for the reason that it is a prohibition which may come in conflict with the very principles of republican government. Are we to say, because a man holds an office in a corporation, that therefore the country shall have no confidence in him, nor vote for him? If you are prepared to take this step, I trust you are also prepared to adopt the amendment I have proposed. If the one is proper, and the reason why we should so act in the one case, is good, then I say it applies with equal force in the other case. [Consent.]

The gentleman referred to the State of Florida. Are we to turn our attention to that little State, which borders upon the Gulf, and be governed in this enlightened State by precedents established in Florida, a State which is a hundred years behind us, both in intellect and civilization? [Cries of "consent," and applause.] No, sir, I am opposed to it, and therefore I insist that the position assumed by the gentleman from Hancock is directly in opposition to a republican form of government. I am in favor of allowing every individual to hold an office, who may be elected to fill it, whether he holds an office in a corporation or not.

Mr. DOBSON. It will be remembered by the Convention, that we have already adopted a section in the following language:

"No person, holding any lucrative office, under the United States or the State, shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly."

We struck out Postmasters, and we excluded justices of the peace, whose annual fees, in many instances, do not amount to sufficient to pay for their ink and paper. Now if we intend to carry out that principle, is it not equally as proper that we should exclude persons holding those offices mentioned in the section proposed by the gentleman from Hancock? Then, sir, there is another section, which, I have no doubt, we shall adopt—one which provides that no person shall hold more than one lucrative office at the same time. Now, if we exclude every individual who holds an office directly, ought we not also to exclude those who hold office indirectly?

It seems to me sir, that this is good Republicanism—that an individual should not be borne down by the weight of office. Sir, the principle itself is a correct one, without regard to the question of interest. We all know that these corporations constitute in themselves a kind of small Legislature. We give them the power to make their own by-laws, to regulate and govern themselves, and the President or the Directors are controlled by these by-laws; and should any one of these be elected to serve in the General Assembly, it should be remembered that he is bound by his oath to attend to the interests of the people, and not to those of any body else. Now, sir, when these men come here, I take it that they do not come entirely free from a desire to promote other interests than those of the people; and, if it is good to exclude Postmasters and Justices of the Peace—if it is good to exclude those who hold office directly, I contend that it is equally good to exclude those who hold office indirectly.

Then, Mr. President, I think we have assigned reasons enough why that class of persons named in the section, should be excluded. I would not exclude them from any prejudice to them, as individuals, in consequence of the office which they may hold, but I regard this as a correct principle, that the man who comes to make the laws for a free people, should himself be free from all restraint which might arise from any interested motive. [Applause.]

Mr. TAGUE. I hope that the original section offered by my colleague will pass, and also the amendment of the gentleman from Hendricks, (Mr. Nave) offered according to his own words, with the view of breaking down the section. I hold stock in a contemplated Railroad, and I am perfectly willing to be excluded from all offices while I hold that stock. ["Consent, consent."] We are aware that our State is adapted to be a great commercial State, and that eventually we will be chequered all over with railroads, and plank roads, and other improvements; and that probably one-half of our inhabitants will hold stock in these works, or in banks or other corporations. And, I am aware, Mr. President—for I have seen it in this Convention—that men are very apt, even when they are sent to work for the good of the people—to work some little for SELF. [Applause.] Self-interest, sir, has shown itself in this body; and when we elect these men to come here to make laws, the probability will be that they will be mostly stock-holders, or office-holders, in these public works, and I, for one, would think that they would act in some measure from selfish motives.

I have, on another occasion, said here, that it is as natural for men to work for themselves as it is for sparks to fly from a fire; and if those improvements to which I have referred should go on, and if our State should progress in wealth and power as I have no doubt it will, I would then say that it will be the rich that will hold the stock, and not the poor; that a poor man will not have much more chance in this country than a cat would in hell without claws, [vociferous applause, and shouts of "Say it again! Say it again!"] consequently I am in favor of the original section, and I will even go for the amendment of my friend from Hendricks.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. It strikes me, Mr. President, that there has been time sufficient consumed upon this question, and in order to save the time of the Convention, I move the previous question.

The call for the previous question was sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Thornton). The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Hendricks.

Mr. NAVE. I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Borden, Bright, Conduit, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Garvin, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Holman, Howe, Moore, Mowrer, Nave, Ristine, Ritchey, Shoup, Smith of Ripley, Tague, Tannehill, and Yocum—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermilion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—103.

So the amendment was not adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon adopting the section of the gentleman from Hancock.

Mr. WALPOLE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Ballingall, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Haddon, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Maguire, March, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nofsinger, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—70.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beach, Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Hitt, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Watts, Wiley, and Zenor—57.

So the section was adopted.

The question then recurred on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading, and the yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, were taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Ballingall, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Haddon, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Jones, Kelso, Logan, Maguire, March, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Nofsinger, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—67.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beach, Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Farrow, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Hitt, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, May, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Watts, and Zenor—57.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

QUESTIONS OF FINANCE.

Mr. RARIDEN. I propose to amend the article by adding another section. I am aware, Mr. President, that the proposition I am about to make is perhaps perfectly new in the institutions of our country, and I hope that gentlemen will reflect upon it before they undertake to vote it down. The section is this:

"The Auditor and Treasurer of State, by virtue of their offices, may debate all questions of finance on the floor of the House of Representatives, but they shall not vote."

I am not going to make a speech, Mr. President, on this subject, but shall content myself by explaining what I intend by the proposition. I think the fact of allowing the financial officers of the State an opportunity of discussing matters of finance upon the floor is the most effectual method of protecting the treasury department that has ever been devised. I do not know that there is any such provision to be found in any Constitution within the limits of the United States, but I believe that in the British Parliament it is the practice to allow the financial officers an opportunity of discussing all financial questions upon the floor of that House. This Convention can perceive the propriety of it when they reflect that all answers and responses from the treasury department are in writing, prepared and duly deliberated upon. But if we give them the privilege of debating on the floor of the House it would give them facilities to unravel difficulties, and to unmask frauds, and it would stand both as a court of law, and a court of chancery. In a court of law you may call a witness and ask him any question you may desire; but in a court of chancery the testimony is taken in writing, and this has never been considered so effectual a way of getting at the truth as where you have the witness and the accused confronting each other. I propose then to give to those officers the right to debate all questions of finance—to give them the liberty of being brought before the House of Representatives.

We know, as a matter of history, that there never has been an investigation through the instrumentality of a committee, in regard to any matter concerning the treasury, that has ever resulted in any good to the public. These investigations have all been made in secret, and have generally been decided upon party grounds; and the end of it has universally been, that neither party gained much, and that it was thought best to conceal the whole.

This question, from its novelty, may perhaps strike gentlemen as wearing a forbidding aspect; but I do conceive that, if gentlemen will deliberate upon it, they will come to the same conclusion to which I have come, namely, that it is a more effectual way to protect the treasury, than any other that can be devised.

Mr. RITCHEY. The gentleman from Wayne informs us that this is a novel proposition. There is no doubt whatever about that; and for the purpose of testing its strength, I move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Johnson (Mr. Ritchey) the propriety of referring this question to the committee on finance.

Mr. KELSO moved that the Convention adjourn; which was decided in the negative.

Mr. RITCHEY. I withdraw the motion to lay the section on the table, and offer the following amendment: Add after the word "Treasurer," the words "and the Supreme Judges."

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to refer the matter to the committee on the legislative department; for I am satisfied that the Convention is not in a condition to consider it to-night.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. RITCHEY. If the gentleman from Wayne is in earnest in his proposition then I think there is great propriety in the amendment I proposed. We are adopting a new Constitution, and the question of the Constitutionality of many acts, may come up, and I think it would be quite as well to admit the Supreme Judges to decide in advance whether the laws we are about to pass are Constitutional or not. This would prevent much loss of time; and I think it is as important that the Supreme Judges should come here and take part in the debates as the Auditor and Treasurer of State.

Mr. KELSO. I am not prepared to vote for the section. Yet I think there may be merit in it, for that simple reason, I consider it worthy of our notice. These officers make their reports in writing, and these reports are liable to be mis-understood and mis-construed; and where there is a difference of opinion among members of the Legislature as to the meaning of these reports, there may be no impropriety in allowing these officers to come before the Legislature and explain what they mean. That is what I understand to be the intention of the gentleman from Wayne. Now as to the Supreme Judges, it is their duty to give their decision upon the laws when they are made. The Auditor and Treasurer of State are not, according to my understanding of this proposition, to decide upon any law, but merely to explain their own reports. For that reason, I am in favor of having the matter referred.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved to lay the section and amendment upon the table, which motion prevailed.

On motion,

The Convention then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 18, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. STEELE.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. READ of Clark presented the petition of the President and Trustees of the town of Clarksville.

The petition was read, and laid upon the table.

Mr. RARIDEN, from the committee on impeachment and removal from office, reported the following sections:

"SEC. —. All county and township officers shall be liable to be removed from office, on indictment and conviction for felony or misfeasance in office, in the Circuit Court of the county wherever they hold their offices.

"SEC. —. All State officers shall be liable to be removed from office by impeachment by the House of Representatives, to be tried by the Senate, for any crime or misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be removed.

"SEC. —. Any judge being convicted on indictment of any felony or corruption in office, may be removed from office by the judgment of the Supreme Court, on information in the name of the State.

"SEC. —. Any State officer may be removed from office, by a joint resolution of the General Assembly, for incapacity or for general negligence of the duties of office, two-thirds of the members elect of each branch voting therefor.

"SEC. —. The General Assembly shall pass laws regulating proceedings for the removal of officers from office, State, county and township, pursuant to the foregoing provisions."

The sections were read a first time, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BRYANT, from the committee on the public institutions of the State, reported the following sections:

"SEC. —. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide, by law, for the support of institutions for the education of the Deaf and Dumb, of the Blind, and for the treatment of the Insane.

"SEC. —. The General Assembly shall have the power to provide Houses of Refuge for the correction and reformation of juvenile offenders.

"SEC. —. The County Boards shall have the power to provide farms, to be an asylum for those persons who, by reason of age, infirmity, or other misfortunes, may have a claim upon the sympathies and aid of society."

The resolutions were read a first time, and, together with the memorial of the pupils of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum and the remarks of the President of the Convention on presenting the same, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. GREGG (addressing the President).

Will it now be in order to move to amend the journal of yesterday?

The PRESIDENT. It is always in order to amend the journal at the time it is read.

Mr. GREGG. I happened to be in the Library at the time. I would like to have so much as relates to the motion I made yesterday, stricken from the journal. If it be allowed to remain, it will place the Convention in rather a ridiculous position.

SEVERAL VOICES. No! No! Stick him to it!

The Secretary read the portion of the journal referred to, as follows:

"Mr. Walpole moved to amend, by inserting the following section:

"'No President, Director, Agent, or other officer in any Banking or Railroad company, shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the Legislature, or for six months after he shall cease to be such President, Director,' &c.

"Mr. Gregg moved to amend, by inserting, 'Nor shall any Delegate to this Convention be eligible to a seat in Congress for the next five years after the adoption of this Constitution.'"

Mr. BASCOM. I hope the amendment will not be stricken from the journal. If gentlemen are desirous of encumbering the journal and delaying the proceedings of this Convention with propositions intended for buncombe, I hope the Convention will hold them responsible, as the people most assuredly will. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to amend the journal.

Mr. GREGG. If there is any feeling on the subject, sir, I am willing that it should remain there.

The motion to amend the journal was withdrawn.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT announced the first thing in order to be the section (on its third reading) which provides that no President, Director, Agent, or other officer in any Banking or Railroad company shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the Legislature, or for six months after he shall cease to be such President, Director, or Agent.

The question being shall the section pass? Mr. KILGORE moved that it be indefinitely postponed.

I was not in in my seat yesterday, said Mr. K., when this section was ordered to be engrossed. If I had been, perhaps I could not have changed the result, any further than the addition of my single vote in opposition to it. I look upon it as an effort to ingraft upon the Constitution, one of the most odious provisions that has ever, perhaps, been ingrafted upon any fundamental law. What does the section propose? It proposes to create an invidious distinction between the different classes of the citizens of Indiana. It imposes upon certain citizens of this State, a disability which is unjust and improper. Is it, sir, a crime to be a member of an incorporated company, which should render such member ineligible to a seat in the General Assembly? If it be, why not carry out the principle to the full extent? If the President or Directors are to be excluded, why not say the stockholders shall also be excluded? If it be feared that the President and Directors will bring to the deliberations of the General Assembly, an improper or undue influence, and if that be sufficient reason, for excluding them, the reason will be a thousand times stronger if applied to the stockholders. The President and Directors are the mere instruments—the mere agents of the corporate body. They are the active men of the body, the men who transact the business of the corporation. In nine cases out of ten, their interest is not to be compared with the interest of the stockholders. A man who does not own more than a thousand dollars worth of stock, may be elected a Director, and you propose to deny to him the right to a seat on the floor of the General Assembly, while at the same time, you will permit an individual who owns fifty thousand dollars worth of stock, and who can exercise ten times as much influence as the other, to be elected and to hold a seat in the General Assembly. A corporation is nothing more than an association of individuals for some specific object. Corporations are formed for manufacturing purposes—for the construction of roads, and for various other purposes. The business of a corporation is but an ordinary business transaction carried on by a number of individuals. You might as well exclude the foreman or manager of a mercantile establishment from a seat in the Legislature, from the fear that there may be brought to bear a combination of interests. You might as well exclude a man who is engaged in milling operations. You might as well exclude them from a seat in the Legislature, simply because there might be danger of their bringing an improper influence to bear for the promotion of the interest of the peculiar branch of business, in which they are engaged. You might perhaps, for a better reason—honest as the profession is—exclude lawyers, because they are obnoxious to the charge of being disposed to favor their own peculiar interest. You might exclude physicians, because there is great danger of their taking great pains to promote the interests of their profession; and for a reason, a thousand times more plausible, you might exclude the leaders of some religious sects. In fact, we all have a repugnance to the admission of ministers of the Gospel to a seat in the Legislature, because there is danger that the interest of Church and State may become united in the same bonds; in which case the liberties of the people would be trampled under foot. There are many instances, where this has been the case.

And I would like to ask the gentleman from Hancock [Mr. Walpole,] whether he would exclude another class, with whom he is a great favorite—I mean the retailers of spirituous liquors, [A laugh,] for fear that there may be a union of interest, which will operate in favor of that class of individuals. Sir, I was never more astonished than when I was informed that a section like the one under consideration, had been introduced here. I know, by the vote by which the section was ordered to be engrossed, that the power is here to pass it—to engraft it upon the Constitution. I hope, however, that gentlemen will reflect upon the consequences which must arise from the incorporation of such a provision.

You propose to disqualify a man from holding a seat in the Legislature; and for what? Simply because he has been selected as a business man, as a man qualified to transact business for a number of individuals. You declare, then, that business qualifications are infamous—that it is disreputable to possess them—that it is so disreputable as to render a man unworthy of a seat in the Legislature of the State. What is the danger that you apprehend? Gentlemen say that there is great danger of the monied influence of the country operating to the prejudice of the people. Mr. President, it is not so abundant—and if it were ten times more abundant, I have more confidence in the honesty and integrity of the people of Indiana, than to believe, for a moment, that they are to be influenced by the monied institutions of the country.

But let us reason, in reference to this subject, upon another principle. It is a business transaction, and if the people of Indiana are interested, if their property is invested, in banks, I ask you if that interest has not a right to be represented in the Legislature, just as much as the farming interest? Have not the people of Indiana a right to select their own men to represent them, and have not those who are interested in the business in which corporations are engaged, the right to have those interests represented? So in relation to the various road corporations. Some counties may be deeply interested in the construction of plank roads, or rail roads. They may have invested their capital in such works. And I ask if, having invested their funds in that way, that interest is not entitled to be represented in the Legislature? You say to them: You must select some other man; no matter how much you may be interested in these works, you must select a man to represent you, who has no connection with them.

I hope that this section will be indefinitely postponed; leaving the matter where it should be left. It necessarily touches the monied interests all over the country, and there is no danger of any such interest obtaining an undue influence. There are demagogues all over the country, who will try to make it appear that such is the case. I do not include the gentleman from Hancock, when I speak of demagogues, for every one knows that he is the last man to play the demagogue—"Consent," and much laughter]—he rides into office upon no hobby, but obtains office through his own merits. Well, sir, I say unhesitatingly, that here are interests that should not be compromised, under any circumstances. But I am aware there are gentlemen here who may be fearful that unless they vote for this proposition, there will be some capital manufactured to their prejudice. I am willing to trust the people in this matter. There is no necessity for throwing restrictions around them. They are capable of judging who shall be their representatives. The man who is willing to trust to the patriotism of the people will throw no obstacle in the way of their electing whom they please. They are competent to guard their own interests.

Is this a subject that has been discussed, before the people? Is there any gentleman on this floor, who has taken upon himself to attack, before the people, the different plank road companies, and rail road companies throughout the State? Is there any gentleman who has ridden into the Convention upon that hobby? If there be, I have only to say, leave the people to act upon the subject, and they will act right. I hope the consideration of the section will be indefinitely postponed. The amendment that was introduced by the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Gregg] is as meritorious as the section itself. There would be just as much propriety in excluding a member of this Convention, from any office in the gift of the people, for five years, as in excluding the managers or business men of a company, the capital of each of whom might not exceed five hundred dollars. There may, indeed, be more propriety in excluding a member of this Convention. But it is not necessary in either case. The people have the right to elect, or not to elect, as they please. We hear a great deal about members of the Convention aspiring to higher offices, but I apprehend that the office we now hold is about as high as many of us will ever hold.

Mr. RARIDEN. The course I have pursued on this subject, renders it necessary for me, so far as I am personally concerned to defend the position which I have taken. I regret always to see measures of great magnitude assailed, and the motives of their authors and supporters impugned in any way or shape. It is much easier to denounce a measure that is in itself just and proper than to meet it with reason or argument. It is the shortest possible way of getting clear of a proposition that cannot be fairly met in the field of debate, to malign it with uncharitable suspicions, and denounce it as infamous and the offspring of demagogues. I would ask the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) if he can stand up and look any man in this Hall in the face, and say reproachfully to him that he is a demagogue. If he can, he has more assurance than I supposed he had, at least more than the common herd of that kind of politicians.

Mr. KILGORE. I answer the gentleman by saying that I can. [Great laughter.]

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, sir, if the gentleman can do that, I can only say his face must be made of triple brass, and I leave the gentleman to the consolations which a knowledge of his own estimable qualities in the way of denunciation and declamation must afford to his imperturbable spirit.

As to the charge of demagogueism, Mr. President, I shall not attempt to defend myself against it. It having opinions of my own, and boldly avowing them and acting upon them, makes a man a demagogue, then I certainly am one; and I suppose the timid and wavering man, who, if he has any opinions, is always laboring to conceal them until he ascertains the current of public opinion, is to be considered the statesman. I must confess I have generally found those statesmen active and dexterous in whatever means will best advance their own political interests. And if such gentlemen do not succeed in trampling under foot all who cross the path of their ambition when before the people for office, it is because nature has not endowed them with the faculty of making their fellow men subservient to their wishes, and not for want of effort or good intentions. I do not say that a want of this element in their natures has prevented any member of this Convention from attaining what they may have sought—no, sir, but sometimes nature connects a confusion of intellect with the highest efforts of deception, and thus counteracts the aims of ambition in the way of office; and I have only to say that was integrity, honesty of purpose, and boldness of spirit, as prominently developed in the character of some men as is an over-weening thirst for place and distinction at any price, they would have accomplished the aims of their ambition much more speedily.

I suppose, sir, that this Convention is a good exponent of the public feeling of the State. Now, when a proposition of the character of the present one is presented to the House and acted upon without discussion, and when an overwhelming majority of the members adopt the measure, are we to be told that this majority, composed of two-thirds of the members, are mere demagogues? It may be so, but who has appointed the gentleman from Delaware judge of this matter? Who has elected him to sit like a second Daniel in judgment upon the action of this House, and the sentiments of the community at large. If this House is not exempt from demagogueism, can it be said that the State at large is free from the same influence? We had better select such men as he is as censors to keep the public mind advised in regard to these things.

But, sir, as to the proposition itself. It does not embrace many organizations that the gentleman says it does, and which does not appear to be included. For instance, the directors and president of plank and other roads, they are not made ineligible, but monied corporations are made ineligible by this proposition to sit in the General Assembly.

MR. KILGORE. What does the gentleman mean by monied corporations?

MR. RARIDEN. Banks, insurance companies, and every institution that deals in money and exchange. Railroads should be included in these restrictions as I will show by and by.

But, sir, let us contemplate this matter calmly. This question of money circulation is one of great importance to the community. Monied corporations or individuals who may control a large proportion of the circulating medium may have interests that are separated from or adverse to the agricultural interests of the people of the State. Those who make their living by dealing in exchange and money have different sources of living from those raising beef, and wheat, and pork, yet their interests may assimilate. I assert, sir, that all banks, insurance companies, and all other associations whose main object is to deal in money, or who may have large pecuniary resources, will yet come under into one harmonious system of action and act together. Although the gentleman may flatter himself that the company with which he is connected is entirely exempt from any extraneous influence, yet I know enough of these matters to warrant me in saying that though the President of his road is the man of the road, yet I tell the gentleman that after a while there will be another head to these companies, by an affiliation of interests to which he and other directors and stockholders will have to succumb. A superior head—that is thoroughly conversant with the influences abroad and at home that affect these interests, and has a familiar acquaintance with monied institutions and their operation, and this head will control the Presidents and directors of these various roads, and the distinction of that head will be obeyed.

The gentleman inquires why not, with equal propriety say that the stockholders of roads shall be ineligible to a seat in the Legislature? The stockholders are composed principally of the farmers in the neighborhood of the road who purchase an interest in the stock as a source of revenue, and this stock is held by them as their farms are. They have the right to vote for directors to manage the interests of the company, but they do not represent the company. The directors represent the aggregate personal capital and power of the company, and the President generally represents them as well as the capital.

The directors select a President, and he, in conjunction with the directors, transacts the business of the company irrespective of the opinions of the stockholders. If the stockholders were to be made acquainted with the designs of the President and directors, it might make a good deal of confusion and difficulty. It is one of the objects of the directors that the stockholders shall not meddle with their plans, as in fact it could not be done to the profit of the institution. Divided counsels in such cases would not do.

To illustrate my meaning, I would say that when Mr. Biddle was President of the United States Bank, he, to all intents and purposes, governed every bank in the United States. He was the master-spirit—the head; and the lesser banks, from necessity, adopted the course he pointed out. So in regard to railroad companies. Whenever they shall have combined together, they will have one common head to direct their action; and although some one of the companies may differ as to the propriety of a certain course of action, yet they will be compelled to acquiesce in it. In this view you may see the connection which railroads may have with monied institutions. Look at the Madison Railroad; its means are equal to the united means of any five banks in the State—and neighboring banks must necessarily court it, and although those stocks may not be owned by the same persons, there must be a sympathy of feeling among all such institutions.

Whatever is for the interest of one so far as legislation is concerned, can be made by their concert of action for the interest of all, and there may arise certain things under this system prejudicial to the public interests. Where then would President and directors be found? But in general I admit public sentiment would regulate such evils. This is not true with reference to high tolls, for instance, for as the gentleman from Hancock truly observed, you cannot keep up competition with railroads in the carrying business. You cannot run a horse and cart, or a wagon, or stage against them, and thereby keep down prices. The gentleman says they should be represented on the floor of this House—to maintain and watch their own interests. Sir, these corporations form no component part of the body politic, or an element embraced in the compact of government by the people.

MR. KILGORE. I did not say that these organizations wanted or ought to have representatives of their own peculiar interests. I spoke of the great mass of the people who may have an interest in railroads, plank roads, or banks, and who have a right to have their interests represented.

MR. RARIDEN. There is no provision preventing the people from having a representative. But let us go back further. We exclude justices of the peace from seats in the House of Representatives, and why? Because the people are jealous of their own interests. It would be the interest of each to preserve his own business at the expense of the people, and they are therefore excluded; and if they were not, justices might have an opportunity of increasing their suits, and might direct the legislation of the country so as to increase their interests, greatly adverse to the interest they ought to represent.

I say, then, sir, that these corporations form no part of the elements of sovereignty of government; they are mere creations of the Legislature, and as such should obey the creator, and not direct. It is the part of legislation to grant such power and durability as it may think proper to corporations; and shall we give them the power, in addition, to become the Legislature, and take into their own keeping their own interests and perpetuity?

Now, the gentleman from Delaware acknowledges that he is a director in one of these corporations. Now, sir, suppose he should be elected to the Legislature, what security have we that he would represent the interests of the State, in all cases, should it happen to be in opposition to the interests of the company with which he is connected? Pure and consistent as may be his general course of action, might it not be possible that he, through the frailties of human nature, might yield the interests of the State, upon some great question, to the interests of the company in which he might have a large pecuniary stake. This would be human nature, sir, and we must take men as they are, and not as we would wish them to be. If these companies act adversely to the public interests, the right of restricting their injurious exercise of power rests only with the Legislature, through its reservation of power over them. Nothing short of another railroad could stop extortion, should that be practiced or the exercise of the power reserved over them by the Legislature, of a restrictive character. Would a president or director be likely to perceive these impositions, or be very apt to check them by severe penal enactments? We could not expect such a thing, or from them a helping hand to terminate such abuses. We cannot expect railroads to have much competition, owing to the small amount of capital in the State, and therefore the power to make necessary restrictions should be confided to the Legislature, and that Legislature should be free from the influence of such associations.

I have been speaking, sir, of the intimate connection of railroads with monied institutions. The road men have their capital in the road, cars, &c., and they get the interest of the capital in its use, which generally pays a better interest than money invested in banks. The bank has its money in its vaults to loan out for interest, and to trade upon, and to make profit of. We are all familiar with the immense pecuniary resources of the Madison Railroad; and it is easily to be perceived that that railroad will yet subsidize every other railroad that terminates or commences within reach of its influence. A controlling board will yet, if it does not now, control the movements of every minor board of directors, and not a whisper of dissent will be heard against the decisions of the ruling body. I am not pretending to say, sir, that this should not be so, or that it could be otherwise. They ought to harmonize in order to carry out their plans effectually, and make their capital the most useful. But I maintain that they should not be directly represented in the Legislature. Jealousy is a virtue in politics, though execrable in love. The people would be, and they ought to be, as jealous of representatives put forward to promote the interests of these corporations, as of justices of the peace. The people, sir, have always been, and always will be, jealous of any apparent infringement upon their rights by blending them with those of petty corporations; they want the power in their own hands, and then they will be more than just.

I have only to say, in conclusion, that, if this proposition is to be altered, I am, then, in favor of striking out the words occurring at the close, "six months preceding;" but more of this hereafter.

Mr. NILES. I have read, sir, that, in other ages, and in other countries, men were presumed to be corrupt and dangerous to the public interests, because of their religious opinions; and we have seen, in at least one State of this Union, clergymen disfranchised, because, forsooth, their calling was thought to be too sacred to permit them to mingle in public affairs. But the honor seems likely to be reserved to this Convention, of establishing the principle that every officer or agent of a bank, of a railroad, or insurance company, must be dangerous and corrupt, and ought to be placed in the same category with the convict just discharged from the penitentiary, but whose term of disfranchisement has not yet expired. From the votes already taken, it seems probable that this strange section—for strange it does appear to me—will be incorporated in the Constitution. And by adopting it what do we say? Why, sir, that all that large class of our fellow-citizens who are actively engaged in the prosecution of the most useful enterprises known to the present age—who are selected, not so much for their interest as for their ability and integrity, to direct the building and management of our railroads—all the men who, from a regard for the public welfare, may consent, without fee or reward, to assist in managing insurance companies, which may be organized among the people themselves, in various portions of the State, for their mutual protection against losses by fire, and all the men who may directly have anything to do with banks, either under the present system or under a general banking law—should such an one be authorized—shall not be permitted to enjoy the same political privileges as other citizens. That is to say—the people, who know their neighbors, shall not have the power of electing any such man to the Legislature, though he be the man whom, of all others, they would prefer to elect.

And more than all this: we are about to say that, if a man own an hundred thousand dollars worth of stock in a company, but be too indolent, too incompetent, or too dishonest to be entrusted with any part in its management, he shall not be disfranchised; but another shall be disfranchised, if, with the smallest interest, he be chosen a director or agent.

Sir, my feelings are intensely strong against any such proscriptive doctrine. It is anti-republican and inconsistent with the spirit of the age. I would as soon disfranchise a man because of his religious or political opinions, as because of his being engaged in one or another lawful calling. As I would not compel the people to ask, when about to elect a man to the Legislature: is he a Christian; is he a Jew or Pagan; so I would not compel them to ask: is he a farmer; is he a doctor, a lawyer, a clergyman, or a railroad director? or is he a day laborer in the employ of a railroad company? I would only require them to ask, in their own time and way, is he our fellow-citizen? is he honest? is he competent? Admit that a railroad director is an honest man, and he will act uprightly in the Legislature. Do not disfranchise him simply because he is a railroad director. If the occupation is an honest and a useful one, fix no stigma upon it. But if it is of such a character as to create a suspicion against the integrity of any man engaged in it, why; then, forbid the occupation itself.

But, sir, there is another feature of this section still more odious, if such a thing be possible. It indicates an utter distrust of the capacity of the people for self-government. Suppose, sir, that there are in the county of Laporte a dozen men connected with a mutual insurance company, a dozen other men connected with railroads, and another dozen connected with banks; and suppose the people of the county were about to elect a representative to the Legislature. Suppose further that those people were all here this morning, I should hardly like to say to those intelligent men: "Gentlemen, you are incompetent to determine who of your own neighbors you ought to elect, therefore, I forbid you to elect either of those three dozen men." And I should dislike quite as much to say the same thing, and in a more substantial form, in the Constitution of the State.

There is one other thing to which I will allude, even at the risk of exciting personal ill will, which, of all men living, I would be most anxious to avoid. It cannot have escaped the notice of gentlemen that, on yesterday, when this section was up on its second reading, it failed on a division; but when, a few moments afterwards, under a ruling of the gentleman who temporarily occupied the Chair, the yeas and nays were called on the same question, it was sustained by a decisive vote. It may have been accidental. I have learned to respect the motives of the members of this body. I would hope that the effect of the yeas and nays was not from any apprehension that the section would be popular with a certain class of people, or that its supporters might secure support in turn. I trust that the vote of yesterday was an inconsiderate one, and that the final decision of the Convention may be different.

Mr. OWEN. I had hoped, sir, to hear from the chairman of the committee, whose report is now under consideration (Mr. Bright). But I suppose—and that is natural enough—that from his peculiar situation and location, he is somewhat unwilling to step forward on this occasion; though, from unmistakable evidence, I know he is opposed to it.

I am differently situated to the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright,) and perhaps it may not be improper for me here to say—so that no improper influence may be supposed to control my action on this subject—that I am not, nor have I ever been, either President or Director of any banking or of any railroad company; I do not owe one dollar in any bank in the world; and I am not, at this time, though I was, last summer, even in the Directory of a plank road company. I stand apart, therefore, from monied interests; hoping nothing, fearing nothing, from them.

In regard to what has fallen from the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) I remark, that nothing can be more true than his assertion, that it is our duty to guard the public against the great influence of associated wealth. And this sentiment is not only true, but it is most important. The world was formerly ruled by iron; now it is governed by gold. [Cries of "paper! paper!"] There is more effective power now in ten millions of dollars, than there was, five hundred years ago, in a steel-clad army. The gentleman from Hancock does not deprecate, more than I do, the vast influence of wealth—of incorporated wealth. He does not desire, more than I do, to take effective measures to prevent its ruling here; but he and I differ as to the means. There are two ways of doing so; one is, to provide, by our Legislature, that there shall be no special corporations; no corporations wielding personal privileges and monied influence so vast, as shall be dangerous to the liberties of the country. The other is, first to permit such exclusive corporations, and then to disfranchise their officers. I am in favor of the first plan. I am in favor of providing that we shall have no corporation or monied institution in our State, so recklessly carried on, so feebly restricted, as that they shall be dangerous. And I am equally opposed to disfranchising those who may happen to hold office in any institutions permitted by law. It is wrong, in principle, to tolerate among us any occupation that should be disfranchised. The argument of the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) is about as plausible as the argument sometimes employed to prove that clergymen ought not to be eligible to office. It might be said that their calling is of such a character, as, in a measure, to disqualify them as legislators; that they were accustomed to speak, there only where debate is all on one side, and reply is a breach of the peace. Such arguments are not just, but they are as plausible as those made by the advocates of the restriction now under consideration. I hold, that all professions, all occupations, which ought to be tolerated at all, should be free to all citizens, not convicted of infamous crimes.

The gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) with whom it gives me pleasure to agree to-day, though yesterday I was compelled widely to differ with him, well remarks, that a man indebted, in some twenty or thirty thousand dollars, to a bank, may well be supposed to be under its influence. Will you institute an inquiry into the private circumstances of every candidate, and exclude by law all debtors to any monied institution? If this principle be carried out, where will be the end of it. and what the result?

Look, sir, at the associations having a monopoly of the electric telegraph. The use of that power secures large investments, and those investments yield large returns. Will you exclude an officer of any of these associations, from a chance of election to the House of Representatives?

I am sorry, sir, that anything has been said in regard to demagoguism. I am satisfied, that, in regard to the large majority of those who voted for this section, they voted for it from a sincere desire to prevent the ascendancy of a great monied power; and no man can deny that that is a laudable and excellent object. The only question is, how may we best effect that object; whether through general restrictions, as reported from the Committee on Corporations other than banking, or from the Committee on Banks, such restrictions as shall take from these institutions that power which is so dangerous to the liberties of the people; or by saying, in regard to a portion of our fellow citizens, following honest employments, that they shall be disfranchised?

Mr. DOBSON. I had supposed from the vote given upon this question on yesterday, that this matter would not be contested again; but the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) appears to think that the action of the Convention in regard to it was grossly inconsistent, and I confess that, for the moment, it did appear to be so. I suppose that vote may be accounted for from the fact that there was a general misunderstanding as to the effect of the vote. It was not the result of the motives the gentleman has attributed to members. If there are any among us who are afraid of the people, they ought not to vote, or if they do vote, they should place themselves upon record, so that they may never be sent here again.

One word in regard to this fear of the people, which, it has been said, actuates many members here, in their votes. Sir, for one I fear no other power, except the power of Him who rules on high; and it is to protect the people's rights.

I want to pass the section; I want a pure ballot-box, and a pure representation. I want the people to rule. I want men to rule, not money.

The word "buncombe" is much commented upon; and it is said that when a man gives a vote for "buncombe," he is pandering to public sentiment. I would like to know, sir, what other sentiment he should pander too. I would like to know if he is not elected to carry out the will of his constituents. If that is buncombe then I am for buncombe. When the people are for a measure—then I am for it. Who is willing to oppose the interests of the people?

But let us notice the argument of the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) and the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) and more particularly the argument of the gentleman from Owen—I mean the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). It is strange that we cannot keep things right between ourselves, much less that others should place us wrong. ["Consent," "consent."] The gentleman from Posey says that he holds no office in any of these institutions, and he says that his course in regard to them will be not to allow any of these institutions to become so vast, as to become dangerous.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to have them so restricted as that they shall not become dangerous.

Mr. DOBSON. Well, sir, the best way to manage a horse is to commence restricting him when a colt. When very young they should be handled gently, but bitted while the mouth is tender. If you want gentle oxen, the best way is to yoke them whilst they are sucking calves, and tie their tails together and let them go, and when they are grown up to oxen, any boy can manage them; but if you do this when they get two or three years old they will probably break their necks, or those of their owners. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). Or pull their tails off. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. DOBSON. Let us see, sir, what is proposed to be done. Members generally appear to be in favor of some general law with regard to corporations. You will force them to band together, or, as the gentleman from Wayne has remarked, they will all pull at one string, so that if you touch one part of the string the vibration will be felt to its furthest extremity.

Now, sir, how will the interests of free banks, if that system is adopted, be affected by this arrangement. The State of Indiana, if we have free banks, will permit capitalists to come in under the conditions prescribed by law, and seek to invest their money here until the demand is supplied. What, sir, would be the amount thus invested. Probably for the present, some five or six millions of dollars would be sufficient, to be increased during the next twenty years, to perhaps ten to fifteen millions.

Now I ask if organizations possessing such an amount of means, are to be united together, to effect common objects of interest, if they will not be formidable and dangerous.

Then again the railroads, it is said, are to be banded together, so that there would be corporations owning some ten or fifteen millions of property, all coming under one general law. Then in addition would be your insurance companies, banking companies, saving institutions, all ready to supply the demand for capital, and all of these monied institutions together will probably have some twenty-five millions of dollars worth of property, to be increased to double that amount in a few years. Is that not large enough to be dangerous? I think it is.

Where, too, sir, is all this capital to come from? By whom will it be owned? Our people, or foreigners who now own our bonds? We must judge of the future by the past; and I understand that three-fourths of the stock of the Madison Railroad, is owned by Eastern capitalists, and that it is selling in New York at one hundred and two, and one hundred and four dollars, for one hundred dollar shares. Then, Mr. President, as this capital will be invested wherever there is a good opportunity for obtaining interest, pretty much all the capital of which I have spoken, will be owned abroad. Stocks that are owned by our own citizens will go into market and find its way East, or perhaps across the salt water, and the President and Directors of these institutions will be our own citizens, residing among us and transacting business, who feel not for the citizens of Indiana, but for those who have selected them as agents; for it is natural and right that they should act for those that pay them. Now, sir, I want no other instructions to control the action of our Legislature than such as our people send here. I don't want a capitalist, on the other side of the Atlantic, to sit in his office and instruct his agents in New York, to instruct his agent in Indiana to do certain things, which the people of Indiana do not want done, sir. It is enough that our people pay the interest on the stocks and bonds owned by capitalists abroad. They ought not to wish to control the legislation of the country; and for one, if I can have my way, they never shall. They have not the right to vote, and I am not willing to give them the right or the opportunity to instruct. Our people are the sovereigns of Indiana. If they buy our stocks or bonds, it does not make them a part of the sovereignty; they acquire no political rights thereby. Property is not the subject or object of representation in this country, but people—the people that live in Indiana.

But the gentleman from Posey says, that these corporations will have their agents here in some underhanded way, do as we will. I admit, sir, that such agents may be sent here, and, for the time being, control to some extent the legislation of the State; but if these agents can occasionally do it, I do not wish to give the privilege to the President and Directors, of continually doing it.

One word, sir, in regard to the assertion that this section proposes to disfranchise every man holding property in our roads or banks. We say to every man who has not rendered himself infamous, that he is qualified to hold office. But we will not allow any man to hold two three, four, or more offices, and get pay for them all, because we do not consider that the business of these respective offices, if they be only two in number, can be faithfully attended to by one man. A remark was made by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Kilgore,) that a man in an official station was not disqualified thereby from discharging the duties of any other office. Now, Mr. President, I do know, that a man cannot labor in two cornfields at the same time. He once pulled the wool over my eyes—does the gentleman recollect the election of Judge Rulon? I only refer to it, to remind the gentleman that men in high stations can, and sometimes do, wield an undue influence, and that which might be done for good, might be done for evil.

I want a man to come here without any other papers in his pocket, than his certificate of election. Let him resign if holding another office; let him come here to represent the interest of his constituents, and the interests of no body else.

Now, sir, as to disfranchising a man. We maintain that a man, to be eligible to election, must resign his situation in these corporations. A man cannot be a President of a bank at New Albany, and attend to his necessary duties there, and at the same time come here and attend to the duties of a Representative. We do not compel a President or Director to take office; but we say to them that—You must resign your present situation, if you wish to become eligible for election as a Representative. You say, in a section already adopted, that you will disfranchise the Justices of the Peace, Probate Judges, and other small officers—but with regard to those holding situations of great profit, and who represent the interests of monied corporations, it is contended that the right to hold office as Representatives should be granted to them. Now, sir, I am not for having this done. I do not pretend to say that such men are corrupt, but I do say, that if you place a President of a bank upon this floor, he will have twice as much influence as my friend from Posey, (Mr. Owen). For instance: Suppose he finds any one wavering upon the bank question, he can go to him and observe, "Your son, just out of college, will make a good cashier or clerk in our bank. Nobody will know anything." The member, of course, would not openly take a bribe, nor would the President give one. There is honor among rogues, of course, and neither would care to speak of the matter to others. To another man, a Director of a railroad might say, "I believe you have a relative, who is a good engineer. I think I can get him a place." And thus would the influence of these monied corporations be almost irresistible. A merchant, who was a Representative, might want his credit propped up in the East; and as the position of a bank Director or President, or railroad President, enables him to wield a mighty influence abroad, he could easily give the merchant letters of recommendation to merchants in New York for goods. There are many ways of bringing over doubtful voters to the monied side of the question. I do not wish to say, sir, that these Presidents and Directors are dishonest and corrupt; but I do say that they have a mighty influence to wield, to advance their own interests, if it should become necessary. And I think, therefore, that we should seek to guard as much as possible against any unjust exercise of that influence. I trust the section will be adopted, and forever close up all the avenues through which corruption might flow, and let the people, our people, have the exclusive control of their own legislation. They have settled the country, drove off the Indian and wild beast, felled the forest, and made the wilderness to bloom as the rose, and they should have the privilege of governing themselves. Sir, they will do it, or not be governed at all. They will not give up their rights peaceably. Any burthen they impose upon themselves, they will bear patiently, but burthens imposed upon them by others, they will not submit to. Then why will gentlemen strive so hard to open an avenue through which foreign influence may be brought to bear upon the Legislature of the State? Better desist; the result may not be so fortunate as gentlemen anticipate. There never was much good feeling between the laboring class of the West and the capitalists of the East, and let us not give occasion for widening the hiatus that already exists between them.

Mr. COLFAX moved to lay the section upon the table, but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. KILGORE, who said that he desired merely to have the opportunity afforded him of making a personal explanation, in order to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) and the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) who had made reference to him.

Mr. BASCOM said he would call for the previous question.

Mr. KILGORE remarked, that all he desired was an opportunity to reply to the attacks that had been made upon him by the gentleman from Wayne and the gentleman from Hancock, and therefore he hoped, as personal explanations had always been allowed in the Convention, that the motion for the previous question would be voted down. He had tried, hitherto, not to be troublesome to the Convention, and he trusted members would have generosity enough, not to second the call for the previous question.

Mr. BASCOM said that if the gentleman from Delaware was desirous of making a personal explanation in vindication of himself, of course he would withdraw his demand for the previous question.

He conceived that this Convention would be doing great injustice to itself, and also to the people of the State, if it consented to indefinitely postpone the consideration of this section. As had been well remarked by the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) if Directors and Presidents of the various monied corporations were allowed to hold seats in the Legislature, the influence they would wield in behalf of the companies to which they were severally attached would be very great, and pernicious. He considered it gross injustice to allow men of wealth and influence, and getting large salaries, the privilege of election to the Legislature, and deprive Justices of the Peace and petty Post-masters of the right to run for office, thus placing the less important officers side by side with the convicts from the penitentiary. A subject affecting the rights of women, could be elaborately discussed, but when the interests of the hardy yeomanry of the country were at stake, debate must be postponed. Several gentlemen had remarked that they were to have free banks, and he supposed the decree had gone forth that banks must be created, and he trusted that some provision would be made to prevent their Directors and Presidents from having seats in that Hall. The State Bank of Indiana already had its agents in that Convention. These monied interests had always been well cared for; experience had proven this fact. These associations had already, as was well known, had acts passed by the Legislature in their favor, that were detrimental to the public interests. All we propose to declare is, that no man shall enter the Legislature holding a prominent office under these institutions, without first resigning the situation he holds. He must stand on an equal footing with the hardy yeomanry of the country. You must not come here holding lucrative offices, which will aid you in advancing your own schemes. This was the reason why he thought the section should pass; and experience of the past was one of the best arguments he could adduce in favor of the section. He considered it important that this section should pass, in order to prevent corporations from ruling the State.

Mr. KELSO remarked, that in regard to this subject he had only to say that he desired to vote against its indefinite postponement, and for the passage of the section. He was satisfied that if the interests of these companies and corporations were taken care of by the Legislature it was sufficient, and that they ought not to have direct representation, chosen from among their own officers, in that body.

I am, said he, of opinion that we should begin here to guard against the undue influences of corporations upon our legislative councils.

If we are to have created in the State of Indiana a host of free banks, (as many gentlemen fondly hope we shall,) I insist that now is the time to protect ourselves against their influence upon the legislation of the country as far as we possibly can. The farmer, in the Legislature, represents the agricultural interests of the State, and his own individual interest is commingled with it. So if the stockholder in one of those banks represents the general interest of the other stockholders, that is enough on their part; they then have a fair share of representation compared with other portions of community. This section only proposes to exclude the officers and immediate agents of the bank, and not the stockholders. Other portions of community are not represented in the General Assembly by the officers they have chosen to administer their municipal concerns at home. A Clerk of the Circuit Court, an Auditor or Sheriff, cannot be a Senator or Representative. And why, I ask, should the President or Cashier of a bank be permitted to fill a seat in that body?

There is always trouble enough to keep the monied power of a State within proper bounds, without permitting it to appear in the midst of the legislative councils of the State, clothed with additional official dignity, thereby adding in some degree to its power.

The present bank, sir, has exercised, during her short life, such an influence upon our legislation, in numerous instances, as ought at least to admonish us to deal cautiously in this matter; and for her improper interferences, it is proposed in this Convention to wind her up, and substitute in her place a system five hundred times worse. And yet we are told there is no danger in admitting the officers of this new system to rule the councils of the State.

With regard to the remarks of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) and the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) in opposition to this section, he had only to say to those gentlemen that he liked to see consistency of action in matters of this kind, especially among the leaders and great men of this body. He wished them to remember that they were now taking a directly opposite ground to one they had taken the other day. A proposition had been made, not long since, to allow the people to petition the Legislature to make arrangements about the boundaries of counties, such as would suit their own convenience. Those two gentlemen had gone against allowing the people that right. Was there any more danger in trusting the people in one case than the other? If the people, then, were not competent to petition and ask for certain boundaries in their respective counties, were they any more competent to select their own representatives from whatever classes of men they choose—when, too, by such selection their interests might be greatly imposed upon? It was somewhat inconsistent, he thought, that the friends of one measure should be so much opposed to the other. If the people are so well qualified in the one instance, can it be possible they are so very stupid in the other? He desired to see members act consistently in their positions, and more especially when they set up for instructors.

For one, he was opposed to having, ever by implication, the interests of the people and of the State government affected by banking or other monied institutions; and for fear that evil might be the consequence, he was in favor of locking the door before the horse was stolen.

He maintained there was greater danger that the people would suffer by the selection of bank officers to perform the legislation of the country, than that they would be injuriously affected by the changing of a county line or a part of a line.

He hoped hereafter those great men—for they were, in point of fact, both of them, great men, and in most cases he had found them not only correct but consistent—therefore, hereafter when a proposition to leave a matter of vital importance to the interests and well-being of community to the good-sense management of the people themselves is before us, he hoped the confidence of those gentlemen in the integrity and ability of the people to perform the task, would be found steadfast and unwavering, and that he should hereafter be blessed with their aid and assistance, which he considered of no small value, in any emergency that may be met with in this honorable body.

Mr. SHERROD called for the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Convention second the call for the previous question?

Upon a division, ayes 47 noes 49, the Convention refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. RITCHIE said, that the Convention appeared very anxious to have this matter disposed of, and he knew that it was not a very favorable time for making a speech in regard to it. Much excitement had prevailed among the members in regard to it, and he confessed that he had felt a little of it himself.

I have, continued Mr. K., had some experience as a representative of the people in the Legislature heretofore, and I know something in regard to the practical operation of those extraneous influences that are brought to bear upon the Legislature for the purpose of aiding certain interests in the State; but let me say in all my experience as a member of the Legislature, I cannot recall to my mind a single instance in which a controversy arose between the State Bank of Indiana and the Legislature in which he bank was not victorious, and at the same time it was emphatically true that I did not know of a single President, Cashier, or agent of the State Bank of Indiana in either of the two branches of the Legislature. If that be true, the gentlemen have not hit upon the proper remedy. If they can, without having a President or director, or officer in the Legislature, control the legislation of the country, it is useless and unnecessary to put this provision in the Constitution. The remedy will not answer the object sought. I am as much in favor of having pure legislation as any one can be, but I do not believe the remedy proposed will prevent the undue influence of banks and corporations upon your legislative assemblies.

I felt no doubt in regard to this measure, and voted yesterday for it, although I confess I did so with some misgiving. I then felt the influence of the bank had been supreme over the Legislature. After more mature reflection I came to the conclusion that the bank can exert an out-of-door influence over legislation about as successfully as if they were directly represented in the Legislature by their own officers. The Presidents, directors, and agents of these companies can come around the lobbies of your Legislative Hall, and effect their object just as well as if they were admitted within the General Assembly. There is therefore no necessity for the passage of this section.

We are told, sir, that we have excluded postmasters and justices at the peace, and most of the petty officers of the State from a seat in the Legislature and that, therefore, there is a much greater necessity existing for the exclusion of these corporation officers, who receive such large emoluments of office. This is true, sir, so far as the principle is concerned, but I do not admit that there was any necessity or propriety in doing what we have done in relation to these officers. I have heard of instances where in thinly settled counties the office of Postmaster has been a source of loss to the holder instead of profit, and it is unreasonable, to say the least, that they should, because of acting for the public convenience, be deprived of the privilege of becoming candidates for the Legislature. I trust that gentlemen will not act hastily in regard to this important question. I know that many gentlemen have, while holding seats in the Legislature, been constantly beset by the agents of these corporations—this has been the case with myself; and therefore it is that gentlemen have set their faces so sternly against any connection, even impliedly, with corporations so far as the Legislature is concerned. I had the honor of hearing the message delivered by Governor Wallace in 1840, in which he stated that the State was "literally shingled over with corporations." It is no wonder, in view of the multiplicity of these organizations, and their continued importunity, that gentlemen are found opposing them in every way; and I fear that in their opposition to corporations they may suffer their feelings to lead them to go further than a deliberate judgment would justify. It is better to spend a day or two upon this subject than to have an improper provision engrafted upon the Constitution.

Mr. FOSTER. It is somewhat amusing to me, to see the consistency of some gentlemen upon this floor, in regard to this question. It has been shown here, sir, that some gentlemen who opposed this section with great earnestness, were in favor of excluding petty post masters from seats in the Legislature with or without restrictions. Such a rule, sir, I consider of very questionable propriety, because the situation of post master in country places is generally a source of no emolument, whatever, but merely held for the convenience of the neighbors, and should not, therefore, debar a man from being a candidate for a higher office. A friend of mine, the gentleman from Washington, (Col. Schoonover,) told me a day or two since, that he had been deputy Postmaster in his county, for some three years, and that he lost by the office, twenty-seven dollars, or seven dollars a year. When, then, I see gentlemen who were so remarkably tenacious of the composition of the Legislature, as that they would exclude petty Postmasters from it, who receive no pay for their services of any consequence—I am really astonished that they are opposed to a measure of the character of the present one. We all know that money is power. It is true that it has been said frequently, that knowledge is power, but at the present day, I am disposed to think that money has much more power than even knowledge has—and, therefore, when money and knowledge are combined, they exercise great influence. And with all due deference, you will find that Presidents and Directors are not only monied men, but men of talents, and when both these powers are combined together, to effect a certain purpose, they will be found to be irresistible.

The gentleman from Johnson (Mr. Ritchie) says, that heretofore, the action of the Legislature in regard to these corporations, has been governed by exterior influences. Now, sir, I would inquire if so much has been done by exterior influence, how much more would there not be accomplished by the addition of interior influences, by allowing Presidents and Directors of these companies to have seats in the Legislature. It is for this reason that I am in favor of this restrictive section.

The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen,) very correctly remarked, that in ancient days, it was the age of iron, but that now it was the age of gold—and that the age of iron did not have as much influence upon the masses, as the age of gold now.

We all recollect, sir, that during the existence of the United States Bank, that its President, Nicholas Biddle, wielded more influence than even the President of the United States. Had it not been for the restrictive action of the iron-hearted Jackson, we would have even now, been under the influence of a monied oligarchy. In like manner it may be said of this State, that as appearances indicate, the establishment of the free banking system, the time is not far distant when we, too, will be under the influence of banking and monied institutions, and the State will be dotted over with them. Not only these corporations have their lobby agents at work, but their toadies will be operating in our Legislature for the advancement of the interests of these institutions—as they have been at work in this hall. Thus have we seen it sir, in regard to the present section. Because it did not emanate from some leading man, we hear some one of the mouth-pieces of these corporations getting up, and calling the previous question. If gentlemen on this floor will act the part of toadies, I can only say, I love to taunt them with their toadyism. [Cries of “consent” and “order.”] This language may appear somewhat strong, but I can only say, I hold myself responsible both here and elsewhere, for every word I say. [Applause and cries of “order.”] There is, sir, a species of toadyism here—a kind of bowing to certain individuals, a worshipping of certain men and measures, which is like the worship of the eastern idolater—from the rising to the setting of the sun. Here a measure of vital importance was introduced by the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) which should be fully debated, and investigated and yet the previous question is called upon it. How does this action contrast with the course pursued by gentlemen the other day, in regard to the question of permitting the State to borrow money. The amendment providing for that purpose was not democratic enough; you could not allow the State to borrow money at all. I voted to retain the amendment as long as I could, and then to retain the section as it stood; but I should have preferred the adoption of the amendment and leaving the matter for the decision of the people by a distinct proposition. Gentlemen who were opposed to that measure.

are opposed to the present measure. They would not give that power to the people then; but they are perfectly willing now to give it to the Presidents and Directors of these monied institutions. It is now very near twelve o'clock—and wishing to blow a little steam off at the expense of certain would be, great men—and after having said what I have I will just sit down. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. As I have but a few minutes previous to the ordinary time of adjournment to express my views upon the question before the Convention, I shall proceed to do so very briefly, leaving dissertations upon “demagoguism” and “toadyism,” to be made by gentlemen who are learned upon those subjects, and have a taste for discussing them.

And first, I desire to direct the attention of the Convention to an argument that is quite current on this floor, and has perhaps received a consideration to which it is not entitled. I refer to the argument, that, as we have declared that post-masters, justices of the peace, &c., shall not, while they are such officers, be eligible to an election as members of the Legislature, therefore, we should adopt the section under consideration excluding the presidents, directors, officers and agents of all banking or other incorporated monied institutions, and of all railroad companies, from eligibility to election as members of the Legislature while they hold such offices or employments, and until a period of six months has elapsed after they have ceased to hold the same. Sir, if we have acted unwisely in one case I do not consider that a good reason why we should act in the same manner in another case. I do not recollect how I voted upon the provision respecting post-masters, but if I voted for rendering them ineligible to seats in the Legislature I am ready to correct my mistake and vote for rendering those eligible whose offices are of little value, and are merely held for the accommodation of their respective neighborhoods. But, sir, there is an important distinction between the two provisions. Under the one adopted with reference to post-masters, justices of the peace, &c., if they desire to obtain seats in the Legislature they may resign their offices at any time, and be immediately eligible to election; but under the provisions of the section under consideration the officers and agents therein specified are not only ineligible while such, but for six months after they have ceased to be such officers or agents. They cannot resign their places or employments and be at once eligible to election, but must remain at quarantine six months before the people can be permitted to vote for them. Half a year must elapse before the days of their purification are fulfilled. Sir, if those corporations exercise so corrupting an influence upon their officers and agents as to require so extraordinary a provision as this, it is our duty to provide in our Constitution that no such corporations shall ever hereafter be created in this State.

Gentlemen appear to lose sight of another consideration. They speak as if it were in the power of corporations, such as banks and railroad companies to elect whom they please to the Legislature, and thus acquire a controlling influence there. Now, I understand that the members of that body are to be elected by the people—that a majority, or at least a plurality of the voters of a district, decide who shall represent them in the Legislature. The people are sufficiently jealous of corporations, it seems to me, to be trusted in this matter. Are gentlemen afraid that corporations will corrupt the people? If so, I must say that the virtue that needs thus to be guarded is not worth a sentinel. If a man connected with any of these corporations presents himself before the people as a candidate, the fact of such connection becomes known, and if the people have any fears that as a representative he would act too friendly towards corporations they can decline to make him their representative. If corporations desire to place their peculiar friends in the Legislature they can find men who are no ways connected with them that will answer their purpose, and who will stand before the people unsuspected. This amendment, therefore, instead of doing any good may have a tendency to defeat the very object its friends wish to accomplish.

The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) has worked himself into quite a passion about the efforts made last winter by certain railroad presidents to influence the action of the Senate. I will ask that gentleman if any such officer was a member of the Senate? None that I know of. There may have been some lobby members of that kind, and if such is the case, the gentleman in order to preserve the purity of the Senate ought to provide that no such contaminated persons should be permitted to enter the Senate Chamber. Nay, he should carry his precautions still further, and should provide that no such officers and agents should be permitted to communicate in any manner with the members of the Legislature. He should compel them to put on the badge of leprosy, and wherever they go cry "unclean, unclean" that the Honorable senators and representatives may escape from their infecting presence!

The same gentleman says that the railroad presidents are sworn to be true to the interests of their respective companies, and, therefore, are disqualified from acting as faithful and disinterested representatives of the people. There may be railroad companies that require their officers to take such oaths, but I know of none. But, sir, when a representative takes upon himself an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of this State, and that he will faithfully discharge his duties as a member of the Legislature, he takes upon himself a higher obligation than any corporation has a right to impose. Moreover, he has upon him the eyes of his constituents, whose confidence and respect he would soon lose if he voted for the advancement of any private interest to the detriment of the public welfare.

Another remark was made by the gentleman, which I will briefly notice, because sometimes these little things are magnified into an importance they do not deserve. He spoke of the privilege given to insurance companies to deal in bills of exchange as though it were something very alarming. It is a matter almost too trifling to be noticed. To deal in bills of exchange is a privilege which every citizen of the State enjoys. Insurance companies ought always to be prepared to promptly pay their losses. They do not, however, wish to keep their money locked up in their vaults, as so much dead capital, and therefore loan it out on short time, or purchase bills of exchange that will shortly mature or can be readily converted into cash. How the public interests are to be injuriously affected by permitting an insurance company to exercise a privilege, which any natural person in the State may exercise, is a little beyond my comprehension.

The gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) remarked that by the election of the presidents and directors of banks and rail-roads to the Legislature, that body would be subjected to improper influences in the form of indirect bribery. Now, sir, I would inquire how the exclusion of these officers from seats in the Legislature will prevent bribery, either direct or indirect, if corporations can be found so base as to offer, or representatives so base as to receive bribes? Sir, if you expect to pass laws that will effectually prevent bribery you have entered upon a task very difficult of accomplishment. We must look for a better security than laws or constitutional provisions can furnish. We must trust to the sound discretion of the people, and believe that they will select as their representatives men too honest to be bribed.

Another idea that has been advanced in this discussion is that certain interests should not be represented in your General Assemblies. What are representatives for if they are not to protect and promote the interests of the people in their various avocations and employments? I hold, sir, that every interest of the people ought to have a fair hearing in your legislative halls. The State is not only bound to extend her fostering care over the agricultural, mechanical, and commercial interests of her citizens, but if she permits them to engage in the business of banking, or the construction of works of internal improvement, it is her duty to give to them the full and fair protection of her laws.

But, Mr. President, my opposition to the amendment under consideration is not founded upon a desire that your legislative halls should be crowded with the officers or agents of incorporated companies. I have no wish that such should be the case, and I can see no reason to fear that it ever will be the case. If, however, the people, who are the sovereign disposers of those places of trust and responsibility, choose to select such men as their agents, they ought to have the right of doing so. And I venture to say, sir, that they will find among the officers, directors, and agents, of your banking institutions and railroad companies, as many men of integrity and ability as can be found among the same number of persons engaged in any other pursuits. I am opposed to the amendment because it is an attempt to disfranchise a class of our fellow-citizens on account of the business they follow. Such distinctions violate the first principles of a free government. If you begin to make such discriminations where are you to end. What class will you disfranchise next? The mover of the amendment says he finds a precedent for his proposition in the Constitution of Florida. I do not regard that as very high authority. He may find a precedent nearer home for the exclusion of another class of persons from the same privilege. The Constitution of Kentucky excludes from her Legislature all ministers of the Gospel. I do not myself conceive that legislation is the appropriate business of those who are called to preach, but I would not vote to deprive them of that privilege. My doctrine is that offices of trust, honor, and profit, should be open alike to citizens of all classes and pursuits. I have no fears that the people will ever permit any one class to obtain a preponderance over all others.

Pending the question, on motion of Mr. DUNN of Jefferson, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the orders of the day, the pending question being on the motion to indefinitely postpone the section prohibiting Presidents, Directors, and other officers of incorporated companies, from being eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly.

Mr. KILGORE. I ask the privilege of occupying the attention of the Convention, for a short time, in answering some of the arguments of gentlemen in favor of the section now under consideration; and I promise that I will occupy as little time in doing so as possible. In the first place, I would remark that I exceedingly regret that my friend from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso), who is not now in his seat, should have declared, that the law of retaliation should hereafter be his rule of action upon this floor. That gentleman has always been distinguished for his independence, straightforwardness, and consistency; and he is the last man that I should have expected to hear announce, in this Hall, that, out of revenge for anything said, either in relation to his own opinions, or those of other persons, he would, for once in his life, act inconsistently. It seems that the head and front of our offending is, that on another occasion, when the subject of county boundaries was before the Convention, we voted against leaving the question open to be decided by the people. It is not necessary now, that I should travel into that. The difference seemed to be an honest difference of opinion between the gentleman from Switzerland, and the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) to whom he referred, and myself. If we acted inconsistently upon this floor, certainly that could be no justification, on the part of my friend from Switzerland, in following our example; and I hope that he will not act inconsistently on this occasion, merely to revenge himself.

The gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) seems to think that there is great danger, and anticipates much difficulty, if this provision, or one similar to it, is not ingrafted upon the Constitution. I know that that gentleman has had great experience in legislation; but he surely does not speak from experience, when he talks about bank Directors, and those interested in railroad and other corporations coming to members of the Legislature, and attempting to exercise improper influences upon them. Sir, his very countenance would forbid any such thing; and I venture the assertion that there is not a gentleman within the sound of my voice, who can point to a single instance, in which an officer of a bank or any other corporation in the State of Indiana, has ever approached a member of the Legislature, for the purpose of securing his aid in the passage of any measure by bribery or corruption. If such a thing has happened, sir, I venture the prediction that the man who was thus purchased, by his own acts and conduct held out inducements to the individual to offer the bribe.

Another matter, which seems to afflict the minds of gentlemen, is to me exceedingly astonishing. The minds of some gentlemen seem to be continually brooding over bribery and corruption, and all kinds of horrible notions. The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) seems to think that the men whom the people honor with their confidence, and whom they elect to a seat in the Legislature of the State, will disregard the solemn obligations of the oath which they have taken to support the Constitution of the United States, and the State of Indiana, and to discharge their duties as Representatives; and that they will be carried away by some selfish motives—some peculiar interest, which they have more at heart than the good of the people. Sir, let me say, that "suspicion is the villain's virtue." An honest man is never ready to suspect and impugn the motives of others. It is those who are capable of being tampered with themselves, that are always ready to suspect others of being tampered with.

Before I take up the general argument, I must be permitted to allude to an argument used by the gentleman from Wayne. I cannot tell why it is, that the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) has, upon two or three occasions, and especially to-day, referred to me in a very personal manner. I am sure I did not charge that gentleman, nor any other gentleman, with playing the demagogue upon this floor.

Mr. RARIDEN. Let the gentleman from Delaware state to this House when he said he would not charge it, whether he did not charge it, and that in a most direct manner.

Mr. KILGORE. I was not at that time aware that the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) had taken sides with the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole); but I thought he would, from the fact that he seems to occupy the same position towards the gentleman from Hancock, which South Carolina is said to have occupied in relation to John C. Calhoun, which was, that whenever Mr. Calhoun took snuff, all South Carolina would sneeze. [Laughter.] I spoke, Mr. President, of what demagogues might do; but I did not charge either of the gentlemen with being demagogues, or with being disposed to play the demagogue. But I had no objection whatever, to their making the application of my remarks if they chose to do so; and now I will say this much, that if the cap fits them, they are quite welcome to wear it. [Laughter.] I will be the last man to deny their right to its use.

Another matter to which the gentleman from Wayne has referred, is my want of success. I presume, sir, he means political success; if he does I have only to say, I have been fully as successful as the gentleman from Wayne. I have been defeated once in my life as a candidate for Congress. The gentleman from Wayne has been defeated twice or thrice; other gentlemen have been defeated as well as the gentleman from Wayne, and myself. Some of them, sir, have afterwards succeeded and have not had the mortification of finding the public confidence withdrawn from them forever. Others have been less fortunate, owing, perhaps, in some degree, to the means resorted to, in trying to attain the object of their aspirations. Others, Mr. President, have been enabled to succeed once in their lives, by such means as blasted all their future hopes and subject them to the mortification of encountering continual defeat as a well deserved chastisement for their political sins. Sir, had they not reared their fabric upon a sandy foundation, they could have withstood the storms and tempests of political opposition. The gentleman from Wayne understands me, sir. For myself, Mr. President, let me remark, once for all, I would rather live in an humble cottage built upon a rock, whose foundation I knew to be secure, than in a princely mansion erected on the sand, the foundation of which I should expect to be swept away with the first blast of opposition, especially, sir, if defeat and political disaster had the same effect upon me that it appears to have upon some others, to make me a perfect Ishmaelite, so that I should turn my hand against every man, and thus solicit that every man's hand should be turned against me.

Sir, I would rather live in political obscurity all my life, than have the same feelings which some men manifest when they happen to meet with political defeat and disaster. But sir, this is a matter personal to the gentleman and myself, and this Convention can have no interest whatever in it.

Now, to the subject. The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) says that the section does not embrace plank roads. Now if it does not embrace plank roads what does that prove? It proves that the gentleman from Hancock, who concocted this section, no doubt, upon consultation with the gentleman from Wayne, (for they seem to consult upon every matter brought before this body by either of them,) if it does not embrace plank roads, why is it that it does not? Are not these companies checking the State of Indiana all over? Have they not Presidents and directors? And if they are not to be included, why are the Presidents and Directors of Railroad companies to be included? Why, say they, because they are money-making companies.

Mr. WALPOLE (in his seat). Monopolies. That is the reason.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, we will talk about monopolies by and bye. They are now making money; but a plank road is not a monopoly. Is that the true reason, I will ask the gentlemen from Wayne and Hancock, or is it because there is another reason—that there are chartered companies constructing a plank road along the Cumberland road, which runs through both the counties which these gentlemen represent? Sir, have the chartered plank road companies, that have the privilege of constructing a plank road upon the Cumberland road, this great national highway, been required to open a public thoroughfare alongside of it! No such thing; they have the exclusive privilege of erecting toll-gates upon that road, and are not compelled to open any other for the public convenience. They have the privilege of constructing their plank road upon the county and State roads, that have ever been free and open to the public travel. They are not required to leave a pass open; but they hang their gates upon these roads, and compel every man who passes along to pass over their road, and to contribute to the stockholders of the company. Is it so with a single railroad company in Indiana? No, sir; not one of them is permitted to construct their road upon a public thoroughfare, unless it may sometimes happen to touch it in their course; and they must always leave room amply sufficient for the public travel. Now, let me ask what is the monopoly? The railroad which is constructed upon the ground of the stockholders, purchased and paid for often at an enormous price, or the plank road which is made upon the common highway, which before was free to the use of all, but which is now blocked up from end to end with toll-gates, and every traveler forced, under penalties, to pass through them? We all know, sir, that the railroad companies have usually to purchase every foot of ground they may require, and that they have no exclusive privilege but that of enjoying their own property, in their own way. They cannot interfere with the public travel upon a common highway. Then, sir, there can be no monopoly. They do not compel the traveling public to use their road, whether they choose to or not. They do not compel the trading community to transport their goods, or the farmers their produce, whether they will or not. They leave the matter perfectly optional. They do not either compel the farmers and drovers to use their line, or to stay at home with their stock, in consequence of having deprived them of the usual route. No, sir; they leave the public thoroughfares open. They tell the farmers of the country: "You can go your own way, if you choose; but if you find it to your convenience and interest to employ our means, it is open for you to do so." We impose no necessity upon you; we do not interfere with your usual mode of travel; but we give you this means of conveying your produce to market at such a price, and if it suits your convenience to use our road, it is open to you on these terms."

And yet the gentlemen tell us that these roads are monopolies. How, sir, let me ask, is a road of this kind a monopoly? Does it compel any man to do that which it is not to his interest to do? No, sir; in all cases he does it as a matter of choice. Now, let us compare things a little, and see how much of a monopoly these railroads are. A farmer may load his produce on the cars at the town of Pendleton, if he pleases, or he may bring it in his wagon. Or he may put his hogs on the cars, or drive them along the usual road. He may get upon his horse, or into his buggy, and ride or drive to Indianapolis; or, if he finds it convenient, he may leave them at home and come by the conveyance which we tender him. Is that a monopoly? He can now bring his wheat on the cars for three cents per bushel, whereas, by the other road, it will cost him twelve and a half cents per bushel. He can bring his hogs for twelve and a half cents per head, no difference how large; whereas, to drive them the distance, would cost him at least fifty cents per head, including the shrinkage of each hog. Is that a monopoly? And, Mr. President, whilst we offer these facilities to the farmer, we do not shut up the usual road. No, sir; we leave it open for him to travel his own way, if he pleases. He cannot dispense entirely with his wagons and horses; he must have them to use round his farm; and if he chooses to bring his produce to Indianapolis by that means, we do not prevent him; neither do we make him pay a tax for the privilege of doing so.

And yet, sir, this is one of the great monopolies, which the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) and the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) have denounced in such unmeasured terms.

It is the officers of such corrupt associations the gentlemen are in favor of excluding from a seat in the Legislature. Sir, if this is a monopoly, all I have to say is, the more we have of them, the better it will be for the people of the State of Indiana.

One word, sir, in relation to the power of the Madison Road over other interests. The gentleman from Wayne seems to be very much alarmed, lest the wealth and power of that Road should swallow up every other important public work in the State.

I do not believe, Mr. President, the gentlemen need have any fears that it will swallow any of the rail or plank roads which pass through that gentleman's district; and I am sure he need have no fear of its devouring the Whitewater Canal, in which that gentleman is so deeply interested; I pledge myself that it shall not interfere with him and his rights, at least. But those who are more immediately interested in the Madison Road are here, and they can speak for themselves. As far as my knowledge extends, she has kept within the limits of her charter; and the moment she transcends them, the gentleman from Wayne, being a good lawyer, knows the process by which that charter can be wound up. It was correctly remarked by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) that when we attempt to guard against the monied monopolies, we should guard against the abuse of the powers which we may invest in them by virtue of the act of incorporation. That is unquestionably the proper policy. If you attempt to guard them by restricting the privileges of those who may be connected with the association, where are you to stop? Sir, if you want to guard against the influences of these corporations you cannot guard against them by keeping these Presidents and directors out of the halls of legislation. If they can exercise influence at all, you cannot guard against them by this means. Sir, I do not believe such influences can be exercised; but even if they could, I would ask gentlemen if they would have half as much to fear from the bold and fearless robber who comes before them with the brand upon his forehead, as they would from the ten thousand little, sly, skulking, sneaking, incendiary robbers, who are always acting under false colors and with masks upon their faces. If a robber of the bold kind comes here, all eyes are at once fixed upon him, and they know how to manage him; but shut him out from the halls of legislation and what do you find? You find your members assailed at every point, and before they are aware of it they will be corrupted, bought up, and made to do the bidding of the monied corporations of the country. Such success the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) says has always attended the efforts of the Bank, and I am sure their directors have always been excluded from a seat in the Legislature.

One word further upon the subject, and I am done. The gentleman seems to have lost confidence in the people, and a wonderful influence, he says, is to be brought to bear at home. The great monied monopolies are to control our elections, and show their power at the ballot box. Sir, this is a great compliment to an honest people! The citizens of this country are to be bought up by these monied corporations! They are to place their candidate in the field, who is to come here to the exclusion of every one else, and in order to secure success, they are to go into the market and buy up the whole of the voters! This is truly a great compliment to the people of the State! A great compliment, sir, to suppose that the people of the country can be so corrupted as to forget every other interest save that of corporations, whose bidding they are willing to do for paltry gold! Sir, I have not yet lost confidence in the people of Indiana. I believe that they are above the influence of bribery. I do not believe that any such influence can be brought to bear upon them; and if I were disposed to play the demagogue—and the gentlemen are polite enough to say that they think I only went the ability—I would not want a more successful theme than to talk about these great monopolies. Sir, it is very convenient to make war upon banks, because they have been unpopular. But, sir, I will ask if there are not some of the Directors of the State Bank, now in this Convention? I will ask you whether you have not got the Presidents, or Cashiers, or Secretaries of the banking institutions here? If any of them are here, I venture the prediction that they are "free bank" men. [A VOICE—There are none here.] Well, when the matter comes to the test, the gentlemen will find that they are very numerous here. I know that there will be a diversity of opinion upon this subject; and I know another thing—that the efforts on the part of the gentleman from Hancock and the gentleman from Wayne, sometimes are very singular ones. The gentleman from Wayne is a State Bank man; the gentleman from Hancock is a State Bank man; the gentleman from Owen is a State Bank man. All of these men stand upon this floor as the advocates of this section. I believe, too, that the gentleman from Monroe is a State Bank man.

Mr. FOSTER. To be sure I am.

Mr. KILGORE. Now if influences are to be used they know how to use them; but what is their policy? Why, sir, it is to cripple the strength of the free banking party by declaring that their officers, treasurers and directors, shall not be eligible to a seat on this floor. Sir, it is an insidious attack upon the free bank system, got up with the view of making members on this floor come out as advocates of a State bank. It is to exclude these men from the privilege of participating in the legislation of the country, in order that being driven from that ground they may become State bank men. [Applause.]

But, Mr. President, I have occupied as much time as I intended, and I have spoken more rapidly than I usually do in order that I might consume the less. I have spoken of railroads and compared them with plank roads in regard to the question of monopoly. I have endeavored to show that if there was danger of the one operating mischievously, there was as much in the other, because they are more numerous. Every man has a right to construct a railroad if he has the ability, and to charge tolls upon it, and do just as he pleases with it. And so it is with an incorporated company. They have a right to charge such rates of freight or passage as they may please; but they will undoubtedly fix them at such a rate as will make it the interest of those who want to ship their goods or to transport themselves from one place to another to use that mode of conveyance in preference to any other, and so long as this is done they will be used, and used profitably to the whole country as well as to the stockholders. Mr. President, I have done with this subject, and in conclusion tender my unfeigned thanks to the members of the Convention for their kindness in permitting me to occupy their time and attention as long as I have done.

Mr. SHOUP moved to lay the section and amendment on the table.

On this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered, and were taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Beach, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Mather, May, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—79.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Butler, Chenowith, Coats, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Foster, Garvin, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Logan, Maguire, March, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Ruriden, Schoonover, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Trimble, Walpole, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—47.

So the section was laid upon the table.

ELECTIONS BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is upon ordering the 20th section to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section provides that all elections by the General Assembly shall be by a viva voce vote.

Mr. MILROY moved to amend the section by inserting the word "in," at the commencement of the section, and to translate "viva voce" into English, so as to make the section read—

"In all elections by the General Assembly," &c.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to amend by striking out "viva voce," and inserting the words "living voice."

SEVERAL MEMBERS. That is the amendment we have just rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment is the same as has just been rejected, and is, therefore, out of order.

Mr. McCLELLAND. With all due deference to the Chair, I beg to say that my amendment is different from that offered by the gentleman from Carroll.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the difference to be precisely the same as the distinction between "tweedle dum and tweedle dee"—a distinction without a difference. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALL. I offer the following amendment to the section: Add at the end, "Provided that a plurality of votes shall elect." [Cries of "consent," and "no, no."] I hope this amendment will be adopted, for I am satisfied that it will save a great deal of time to the Legislature. I shall not, however, argue the question, but I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMONSTON. There seems to be a sudden reversion of sentiment on the part of members on this floor. A few days ago, a provision was passed, requiring a large majority, and now it is asked that a plurality may elect.

Mr. HALL withdrew his call for the yeas and nays, and the question being taken on his amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. KILGORE moved to amend by striking out the words "viva voce," and inserting the words "by joint ballot."

The amendment was rejected.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.

The PRESIDENT. The next question is on ordering the following section to be engrossed for a third reading:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, be appointed to any civil office of profit under the State, which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during such term, except such offices as may be filled by elections of the people."

Mr. HOLMAN proposed to amend the section by inserting the words "or elected," after the words "or appointed," and to strike out all after the word "State," in the 109th line, and insert "or to the Senate of the United States," so as to make the section read:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, be appointed or elected to any civil office of profit under the State, "or to the Senate of the United States."

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I very much doubt whether we have authority to fix the qualifications of Senator of the United States. I think that is a matter which is fixed by the Constitution of the United States. I will read the clause of the Constitution, to which I refer:

"No person shall be a Senator who has not attained the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen," &c.

Now, Mr. President, without much reflection upon this subject, it strikes me that this qualification is fixed by the Constitution of the United States, and if we have any authority at all, it is to prohibit the Legislature from electing certain persons. But I doubt whether we have the power of making any other disqualification than that which is already made by the Constitution of the United States. And moreover, even if there were not this Constitutional provision, I do not see why we should adopt this amendment. It is true that gentlemen may seek to influence Senators and Representatives, but it is impossible to make a wise selection, unless they select one in whom the people have confidence. We must select men who have been trained to legislative duties somewhere—either in our State, or in some other State; and I do not see any great objection to electing a member of the Legislature.

Mr. NAVE. I would be perfectly willing to vote for this amendment if it would amount to anything. On yesterday, the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Gregg,) offered a proposition precisely similar to that which has been offered by the gentleman from Dearborn, and this morning he wished to withdraw, or rather to expunge the notice of it from the Journal. Now the truth is that the Constitution of the United States fixes this matter, and declares who shall be eligible to the office of Senator of the U. S. and who shall be competent to fill a seat in the House of Representatives. Now suppose that we, as a Convention, should declare that certain men shall not hold the office, I take it for granted that notwithstanding such declaration, the individual whom we thus prohibited could take his seat in the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States. I think it is not for us to attempt to decide upon the qualifications or eligibility of any individual who may present himself for this office. The amendment, therefore, would amount to nothing; and there is no use in adopting that which is useless, and thereby stultifying ourselves.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and a decision being called for; there were ayes 48, noes 58.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. PRATHER moved the previous question, which was sustained.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

DEFAULTING COLLECTORS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the order of the day is the 25th section, which will be read a second time.

The section was read as follows:

"No person who may hereafter be a collector or holder of public moneys shall be eligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly, or to any office of trust or profit under this State, until he shall have accounted for and paid over, as by law of this State required, all sums for which he may be liable."

Mr. COLFAX moved to strike out the words "a seat in," and insert, in lieu thereof, the words "elected to."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOLFE proposed to amend the section by inserting after the word "moneys" the words "or attorneys at law who shall have received and collected the money of another, and refuses to pay the same over to the proper person, or to his authorized agent, on demand." He hoped this amendment would be adopted. He could see no reason why a public officer, who might hold over a small amount of money, should be denied the eligibility of election any more than an attorney or any other person who held the money of another and refused to pay it over. He did not see why the one class of delinquents should be disfranchised any more than the other. If he could get gentlemen enough to support him, he should call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KELSO proposed to amend the amendment by adding "or any other man who does not pay his debts when due." [Laughter.] He would undertake to say that there was no class of men in the community of the same number as attorneys, and to whose hands the same amount of money was entrusted, who paid it over with as much punctuality as they did. This was a common business matter between the attorney and his client. When a man placed in the hands of an attorney an account to be collected, he did not ask for any security. He got none and he asked for none. The attorney who refused to pay over the money received for his client, stood in the same relation to his client as any other debtor. But the law looking upon the relation subsisting between attorney and client, had provided that if the attorney refused to pay over money thus received, he might be debarred from practising his profession. That was the best security a client could have, and was a great deal better than much of the security that was given in the ordinary transactions of life in which much larger amounts were involved. And if the lawyer, for this reason, was to be rendered ineligible, why not also render ordinary debtors ineligible? He asked nothing for the attorneys of the State of Indiana which he was not perfectly willing to give to every other class of men, but he did not want to have anything thrown up there as a slander upon the profession.

On motion of Mr. SHERROD, the amendment and the amendment to the amendment were laid upon the table.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

OFFICERS OF BANKS, ETC.

Mr. KELSO offered the following additional section:

"No president, cashier, director, or other officer of any bank, banking, or other incorporated monied institution of this State authorized or empowered by law to issue bills, notes, deal in bullion, coin, bills of exchange, or promissory notes, shall be eligible to be elected to the General Assembly during the time he holds such office, place, or situation, or acts as such officer, or during the lapse of three months after he has ceased to hold such office, place, or station."

Mr. EDMONSTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Switzerland whether it would not be better to withhold that section until we finish the article.

Mr. KELSO. I would be very willing to do so, but I understand that after the last section of the article is engrossed, it will then be out of order to move an additional section, the article being finished.

Mr. WALPOLE hoped the gentleman from Switzerland would strike out that part of the section which related to time—the three months.

Mr. MATHER moved to lay the section on the table.

Mr. WALPOLE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Frisbie, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Mather, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Sherrod, Shoup, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wiley, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—63.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Butler, Chandler, Chenowith, Coats, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Maguire, March, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—63.

So the section was not laid upon the table.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is on adopting the additional section offered by the gentleman from Switzerland.

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, were taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Coats, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Logan, Maguire, March, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—67.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beach, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Mather, May, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Sherrod, Shoup, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Wiley, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—62.

So the section was adopted.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading.

MR. KELSO asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Butler, Chandler, Chenowith, Coats, Cole, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of P., Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Logan, Maguire, March, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gib., Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—66.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beach, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Mather, May, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Sherrod, Shoup, Spann, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Wiley, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—62.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SALE OF REAL AND PERSONAL ESTATE ON EXECUTION.

MR. PEPPER of Ohio. I offer the following as an additional section to the article:

"No law shall be passed subjecting real estate to sale under execution for less than two-thirds of its appraised value, nor personal property for less than one-half of its appraised value."

This is a section which proposes that by a Constitutional provision we shall forbid the sale of real property under execution for less than two-thirds of its appraised value, and personal property for less than one-half of its appraised value. I shall not detain the Convention with any lengthened remarks upon the subject, but I desire to have an expression of the opinion of this body in regard to this matter. To me it seems to be a matter of some importance that we should have a settled rule in regard to the sale of real estate under execution—a rule that would work equal justice to all parties. By our present laws real property cannot be sold for less than its full appraised value. This provision may be continued for a year or two longer, or it may be changed at any time. I think that a permanent rule would be desirable, and for the purpose of testing the question I hope the Convention will accommodate me with the yeas and nays on the adoption of this section.

Mr. MATHER. Would it not be in order to refer that matter to the Legislature?

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. Certainly; you can move to refer it wherever you please. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATHER. I move to lay the section on the table.

Mr. PEPPER demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—84.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Berry, Carr, Chapman, Chenoweth, Cole, Cookerly, Duan of Perry, Elliott, Gibson, Gregg, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Holman, Jones, Kelso, March, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Sherrod, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Tannehill, Wallace, Walpole, and Wiley—40.

So the section was laid upon the table.

PUBLICATION OF THE LAWS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day is the twenty-seventh section, and the question is, Shall it be engrossed for a third reading?

The section was read, as follows:

"No law of the General Assembly, of a public nature, shall take effect until the same shall be published in prints and circulated in the several counties of the State by authority, except in cases of emergency."

Mr. SHOUP moved to strike out the words

"in prints." He thought it was desirable that the Legislature should determine in what mode the laws should be published.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to strike out the words "of a public nature."

The amendment was adopted by consent.

Mr. WOLFE. I move to strike out the section, and insert the following:

"No law of the General Assembly shall take effect in the State until the same shall be published in print and recorded in the Clerk's office, duly certified, except in cases of emergency."

The motion to strike out the section was laid upon the table.

Mr. NEWMAN proposed to amend the section, by adding at the end the following words: "Which emergency shall be declared in the preamble, or in the body of the law."

Mr. N. stated his reasons for offering this amendment, but his remarks were wholly inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said he was decidedly in favor of the amendment.

The amendment was adopted by consent, and the section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICES VESTED IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

Mr. BORDEN offered the following, as an additional section:

"No member of either branch of the General Assembly, during the time for which he may be elected, shall be eligible to any office the appointment of which is vested in the General Assembly."

Mr. B. said that his object in offering the amendment was simply this: if this section, or a similar one, was not inserted, a member of either branch of the General Assembly could be elected State Trustee or State Agent. The amendment had nothing to do with the Governor or the appointment of a United States Senator. It was simply a provision of the old Constitution.

The question being taken, the amendment was adopted.

The section was then engrossed for a third reading.

The provisions of section twenty-nine having been previously reported by the committee on finance and taxation, and adopted by the Convention,

On motion of Mr. KELSO, this section was laid upon the table.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day is the following section, on its second reading:

"The members of the General Assembly shall receive for their services a compensation to be fixed by law, and paid out of the public treasury; but no increase of compensation shall take effect during the session at which such increase may be made."

Mr. READ of Clark moved to amend the section, by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, That after the first fifty days from the commencement of the session, the compensation for the services of each member shall not exceed the sum of one dollar and fifty cents per day for the remainder of the session. This proviso shall not apply to the first Legislature which is to convene after the adoption of this Constitution."

Mr. R. said that unless the Convention adopted a provision of this kind, the people would lose all the benefit that was expected to accrue from having biennial instead of annual sessions. He was satisfied, from his own experience, that this provision was highly necessary; and he might say, that he stood there as a living witness that the Legislature could do more work in fifty days than they could do in one hundred. [Laughter.] Gentlemen might laugh as they pleased, but this was the truth notwithstanding they laughed at it. Before the adoption of the six weeks rule the Legislature of the State used to sit from ten to eleven weeks, but a number of years ago the six weeks rule was adopted, and it has been adhered to; and no member of the Legislature, since that time, had dared to move for its repeal, except, perhaps, in one or two instances. This provision he regarded as one of the radical constitutional reforms of the day, at least so far as the matter had come under his purview, and he would again repeat that he stood there a living witness that a provision of the kind was imperatively required.

If the Convention did not adopt it, they might depend upon it that under the change of system from annual to biennial sessions, those sessions would be protracted for three or four months. One great object of the Convention being called was to secure economy in this respect, and he felt fully convinced that if the pay was reduced after a reasonable time for performing the business of legislation, this economy would be effected. This was a reform which the people loudly called for, and he should demand the yeas and nays, in order—when it was found that the legislative sessions were protracted to four or five months—to show who had seconded him in this motion.

Mr. KELSO. I am quite willing to assist the gentleman from Clark in obtaining an opportunity of recording his vote on this question; but I cannot refrain from saying at the same time, that if that gentleman is here, as a living witness, that a Legislature can do as much in fifty days as they can do in one hundred, he ought to live forever, and be embalmed when he is dead, [great laughter.] for he is the first and the last man that has ever made such a wonderful discovery. Now, sir, we have very nearly destroyed legislation in Indiana already. There is a measure or two behind yet, and when they come in, let us see in what position we will be placed. Biennial sessions are agreed upon; that strikes out at once a hundred per cent. of your legislation; and if we adopt it, we shall take away three-fourths of all the balance that we have legislated about for the last ten years. Then, sir, if you adopt the amendment which has just been proposed by the gentleman from Clark, that will just destroy it all. Then, sir, if you carry it a little further and give the Governor the right to control any majority under two-thirds, that will make it about twenty per cent. better than no legislation at all. The Indian squaw said that enough was enough, of every thing except whiskey. Now I think we are not only getting enough here, but of many things, decidedly too much. Sir, as I understand it, if the representatives chosen by the people, under the new Constitution, should squander away their time unnecessarily, and not attend to the business of the people, all that is necessary in such a case is to have an expression of the popular voice upon the subject; and in my experience during the last fifteen or sixteen years, I have ever found the legislative body obedient to the will of the people. We know that although there is no such provision in the old Constitution, in the year 1842, the six weeks rule was adopted; and I must say, that ever since then the legislation of Indiana has been like the young wolf, all the time getting one year older, and two years worse.

A MEMBER. What! the gentleman from Sullivan? (Mr. Wolfe.) [Great laughter.]

Mr. KELSO (laughing). I had no allusion to the gentleman from Sullivan. Sir, such a provision in the Constitution makes it perpetual. It cannot be remedied except by another Convention. Whereas, if we leave it to the Legislature, and the evil contemplated by the gentleman from Clark, should fall upon the people, I have no doubt that in three or four, or ten years hence they will be able to find as honest a Legislature as they found in the year 1842, and they will make a provision to prevent future Legislatures from overstepping their time. If the evil should fall upon the people, they have the power in their own hands, and can correct it. Certainly it is better to leave it as it is. If the people do not complain, we do not need to be so particularly careful of their rights, as finally to destroy them. Sir, there is such a thing as "killing people by kindness," and it appears to me that there are some gentlemen on this floor, who are so inflamed with a love of the people, as to be apt in the madness of that ardent passion, to destroy the peoples best interests. This is a matter which I contend, can safely be left to the Legislature and the people themselves.

Mr. WATTS. I am here a "living witness with" my friend from Clarke [a laugh]. I served with him in the Legislature as far back as the year 1827 and I must say that I am sorry to hear him rise in his place here and inflict such a slander upon the State of Indiana. I had always thought that it was honorable to be a member of the Legislature, and that men elected to fill such an office were not likely to come here and fool away their time at the expense of the people for the mere sake of the per diem allowance. Sir, I must say that in all my experience I do not think that I ever saw a set of men who would hold out their sessions for the small pittance of three dollars a day. I think this a matter which is purely legislative, and one which should be fixed by the people themselves. If the Legislature should fix the amount too high the people can soon correct the evil. I can say in reference to the gentleman from Clarke, that I have always found him a hard working industrious member of the Legislature.

Mr. BERRY. I have an amendment to the amendment which I wish to offer. With the permission of the Convention, I will read it. Add at the end of the proviso, in capital letters, the word "BUNCOMBE." [Cries of "consent, consent, consent," laughter and applause.]

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Franklin. Are the Convention ready for the question?

[Shouts of "aye, aye."]

The question being taken on the addition of the word "Buncome," it was carried by acclamation.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. READ called for the yeas and nays.

They were ordered, and taken, and there were—yeas 66, nays 48—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Garvin, Graham of Warwick, Harbolt, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pep-per of Crawford, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Shoup, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, and Mr. President—66.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Conduit, Dobson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hendricks, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Prather, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tannehill, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—48.

So the amendment was rejected.

Pending the question on the engrossment of the section—

On motion,

The Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, DEC. 19, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRESSY.

The journal of yesterday was read, and approved.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the Governor, Auditor, and Treasurer of State, in relation to procuring a room for the Convention.

The above named officers, in their communication, state in effect as follows: That the Masonic Hall is the building that is best calculated for the accommodation of the Convention, but that the agent of the stockholders refuses to let the Hall for the price which they are authorized to give; that he proposes, however, to fit up the Hall for the use of the Convention, provided they agree to pay twelve dollars a day for it so long as they occupy it, and that if the Convention should conclude to give that price, the room will be fitted up by the twenty-seventh instant. A majority of the officers, however, express the opinion that an arrangement can be made with the Legislature so that the Convention may remain in this Hall without desks.

The communication having been read,

The PRESIDENT. What disposition will the Convention make of this communication?

Mr. BORDEN. As it is important that some decision should be made in regard to this matter, I move that the rules be suspended, for the purpose of considering it now.

The PRESIDENT. It does not require a suspension of the rules.

Mr. TANNEHILL. It appears to me that if we take action upon this communication and comply with the proposal contained in it, it will be rather premature, for we do not know that the Legislature will accede to it.

Mr. MOORE moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this Convention will remain in this Hall."

Mr. GIBSON moved to amend the resolution, by adding "and that we keep the desks."

The question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Clark, and it was not agreed to.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. GREGG proposed a substitute for the resolution, providing that the Governor, Treasurer, and Auditor, contract for the Masonic Hall, and that it be fitted up by the twenty-fifth instant, and that the Convention meet in that building on the twenty-fourth instant and continue its sessions until it gets through with its labors.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Owen accept the substitute?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir.

Mr. GREGG. I move my proposition, then, as an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman.

The PRESIDENT. The question must be taken in the order in which the resolutions are offered.

Mr. STEVENSON. If it be in order, I would like to offer such a resolution as this:

"Resolved, That the Convention accept the proposition of the Governor, Auditor, and Treasurer, and that the necessary preparations be made by those officers for the accommodation of the Legislature."

If they will give us this room, without the desks, I shall be satisfied.

The question being on the resolution of the gentleman from Owen,

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to make this remark: I am satisfied myself that a majority of this body do not design or intend to sit here, but there is another portion of the members of the body who do desire to remain here, and there is another, and a larger portion, who desire to adjourn. These last will vote for remaining here, knowing that if that proposition prevail they will ultimately be able to carry the motion for adjourning over until the Legislature finish their session.

Mr. GREGG. Do I understand that my amendment is not in order?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remark to the gentleman from Jefferson, that he offered his resolution as a substitute for the original resolution, and the gentleman from Owen having refused to accept it as a substitute for his own, is a matter of course the question must be first put upon the resolution of the gentleman from Owen.

Mr. GREGG. But I propose to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert my resolution as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT. That motion cannot be entertained. The resolutions are distinct and separate.

Mr. KELSO. My opinion is, and the Convention may take it for what it is worth, that there are more now in favor of remaining where we are and not adjourning over, than there are in favor of taking the Masonic Hall at the price at which it is offered. I, for one, am for remaining here. When the Legislature meets, if we cannot do better, rather than have any difficulty I shall be for going somewhere else. But we have got accustomed to this place, and can get along very well if we are permitted to remain. I am opposed to incurring the expense of hiring the Masonic Hall. That is one ground of my opposition to it; and another is, that if we are to be as near to the Legislature as that, we might as well be in the same building. I shall vote in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Owen.

Mr. FOSTER. I am decidedly in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson. The Governor, Auditor, and Treasurer, have intimated that they can make arrangements for the Legislature. I would like to know if the Legislature ever authorized these officers to make arrangements for them? It appears to me that they are assuming an authority that does not belong to them. The House of Representatives certainly have more right to this Hall than we have. We have the power to go where we please. I am aware that the opinion of the Governor and of some members on this floor is, that we ought to adjourn until after the Legislature shall have finished its session. I differ with them entirely. I have been here at my post since the commencement, and I want to remain here until we finish our labors. It was anticipated by the Legislature that the Convention would have got through by this time, but the probability is that we shall be in session for six weeks or two months longer.

We are told that we may remain in this Hall, but the Representatives of the people may not agree to it. Now what is twelve dollars a day in comparison with what we are spending daily? It is a mere drop in the bucket. I want to go to a place where we can proceed with our deliberations undisturbed. My opinion is, that if we remain here there will be so much turmoil and confusion that little or no business will be transacted. I hope the resolution of the gentleman from Jefferson will be adopted.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I hope this question will be settled without any manifestation of feeling. It is becoming somewhat a grave question, although it should not assume that character. We have spent some days on the subject of procuring a suitable Hall for the Convention. I am not in favor of either of the propositions. I should be very much in favor of having a contract made for the occupation of the Masonic Hall by the Convention, but I think the terms are too high, and I am not willing to risk a controversy with the approaching General Assembly. It may be that they will acquiesce in the proposition made by the executive officers, but I am also inclined to believe that many of them will be dissatisfied. This is the place provided for the accommodation of the Legislature, and I suppose that neither the executive officers nor this Convention have any proper authority to prevent them from occupying this Hall. I have no doubt, however, that the executive officers have taken every reasonable pains to procure a room for us, and I think we should properly appreciate the exertions they have made. I think we should take some steps to procure a suitable place for ourselves, leaving to the Legislature, to whom it properly belongs, the use of this Hall.

Mr. FOLEY. I am entirely in favor of acting upon the recommendation of the executive officers, and of remaining here. The gentleman over the way, (Mr. Foster) thinks that twelve dollars a day is a trifle not worth considering.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a trifle in comparison with the other expenses of this body.

Mr. FOLEY. If our expenses are great then it appears to me we ought not to add to them. This is the place where we ought to stay until our labors are completed.

Mr. KILGORE said, he should not detain the Convention with a speech upon this occasion. He had merely to say that upon the score of economy, if for no other consideration, the Convention ought to have a room fitted up for them at once. Gentlemen seemed to be terrified at the idea of paying twelve dollars a day for the rent of a room. What would it amount to? So far as dollars and cents were concerned it would be a mere trifle, compared with the expense which the State would have to incur, if the Convention should be detained for some days after the Legislature assembled in procuring a suitable building for their accommodation. He felt quite satisfied that neither branch of the Legislature would consent to occupy the Supreme Court room. They would never consent to be crowded within so small a space. What would be the result? Perhaps a week would be consumed in hunting up, and furnishing a room for the Convention, in order that the House of Representatives might get possession of their own Hall; and this at an expense of six hundred dollars a day. Six hundred dollars would pay the rent of the Masonic Hall for fifty days. The value of the time that had been already consumed upon this subject, was equal to what would be required to pay the expense of any suitable room that might be procured. The Masonic Hall was usually rented for twenty dollars a night. He thought, therefore, it was idle to talk about twelve dollars a day being an extravagant price for the use of that Hall, by the Convention. He hoped, therefore, that the question would be decided without further discussion. Whatever was done should be done quickly.

Mr. GREGG. I have no desire to protract debate upon this subject, but I beg leave to say that I am as much opposed to our incurring unnecessary expense, as the gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Foley), or the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso) can possibly be. I admit, sir, that it is very desirable to have an eye to economy in small matters as well as great—but then we should be careful that we do not waste at the bung, while we are endeavoring to save at the spigget. We have heretofore spent two full days in discussing this subject, which is equal to twelve hundred dollars; and now we bid fair to spend another half day, which will swell the amount to fifteen hundred, a sum more than sufficient to pay the rent of the Masonic Hall for the next three months, should we continue in session so long, together with the expense of all door-keepers, firewood, &c.; I think, therefore, it is high time we should bring this matter to a close.

Now, I am not one of those who would stifle debate upon important questions where principle was involved. Indeed, I regard it as poor economy to save our time and the people's money at the sacrifice of principle. But upon mere matters of expediency, such as this, where the only question involved is whether we shall pay one hundred or three hundred dollars a month, rent for a suitable place for our deliberations, it is the extreme of folly to waste time in debating it.

I do not know, Mr. President, that I can better illustrate the great folly of such discussions, than by relating an anecdote which was once told me by a gentleman who was a member of the Legislature when the incident occurred. I will not mention names, for that might be considered invidious. Suffice it to say, that it was some fifteen years ago, about this time of the year, and the Legislature in session in this house. A member of this body, entertaining a proper regard for the health and comfort of himself and colleagues, introduced a resolution, directing the door-keeper to procure a thermometer to hang up in this Hall, the better to enable the firemen to graduate the temperature of the atmosphere here. Now, one would naturally suppose that such a proposition as this, would have been adopted at once without opposition. But such was not the case, for the question was gravely debated for a day or two—thus spending some three hundred dollars of the people's money in talking about the propriety of purchasing that little instrument hanging there, which cost, at the outside, about one dollar and fifty cents. And one member, it is said, absolutely opposed the proposition on the ground that he did not believe there were ten members in the House who knew how to wind the d—d thing up, or set it right if it should get out of order, and that it would become necessary to hire an extra hand to keep it properly regulated. [Much Laughter.]

Mr. OWEN from his seat. That is a fact, for I was a member of the Legislature when it occurred.

Mr. GREGG. And now, Mr. President, that we may not fall into the same absurdity in regard to this matter, I will call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson.

Mr. KELSO demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 62, nays 67—as follows:

AYES.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nava, Newman, Niles, Owen, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Smith of Ripley, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Watts, Wiley, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—62.

NOES.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Chenoweth, Coats, Condit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Gordon, Harbott, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Jones, Kelso, Logan, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Notsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Ruchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, and Zenor—67.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then being on the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Owen.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 62, nays 78;—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Berry, Bicknell, Carter, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Colfax, Condit, Crumbacker, Dobson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Harbott, Hardin, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Kelso, Kinley, March, Mather, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Notsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Ruchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Trimble, and Walpole.—72.

NOES.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, May, Mooney, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President.—78.

So the resolution was not adopted.

Mr. WATTS offered a resolution to the effect that the Convention accept the Masonic Hall, upon the proposed terms, deducting the expense from the per diem of members.

Mr. PETTIT. I move to amend the resolution by adding, "and that we will take double our present pay." [A laugh.]

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will send up his amendment in writing.

Mr. PETTIT. Oh, I don't know that it would pay me for the trouble.

Mr. KELSO. I move to amend by adding the word Buncombe.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will send up his "Buncombe" in writing. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. OWEN. If the proposition of the gentleman from Dearborn should be adopted, the amount to be deducted from the per diem of each member would be just eight cents. Now, sir, I am of opinion that there is scarcely a man here who would be unwilling to pay eight cents a day in order to avoid a collision with the Legislature, in order to be provided with a convenient and comfortable place for holding the sittings of the Convention. ["Consent."] Since this matter came up, I have heard it said—not to me, individually, but it was said to others who repeated it to me, and in such away that I have no doubt of its truth—that more than one member of the Legislature, who has been in this city since this matter has been discussed, have declared their belief that a difficulty will arise if the Convention undertake to retain possession of the Hall. Now, without talking about the abstract right, it is, in my estimation, a matter of importance that we should avoid coming in conflict with the Legislature; as we shall inevitably do, if they find themselves inconveniently situated, in consequence of our remaining here, and if this should be the case, our business would be delayed for three or four days at the least, whilst our expenses would continue to be six hundred dollars every day.

Mr. COOKERLY. I am decidedly in favor of the Convention going to the Masonic Hall.

A MEMBER. "You voted the other way."

Mr. COOKERLY. Certainly I did; and if the same vote were to be taken again, under the same circumstances, I would vote as I did then. I wanted to give my reasons at the time I voted, and was prevented by the previous question. The gentleman from Jefferson, after making a speech, moved the previous question. I will vote for no man's proposition who does that. Gentlemen talk about expense. There is more expense incurred by wasting time in debate than there would be if we were to hire the Masonic Hall for six months. I move, sir, to re-consider the vote by which the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson was rejected.

Mr. DOBSON. I will state to the Convention, and I hope there will be an end to this matter, for I really think we are consuming too much time about it, that I shall vote for the re-consideration in order that the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson may be adopted, for I believe it is what we must ultimately do or we shall spend twice the amount that the Hall will cost, for no useful purpose whatever.

Mr. KELSO. I want to say a single word in reference to this matter. [cries of "question," "question."] Gentlemen may rest assured that I shall not be put down. They may cry "question" as long as they please. Gentlemen talk a great deal about economy, and yet they seem to imagine that they can justify themselves in adding three hundred and sixty dollars a month to our expenses, and that for house rent alone, in addition to which we shall have to pay for the removal of fuel and stationery; and there are various other contingencies that will swell the aggregate amount. I will undertake to say, that when the whole is summed up, we shall have a very considerable increase in our expenditures. It is said that if the expense be borne by the members of the Convention, it will be but a trifle to be paid by each. But do gentlemen reflect that they are proposing to pay for the use of this room, in the Masonic Hall, sixteen per cent on the whole cost of the building. And, sir, I undertake to say that our pay is sufficiently meagre already; it is quite low enough without being reduced for the purpose of paying the rent of a room. The truth of the matter is, this whole cry about saving of expense, is for Buncombe. Let us examine it for a moment. Fifteen minutes are allowed each member for the purpose of making a speech. Every speech, of fifteen minutes, costs the State thirty dollars. How many such have been made upon this question? And how many fifteen minute speeches, that might well be spared, have been made upon other questions? If gentlemen are so anxious to save expense, why not select ten or twelve of the most experienced men of the Convention, and let them go out into a committee room and prepare a constitution; and, in the mean time, the balance of us suspend our labors. Would not this be a great saving of expense?

Well, if the Convention are determined to go to Masonic Hall, let them go—all I ask is an opportunity to record my vote.

Mr. WATTS. I wish to say a single word in reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Switzerland. If he is so anxious to have "Buncombe" added to the proposition that I have offered, I am willing that there shall be a full length likeness of himself attached to it.

Mr. KELSO. If that is done, there will be a man of more talent than the mover of the proposition represented.

Mr. PETTIT. The amendment which I proposed in a jocular mood, a little while ago, was moved without any intention that it should be entertained, or a vote taken upon it. But, sir, one word in regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Dearborn. For one, I am in favor of going to the Masonic Hall, although I have no special predilection for that Hall, in preference to any other—I have no special love or hatred for the members of that institution. I am not a Mason myself, nor a member of any secret society. But I believe that if we go there, we shall be accommodated, and the business that we have to do will progress without interruption. In regard to the proposition that the expense shall be borne by the Delegates in this Convention, I am opposed to it. There may be men who are able to come here and make a Constitution, or legislate for the people of Indiana, without pay. It may suit the gentleman from Posey to do so. He may be abundantly able and willing to pay his own expenses. But I am neither the one nor the other. I am neither able, nor am I willing, to come here or elsewhere, to legislate for nothing and pay my own expenses. I do not know how it is with other gentlemen on this floor. I have heard it asserted, and I doubt not it is true, that there are abundance of men who go to the British Parliament, who would willingly pay thousands of pounds a year for a seat in Parliament, instead of asking pay for their services. There are, no doubt, plenty of such men in this country, who would do our National and State Legislation for nothing, and be glad of the chance. Sir, in the British Parliament they legislate benefits and advantages to themselves, and they may do so here. But of all the miserable—I will not say demagogueism, that is a term that is so indiscriminately used, that it has almost lost all signification—but of all miserable pretences, that is the worst which cries down the salaries of public officers—which clamors for a reduction of the compensation paid for the services of public officers. Sir, if you would have good and efficient service, you must expect to pay a liberal salary. He who would persuade you of his willingness to serve the public for nothing, is a man who has sinister views—a man who would sacrifice the public, who would rob the treasury. He who proposes to accept a seat in the Legislature without compensation, would not hesitate to take a bribe. The Bank Director, who would take a seat in the Legislature for nothing, would give to an endorser, twenty-five thousand dollars of the Madison bank funds. Sir, he who proposes to serve the public for nothing, has a design to carry out, and he will accomplish it, if in his power, without being particular as to the means to be employed in accomplishing it.

Mr. President, I hope this vote will be reconsidered, and that we shall leave this Hall, and give the Legislature an opportunity to sit in their accustomed Hall.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I have been, I think, a very silent member for a long while. [A laugh.] And to-day I intended to vote for this proposition without saying a word. ["Consent."] And I should not have said a word but for some remarks that have been made. I promise the Convention, however, as I perceive they are in good humor, that my remarks shall always be brief, and that I shall speak at very "short intervals." [Renewed laughter.] I wish, on this occasion, merely to say, that I have voted for going to the Masonic Hall, and I did so, as I explained on a former occasion, because I thought it would be a great imposition on the Legislature, if we were to stay here. I think so now. And I think that by removing, we shall effect a great saving, both of time and money; because our labors will not be retarded, as they would be if we remain here. I am willing to submit to the exaction of exorbitant rent, rather than incur still greater evil.

Mr. RITCHEY. I voted against going to the Masonic Hall, and I do not wish to see that vote reconsidered. Gentlemen assume that we are necessarily to involve ourselves in a collision with the General Assembly. For myself, I believe there is no danger of any such thing. While at home, a few days since, our Representative was enquiring what arrangements were to be made in reference to this subject, and I stated to him I had understood that the report which has been made this morning by the executive officers, would be made. He expressed his approbation and pleasure. He said he would rather sit in the Senate Chamber than in this Hall. I believe, sir, that if you leave the matter to the State officers, it can be satisfactorily arranged. Sir, we are incurring expense enough already, and there have been complaints enough on that subject. I hope the vote will not be reconsidered.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope, sir, that the motion to reconsider will prevail, and I believe that it will, for I am inclined to think, that since that vote was taken, some gentlemen have recovered their senses. Now, sir, it is notorious, that some gentlemen voted against going to the Masonic Hall, with the view of adjourning until February, knowing that if the Convention removed to the Masonic Hall, where we shall find ourselves comfortably situated, the motion to adjourn over will fail. I am determined to stick here, and if possible, to keep the Convention here at their work, so long as there is a shot in the locker.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I am satisfied that the minds of members are made up, and I therefore again call the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being—Shall the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson was rejected, be reconsidered?

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 75, nays 54—as follows:

AYES.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Sims, Smith of Ripley, Thomas, Thornton, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—75.

NOES.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Bowers, Brookbank, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Coats, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Harbolt, Helmer, Hitt, Hogan, Kelso, Logan, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Moore, Morris of Washington, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, and Zenor—54.

So the vote was re-considered.

The question recurred on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson, viz.:

"That the Governor and Auditor contract for the use of the Masonic Hall, &c.," and being taken,

It was, without a division, decided in the affirmative.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution as amended,

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, were—71 yeas, 57 nays—as follows:

AYES.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Sims, Smith of Ripley, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—71.

NOES.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Bowers, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Coats, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Kelso, Logan, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—57.

So the resolution as amended was adopted.

DIVISION OF COUNTIES.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the committee on the legislative department, reported back the original section in relation to Senatorial and Representative districts, to be composed of contiguous counties—without amendment.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. COLFAX rose and remarked, that he desired to draw the attention of the Convention to one fact which, in the hurry of concurring in the committee's report, had doubtless been overlooked by the members generally. The Convention before re-committing the section, had added to it a provision that counties with two-thirds of a Representative ratio should be entitled to a Representative. This the committee had taken the responsibility of striking out entirely, after the Convention had placed it in the section. Besides this, a motion which he had offered to authorize the Legislature to make single districts, was still pending, when the section with that amendment, had been re-committed. A motion to lay that amendment on the table had failed, by nine majority, but the committee had also thrown it out, and reported in its stead the original prohibition, absolutely prohibiting single districts. These facts had doubtless escaped the attention of many members, and it seemed to him as if the vote should be re-considered, and an opportunity offered to concur with amendments. He had himself voted in the negative against concurring, and could not therefore move to reconsider, but he hoped that some gentleman who had voted in the majority would make such a motion.

Mr. BORDEN, having voted in the affirmative, moved to re-consider the vote by which the Convention concurred in the report, which motion prevailed.

Mr. COLFAX then moved to concur in the report of the committee, with an amendment, "striking out the proviso which prohibits counties from being divided for representative purposes, and inserting a proviso, that counties with a population equal to two-thirds of a representative ratio, shall be entitled to a Representative; and provided further, that the Legislature may, by a general law, provide for the election of Representatives by single districts, in counties entitled to more than one Representative."

Mr. BERRY called for a division of the question; and the question was taken on concurring in the report of the committee—cutting off Mr. Colfax's amendment—and decided in the affirmative, ayes 67, noes 59.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is: Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

On this question, the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 69, nays 58:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gregg, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, and Zenor—69.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Chandler, Chenowith, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Harbolt, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Lockhart, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Trimble, Walpole, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—58.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Pepper of Crawford said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I would inquire if it is now in order to introduce a resolution pursuant to the notice given on yesterday, relative to changing the fourteenth rule?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. Well, sir, I offer for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the fourteenth standing rule be so amended that it shall require thirty members to call the ayes and noes on every question, except on its final passage

Sir, I offer this resolution not for Buncombe, I am influenced by no such motives; but for the sole purpose of saving time which is uselessly wasted in calling the ayes and noes on every trifling question that may arise.

The Convention is in session but five hours a day, and for the last two weeks fully one-fifth of the time has been consumed in calling the ayes and noes. I hesitate not to say that if this resolution be adopted, it will hasten our labors and shorten the session very materially.

We have now been in session more than ten weeks, and judging from the amount of unfinished business on hand, the first of March will find us here, unless we establish some rule that will bring us to act directly upon questions that should legitimately claim our attention, and cease to bestow so much time on those questions that do not belong to constitutional reform. Leave all questions that are legislative in their character—all untried Utopian experiments, to the Legislature, then if they work badly, they can be repealed; but place them in the Constitution, there they must stay as long as the fundamental law remains unchanged.

I doubt not it is the sincere desire of delegates to bring the labors of the Convention to as speedy a close as will be consistent with the public interest; pass this resolution, and we shall have made one step, at least, towards consummating that desirable end.

Mr. KELSO hoped that the Convention were not disposed to make any further restrictions upon the rights of members than now existed. The demand for the previous question, which had become so frequent, he thought would be sufficient. This doctrine of certain members entering a special protest against the action of the whole Convention, would, if carried out, encumber the Journal, and waste more time than would be gained by it.

While up, he would remark that he thought the call for the previous question was a restriction too often imposed upon the Convention. The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Gregg) had that morning, after making a speech upon the subject of going to Masonic Hall, moved the previous question, thus preventing gentlemen from having an opportunity of expressing their sentiments upon the question. He did not wish to increase the restrictions already imposed upon them.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said that he had hitherto almost always agreed with his friend from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) in regard to the different subjects that came up for consideration, for the reason that he was almost always right. But he was compelled to differ with him upon this question. It was very obvious that, if, out of one hundred and fifty men, ten or twenty members would not rise to second a call for the yeas and nays, that the taking of them was clearly against the general sense of the Convention. The way in which they were filling up the journal now would render it one of the most extraordinary and enormous journals that ever emanated from a deliberative body. He considered that these propositions, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered so frequently, should have been considered in committee of the whole, and then the journal would not have been encumbered with yeas and nays, or the time of the Convention have been wasted in taking them. He thought, at any rate, that if the proposition urged upon the committee on rules at the commencement of the session of the Convention, to require one-third of the members to demand the yeas and nays, had been adopted, they would have been advanced two weeks further in their business; and he ventured to say, if the proposition of the gentleman from Crawford (Mr. Pepper) was adopted, it would shorten their sittings, even yet, something like two weeks.

Mr. GREGG said he desired to say one word by way of explanation. He regretted exceedingly that his call of the previous question that morning should have so much disturbed the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso). The Convention was well aware that he (Mr. G.) was not in the habit of resorting to that question to curtail debate. Indeed, it was the first time in his life that he ever called the previous question, in this or any other deliberative body. Nor had he been troublesome in the way of speaking, not having made a speech of any length upon that floor for the last three weeks, nor did he think he should for the next three weeks to come. He deeply regretted that the gentleman from Switzerland should have taken his motion unkindly, for he was the last man in that body that he would desire to cut off from the privilege of debate, as he had a standing bet that he (Mr. Kelso) would beat the Kentuckian alluded to by him early in the session, as having made one hundred and ninety-nine speeches in the Kentucky Convention. From present indications, he had no fears that he shall lose the wager, and hoped the gentleman would not be restrained.

Mr. KELSO would simply state, in reply to the explanation of the gentleman from Jefferson, that he (Mr. K.) would corroborate his (Mr. G.'s) statement, that he had not occupied the attention of the Convention during the last three weeks, for the very good reason that he had been present participating in its deliberations but a small portion of that time; and perhaps the notice he had given, that he would not trouble the Convention again for some three weeks to come, was merely a polite intimation that he was going to be absent during that period. He had only to say that he (Mr. K.) should speak whenever, to discharge the duties he owed his constituents, he felt it to be his duty to speak.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to amend the resolution by striking out the word "thirty" and inserting the word "twenty."

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay the amendment to the amendment upon the table.

Upon this motion, the yeas and nays were called for, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 48, nays 73:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bidle, Butler, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Fisher, Gordon, Hamilton, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Holman, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Logan, March, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Smiley, Steele, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—48.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Beach, Beeson, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Helm, Hendricks, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Jones, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Wiley, Zenor, and Mr. President—73.

So the amendment to the amendment was not laid upon the table.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Upon this question a division was asked for, and by ayes 47, noes 48, it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment and the amendment to the amendment were not laid upon the table.

Mr. WALPOLE said that he had taken particular notice of the vote to lay these propositions upon the table, and he had observed that those who voted for it were the speaking men of the Convention, such as Mr. Owen, Mr. Pettit, Mr. Niles, Mr. Smith of Ripley, and others. These gentlemen had voted against laying these propositions upon the table, because they knew, whether their votes were registered or not, that they could, through the medium of their published speeches—at an expense of some twenty or thirty thousand dollars to the State—inform their constituents of the positions they occupied upon the different questions up for consideration. There were some seventy or eighty members who never addressed the Convention; and it was now proposed to deny them the privilege of recording their votes upon important questions, unless they took part in the various debates, which was but seldom the case. He desired, as far as practicable, to make this body a responsible body, and this could not be done if they were to adopt a rule requiring that thirty members were requisite to second a demand for the yeas and nays. He had seen gentlemen of talents and experience, who, upon important questions, had several times demanded the yeas and nays, but, even with a rule requiring but ten members to second the call, could not get a sufficient number to demand them. It was apparent, then, that the evil would be much greater if thirty, instead of ten, was to be the number requisite to order the yeas and nays. Thirty would do for men who came there to blow their own trumpets, and to speak to the people through the medium of newspapers, but such an arrangement would defeat the object of the silent yet attentive and laboring men of the Convention, who desired to see their votes go forth to their constituents on important questions.

He could always make his own course manifest, as he believed, when occasion required it; he could, at any rate, make his positions understood; but there were gentlemen present who were naturally diffident, and who did not wish to engage in swelling the unnecessary discussions that were often entered into upon subjects, but desired simply to record their votes in regard to them, inasmuch as they were engaged in framing what was probably to remain the organic law of the land for ages.

As to the argument of gentlemen that they could have the yeas and nays always taken upon the third reading of a bill when it was upon its final passage—that was of no weight whatever. There were scores of important amendments submitted before the final passage of propositions that upon which gentlemen desired to record their votes. The number of ten had been decided upon as a compromise, when this rule fixing the number necessary to demand the yeas and nays was before the committee on rules for decision; and he was in favor of adhering to it—especially as questions yet to come up would be still more important than those that had been passed by. He much preferred for one to have the right of recording his vote upon propositions, than to have the right of speaking upon them, and he believed this was the opinion of the people.

Mr. RITCHEY said he hoped the Convention would not adopt the proposition before them. The people had a right to know the votes of their representatives in this body, upon every question that came up for their consideration. For one, as a member, he felt bound to record his vote, as far as was practicable, upon every proposition of any importance that arose. If gentlemen favored this proposition of requiring thirty members to call the yeas and nays, on the score of the economy of time, he had only to inform these gentlemen they would most likely be disappointed in their expectations, for he would assist every man who desired the yeas and nays with twenty-nine others in calling the yeas and nays. He had heretofore not done so unless the question was one of general importance; but if the number was to be fixed at thirty he would obligate himself to do what he could to get thirty men to call the yeas and nays upon every question that members should feel themselves justified in calling for them. He would move that the resolution and amendment be indefinitely postponed.

The question being upon the indefinite postponement of the resolution and pending amendment,

Mr. MATHER remarked that the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) had given the Convention a brief list of the speaking members in that body. For himself he considered it a compliment that he had not been included within that number, though he should not have taken it otherwise if he had, for he did not think that he was chargeable with occupying much of the attention of the Convention in debate. He felt anxious to get along with the business before them as speedily as possible, at the same time having a due regard to the discharge of the duties they were sent there to perform. This it was that had influenced him to vote against laying this proposition on the table, and the reason why he should vote for its adoption.

Who, he would ask, was it that called for the yeas and nays the most frequently; was it not the speaking members themselves? Certainly it was; and what was the object in view. These very gentlemen who were called the speaking members of the Convention, and who demanded the yeas and nays most frequently, desired to have them because they had not confidence enough in the people to believe that they would trust their statements of their votes without the printed record to prove the truth of them. For one he needed no such evidence among his constituents. He had no fears, if he was asked how he had voted, as to how he should make that vote evident. If there was any doubt about it he had no question but that he could find Honorable gentlemen on that floor who would recollect his vote, and if he could not he was willing to take the consequences of it.

Mr. DOBSON said if gentlemen would examine the law authorizing this Convention, and the duties prescribed to it under that law, they would not cavil so long over the subject under consideration. Among other duties laid down in that law it would be found in the eleventh section:

"It shall possess the same power to adopt rules, expel a member for disorderly conduct, and punish contempt that are now exercised by either House of the General Assembly in similar cases."

Thus the Convention was to have the same power to adopt rules that the Legislature had. Now, one of the rules in the Legislature was that any two members had the right to call the yeas and nays; and he believed it was the design of the Legislature that the Convention should conform to that rule. It was also prescribed in section fourteen that

"The roll containing the draught of the amended Constitution adopted by said Convention, and the proceedings of said Convention, shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State."

Now, not only were they bound to prepare their journal, but their proceedings also, to be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State. Now he would ask gentlemen if they were going to suppress that which was a necessary part of their proceedings. The Legislature had entrusted them with certain powers to use, and those powers they should exercise and carry out to their full extent, but they were not to go beyond their original scope.

The law authorizing the publication of their journal, votes, and debates, had been approved by the people, and now were they going to suppress the very gist of the matter, the votes of the members, even in a limited degree, when the people wished to see them, and had a right to see them? If the people, as he had already shown, had authorized the publication of their entire proceedings he did not think members of the Convention should complain of it, as it was a duty prescribed at their hands by the people. He would ask gentlemen if they were not willing to give this information to the people if they asked for it at their own expense?

He would remark in reference to the speaking members who had been alluded to, that they were not the best to stand fire when they came to voting, having placed themselves right upon the journal of debates, but not always so upon the register of their votes. Some gentlemen who would advocate publicly a question a short time previous to action upon it, would turn round and vote directly the other way when the question came up for final decision, and he wished the people to know this fact.

Mr. CRUMBACKER said, he did not think there would be any saving of time in the transaction of the business of the Convention, by the adoption of the proposition before them. This would be apparent from the fact that there were some eighty members of the body who were not in the habit of speaking; and if the Convention saw fit to deprive them of the privilege of recording their votes upon questions that come up for consideration, they would certainly take their time to express in the Convention their sentiments in regard to these subjects. There would be no time saved by the adoption of the proposition; for there were subjects constantly arising, upon which they would desire to set themselves right before their constituents, and they would speak if they could not vote. He was opposed, therefore, to the adoption of the amendment to the rules.

Pending the question,

On motion Mr. CRUMBACKER,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from Crawford (Mr. Pepper), to amend the 14th rule of the Convention, so as to require thirty members to call the yeas and nays; with an amendment moved by Mr. Hendricks, to strike out "thirty," and insert "twenty."

The pending question being on the indefinite postponement of the resolution and amendment,

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that, for the reasons already given in a very satisfactory manner, by the gentleman from Hancock, as well as for another reason, which, I have no doubt, has struck the mind of every gentleman here, that the motion for the indefinite postponement of this matter will be adopted. I have not, I believe, with only two exceptions, occupied the attention of the Convention for more than half an hour at any one time. I have been content to record my vote, and to let that vote express my sentiments. If, however, a rule of this kind should be adopted; if thirty, or even twenty members should be required to call the yeas and nays upon important questions, for one, I have no hope that they ever will be called. I should have no reasonable expectation of having an opportunity of recording my opinions in that way; and I should be obliged, therefore, to express my opinions in words. And I will venture to say, that the additional number of speeches that will be made on this floor, for the purpose of enabling gentlemen to place themselves right upon the record, will occupy twice the length of time that would be required to take the yeas and nays. The taking of the yeas and nays occupies about six minutes. I have watched the clock several times, while they were being called. I believe that more time has been consumed in efforts to change our rules, than in any other way. I hope that the rule will remain unchanged.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I would like to say another word or two, Mr. President, and yet I exceedingly regret to trouble the Convention.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat, has not occupied a great portion of the time of the Convention in speaking; yet, I think he has spoken enough to be placed in the category of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole). He has spoken a little upon some subjects. But, sir, let us pay attention to his meaning for a moment. He wishes to place himself right on the record, and he tells us that if the yeas and nays had not been called, he would not, perhaps, have troubled the Convention with any remarks. Let us inquire, however, what will be the operation of this rule upon a majority of the speakers here. The yeas and nays are called; and I appeal to the Convention, if gentlemen do not rise and speak, simply because the yeas and nays are called, in order that their remarks may accompany and explain the reason of their votes. Sir, that is, perhaps, the most fruitful source of all the speaking which we have in this Convention. When the yeas and nays are not called, a man does not rise up and inflict upon the Convention a speech in explanation of his position, but he gives his vote in silence.

Now, sir, a word in regard to the argument made by the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole); and which, I believe, has been regarded as the premium argument in this discussion. What was it? He turns round and says to the non-speaking members: "It is your right, gentlemen, to record your votes here. You are not here to speak, but to vote." Another remark in regard to that, is this—that those non-speaking members are those who make no propositions here; and if they were not called out to give effect and potency to the resolutions which are offered by gentlemen who do speak, they would always be right of record. ["Consent."] Yes, sir, when they were merely called upon to vote upon a proposition that had passed to a third reading, they would be right of record. But the gentlemen who are speaking members, and who make propositions for Buncombe alone, are the men who want to show the country that they got a strong vote upon this or that proposition, and they call upon the non-speaking members, for the purpose of obtaining their endorsement to their speeches. Sir, that is the true position in regard to the matter. The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole)—from Dearborn (Mr. Helman)—and from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso), are all speaking and long speaking members, and the movers of as many propositions as any gentleman in this Convention. They would feel great mortification at being voted down unceremoniously—to avoid this, they call the yeas and noes. Sir, it is the speaking members that make propositions, do the speaking, and perpetually call the yeas and noes. I hope the appeal of the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) will be lost upon the members of this Convention, whom it is calculated to deceive and mislead.

Now, the gentleman (Mr. Walpole) called attention to a proposition offered by himself. What was it! He came in and offered a proposition to disfranchise the Presidents and Directors of banks, railroads, &c.; and how did the Convention treat it? It was offered without the yeas and nays, and it was immediately voted down. But he was not content with that, and he got it re-considered, and he got the yeas and nays ordered, and what were the proceedings? Why, sir, that every man must be heard, and we have, consequently, had a great number of speeches upon this floor, upon it, occupying one day fully; and, after all these speeches, the Convention voted it down by a more decided majority than they did without the yeas and nays. This is the true history of that subject. Now, suppose that we are sensible men—and I don't know whether the supposition is a plausible one—(A VOICE—"not at all plausible;")—but if we are not sensible men, we should be—does not every gentleman know here, that when a plausible proposition is drawn up by those men who are skilled in such business—propositions which are designed only to make a show upon the journal—does not every sensible man of this Convention know that if you do not call for the yeas and nays, the proposition is voted down immediately? but that, when you call the yeas and nays upon it, men will be heard, and upon the yeas and nays, will get up a long and interminable debate? Certainly this is the case.

Now what was the argument of the gentleman from Johnson? Pay attention to it. He said he had been opposed to calling for the yeas and nays, but that if gentlemen adopted the proposition now before the Convention, he would enter into a conspiracy with thirty men to call and order the yeas and nays at any time right or wrong. That was his argument if I apprehended the gentleman aright.

Mr. RITCHEY. Then the gentleman misapprehended me. I said I had been opposed to calling the yeas and nays on many occasions when they were demanded, although I had not joined in the call; and that if this resolution were passed, gentlemen would enter into a conspiracy of that kind, so as to have the yeas and nays whenever any one of them required them.

Mr. SMITH. Well, sir, I think such a conspiracy would not be right, and that gentlemen ought to be governed by right and reason in the matter.

Now I will pay my respects for a moment, to my friend on the other side of the Hall, the gentleman from Switzerland. He said that if he was like the gentleman from Ripley, he would be found voting in favor of a principle one day, and against it the next.

Mr. KELSO (interposing). I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said I would be very sorry to be like the gentleman of Ripley. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. Did he not say that the gentleman from Ripley had voted the other day—how? Why for the proposition that a majority of all the members of the Legislature should be required to pass any law. Yes, sir, I did vote so. But, sir, the gentleman from Switzerland says that the gentleman from Ripley on the very next day, voted against a similar rule in regard to this Convention. Well, sir, I did so. But what did he do? He voted that a majority of the whole should be required to pass any section in the Convention, while he was against a majority of the whole being required to do the same thing in the Legislature. Let us look at the reason for a moment. I voted that a majority of the Legislature should be required to pass any act, and I know that I voted right; I voted by the correct rule of reason; and why? We were notifying the world and the State by our action, that if a member should come to the Legislature, that was the Constitutional rule. And let us look at another good reason for it. It would notify my friend from Switzerland, and others like him, that when he came here, he would have to stay here, and not devote one-third of his time to professional business in the county from which he came.

Now look at the other side of the rule. The gentleman from Switzerland votes that a majority of the whole shall be required to pass any proposition in the Convention after the action of the Convention is half exhausted. No such notice was given to the Convention, and a universal leave has been given members to go home and stay there; and then my friend in the absence of a great many members of this body, proposes that it shall require a majority of the whole number to pass any measure. I would like to hear the gentleman explain his reasoning as well as I have done. Mr. President, if there is to be a conspiracy upon this floor, to demand the yeas and nays on the most unimportant matters, I am willing that the rule should stand as it is. But I say if we adopt the rule, and act as sensible men, with the view of bringing the Convention to a seasonable close, I think we should do right. Should we adopt it, and act in a spirit calculated to accommodate ourselves to each others views, we shall bring this convention to a close at least two weeks sooner under the rule proposed, than under that rule which now governs us in this matter. [Cries of "question, question."]

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. A little while ago, Mr. President, when a proposition was made to lay this motion on the table, the gentleman from Ripley in order to hold us to the responsibility of a vote, called for the yeas and nays on the motion. Now I should like to know whether we are to take his speeches, or his acts, as indications of his true sentiments. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SMITH (interposing). Surely there was no impropriety in calling the yeas and nays. But if thirty gentleman differed with me I would give it up.

Mr. CLARKE. I quite agree with the gentleman in his last remark, that there is no impropriety in calling for the yeas and nays. I am for the rule as it is. We have heard much objection against the Legislatures of past years, because they have Legislated without responsibility. We pass divers rules, so as to make Legislatures responsible to their constituents. Now do we want to escape the responsibility to our constituents? No, sir, I would rather diminish the number required for calling the yeas and nays, for I wish every gentleman to have the firmness to state his opinion when the yeas and nays are called. Sir, I see no reason why members of this Convention should not be held to a strict responsibility to their constituents. No man who assumes to be a statesman, ought ever to take a false position; but ought at all times, to take such a one as he is not ashamed to vote for. Now divers questions come up in the shape of amendments; and on the engrossment of importance, as well as on the final passage of the section itself. I want the opportunity of showing my constituents how I voted, because I cannot always explain to them that the yeas and nays could not be taken. I think it ought to be the privilege of every member, to record his vote on important questions, in order that he may show his constituents how he voted.

Mr. STEELE. Some days ago I had occasion to remark, that the only way to get along with the business of the Convention, was for each gentleman to endeavor to regulate his own mind. Let the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith), who has consumed so much time in making speeches, confine himself to the point in hand, and not run all over the world. [Applause.] Sir, if ever a Buncombe speech has been made in this house, the gentleman who was last up has just made one. It is an old adage, and a good one, that "Murderers are always afraid of ghosts;" and those very gentlemen are the men who have murdered time here, and who still come up and ask you to spend more time, by adopting the general rule offered by the gentleman from Crawford, (Mr. Pepper); for with that rule it will not unfrequently take from half an hour to three quarters, to get a vote spread upon the Journal. It will procrastinate, rather than advance, the interest of the State, and the progress of business in the Convention. ["Consent."] Yes, sir, it is true, and I am in the habit of giving you the truth. ["Consent."] I use plain language, that cannot be misunderstood, when I say, that in order to progress with public business, gentlemen must learn to govern themselves. Let them look to natural rules, and to my example. [Applause.] This is the kind of preaching we want in this audience; and when men like my friend from Ripley, who consumes so much time in making long speeches, will forbear to make them—speeches long enough to cover the whole ground from the Atlantic to the Pacific—we will get along much better. [Laughter, and "hear, hear."] I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Crawford will be indefinitely postponed, and I have one reason to offer that gentleman, why I hope so—because the very man who offered it, was the first man to rise in his seat and demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the question on the table. Yes, sir, he sprung like a steel trap, and demanded the yeas and nays. I hope that gentlemen will excuse me for what I have said. I am now through, and I hope the motion for the indefinite postponement will prevail.

Mr. MILROY moved the previous question, which was sustained.

Mr. WALPOLE. Mr. President, what is the question?

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon striking out thirty and inserting twenty.

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, were taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Beach, Beard, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warwick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hoggins, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Thomas, Thornton, Watts, Wiley, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, Mr. President—76.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beeson, Borden, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Frisbie, Harbolt, Hitt, Holman, Kelso, Kendall of White, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Ritchey, Schoonover, Smiley, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work—39.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred on adopting the resolution as amended, and the yeas and nays being demanded, ordered, and taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Beach, Blythe, Bourne, Bryant, Carter, Chapman, Colfax, Conduit, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Graham of Warwick, Hall, Helm, Hendricks, Howe, Maguire, Mather, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Watts, Wiley, Mr. President—51.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Ballingall, Bascom, Beard Beeson, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Butler, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Fisher, Foley, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tannehill, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum Zenor—65.

So the resolution was not adopted.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention will now proceed to the consideration of the orders of the day, the question being on the final passage of Sections from 23 to 28, inclusive of report No. 12. The first question is, will the Convention adopt them separately, or together?

The Convention decided on the separate adoption of the Sections.

Section twenty-third was then read, and the yeas and nays being ordered on its passage, it was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Friable, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—109.

NAYS.—Howe, Kelso, March, and Murray—4.

The question then being on the adoption of section twenty-four,

Mr. DOBSON proposed that it should be re-committed, with the following instructions:—
“That Senators and Representatives shall no be eligible to any other office during the term for which they were elected.” His object, he said, was this: he believed that one man should fill but one office at a time; that when a man undertook to perform one piece of business, he should complete that before he undertook to perform another. He wanted the Constitution to be plain in regard to that matter.

Mr. BORDEN. The Convention yesterday adopted a section which I offered, and which I think will answer the object of the gentleman from Owen.

Mr. DOBSON. Was that section adopted?

The PRESIDENT. The provision offered by the gentleman from Allen, was attached to another section.

Mr. DOBSON. If the other section passed, then there is no use for this twenty-fourth section at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the Convention will perceive, in a moment, that the section offered by the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) yesterday, and the amendment contemplated by the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) are entirely different things. The one provides that no person who may be elected to either branch of the Legislature shall be eligible to hold any other office during the term for which he may have been elected. The proposition of the gentleman from Allen is of a different character, namely: that he shall not be eligible to any office the appointment to which is vested in the Legislature. It will be recollected that we do not intend to confer upon the Legislature the power of appointing. There may possibly be two or three offices the appointment to which will be vested in the Legislature, but the great body of them are to be filled by election, by the people. Thus it will be seen that the provision of the gentleman from Allen applies to but one, two, or three cases at the farthest. The proposition of the gentleman from Owen, on the other hand, proposes the establishment of a great principle. The proposition is just such an one as is laid down in reference to the office of Governor; that no man shall be eligible to an office during the term of the office for which he may then be elected. It will be observed that the section, as it now stands, is extremely defective, when considered in reference to the plan proposed by the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson). The present section provides that Senators or Representatives shall not be appointed to any civil office of profit under the State, which shall have been created or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during such term, except such offices as may be filled by elections of the people.

Now, in the first place, I take it for granted that there will be a constitutional provision prohibiting the Legislature from creating any new office. I suppose there is no doubt whatever that this will be done. That being so, then, as a matter of course, this section amounts to nothing at all. It is saying, in effect, that in every case Senators or Representatives may be eligible to office during the term of his present office. I hold that a due regard for the public service, and even for the sanctity of the ballot box, requires that men should not be allowed to exercise the influence and power of one office, during its term, for the purpose of advancing their prospects for another. My object is this: there may be a question whether we can change the present mode of electing a Senator of the United States, and inasmuch as this principle can be established in reference to all other offices, without exception, I propose that we leave it just as it is; and when it is remembered that a general rule is to be established prohibiting men from obtaining one office while they are in the occupation of another, there will be no prospect hereafter of the Legislature electing by legislation any man holding an office under the United States. I would, therefore, propose the following amendment to the instructions:

"No senator or representative shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, be appointed or elected to any civil office of profit under the State."

Now before I submit that proposition to the Convention, I wish to call attention to report No. 17, sec. 3, in which it will be found that the following section is reported:

"The Governor shall be ineligible to any other office during the term for which he may be elected."

I suppose that provision will be adopted by the Convention. We ought to treat the members of the General Assembly in the same way, and I would even go so far as to run down this matter to the county officers if possible, so as to cut off many fruitful sources of corruption.

Mr. MURRAY. The object of this amendment appears to be to prevent a man from holding any office to which he may be elected, even if he should resign the one that he may then be holding at the period of his election. Contending that persons who hold offices under banking institutions should be excluded from serving as representatives of the people, it occurs to me that when internal improvements become common, as they soon will be all over the State, the people will feel themselves called upon to invest their capital in them. Being thus interested they will require persons to see to their interests in the Legislature; and it seems to me that there are many ways in which influences of an improper character might be used over and above the influences that may be exercised by the officers themselves. Every member would suspect an officer the moment he rose in his place to defend his cause. Jealousies would spring up in the minds of members; and it occurs to me that generally speaking they would effect their object much better by endeavoring to obtain the aid of some disinterested person to represent their views. If we are to suppose that bank officers are all liable to corruption, we must also suppose that officers of every other institution have the same liability. It seems to me, however, manifestly absurd that a man should not be permitted to resign an office and to hold another one if the people choose to confer it upon him.

The question was then taken on Mr. Holman's amendment to the instructions of Mr. Owen, and it was rejected.

The question then recurred on the motion to re-commit with instructions, and it was rejected.

Mr. RARIDEN. I propose to amend the section by striking out all the words which create a disability upon the members of the General Assembly from being elected or appointed to any other office during the term for which they were elected as members of the General Assembly. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Convention to simply to test the wishes of the Convention on this question.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to recommit the section with instructions to insert the words "or elected" after the word "appointed" in the 108 line, and to strike out all after the word State in the 109 line. He said he did not wish to discuss this question, as a vote had already been taken which indicated the feeling of the Convention to be that the subject was not one of very much moment. His opinion, however, was that it was a question of vast moment, and if he could obtain nine members to aid him in a call for the yeas and nays he should like to have them.

Mr. SHOUP said he thought the Convention had had talk enough on that question, and he would therefore move the previous question.

The previous question was sustained, and the main question being ordered to be now put, the yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered on the motion to re-commit the section with the instructions offered by Mr. Holman, and were taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Carter, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Elliott, Foley, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hamilton, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kinley, March, Mather, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mowrer, Murray, Niles, Read of Clark, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Stevenson, Trimby, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—50.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Cracken, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Davis of

Madison, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wiley, Zenor, and Mr. President—68.

So the motion to re-commit the section did not prevail.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the section, it was adopted as originally reported by the committee. The following is the vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—109.

NAYS.—Messrs. Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Foley, Graham of Warrick, Holman, Howe, Kelso, and March—8.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the adoption of section 25, and the chair would suggest to the Convention the propriety of dispensing with the yeas and nays on each section separately, as their merits have been copiously discussed. A great saving of time to the Convention as well as of cost to the State, would thus be effected.

MR. READ, of Clark, moved to dispense with the rule.

MR. WALPOLE. I object. If we dispense with the rule in this case, we may in every other.

The question then being taken on the motion of Mr. Read, to dispense with the rule, it was decided in the affirmative.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the passage of the section.

MR. STEPHENSON said he would direct the attention of the Convention to the words in the 115 line, "as by law of this State required." The object of the section was to prevent defaulting collectors and holders of the public money from being eligible to a seat in the General Assembly. But from these words, it was made to depend upon an act of the legislature, when it must be obvious to every gentleman, that the section was perfect without these words. [Consent.]

MR. CLARKE, of Tippecanoe, said that the reason why those words were inserted, was to exclude defaulters to the general government, and to confine the provisions of this section to defaulters in this State. That might be a good reason or a bad one, but that was the view with which the words were inserted.

The question being taken, the motion to strike out the words was rejected.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the section, it was decided in the affirmative.

THE PRESIDENT. The next question is on section 26.

The section provides that the president, directors, &c., of banks and corporations shall be ineligible to a seat in either branch of the General Assembly.

MR. SHERROD moved to recommit the section with instructions to amend it so as to include the keepers of Faro Banks and all persons engaged in gambling operations.

MR. KELSO said he did not think hard of any gentleman for offering instructions. There was no doubt that a great many gentlemen were of opinion that whatever instructions they thought were right they should have them acted upon, and there was still less doubt that whatever gentlemen were most acquainted with they were most apt to propose. [Laughter and applause.]

MR. SHERROD. I did not intend to hurt the feelings of the gentleman from Switzerland—

MR. KELSO (interposing). I can assure the gentleman from Orange that he did not do anything of the kind.

MR. SHERROD (continuing). But, sir, there appears to be a feeling that no man connected with a bank, or with any corporation whatever, can be an honest man. Then, sir, if that is so—if it is true that men connected with these corporations are dishonest, let them be all put in the same class. ["Consent, consent."] That is the doctrine that I maintain. If you prohibit the one, because he is dishonest, why not prohibit the gambler? [Great applause.]

MR. MATHER moved to lay the motion to re-commit on the table.

MR. SHERROD demanded the yeas and nays.

MR. HENDRICKS inquired whether the motion to lay the instructions on the table carried the section with it?

THE PRESIDENT. That is the rule. The section will be laid upon the table if the motion to lay the instructions on the table should prevail.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Beach, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Frisbie, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Helm, Hitt, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Monroe, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Wiley, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Coats, Cole, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Foley, Foster, Gordon, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, March, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nofsinger, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—52.

So the section and instructions were laid upon the table.

The next question was on the adoption of section 27, which was passed by consent.

The next question was on the adoption of section 28.

MR. GRAHAM moved to re-commit the section, with the following instructions:

“No member of either branch of the General Assembly, shall be eligible to any other office in this State, during the term for which he has been elected.”

MR. GRAHAM demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Carter, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Elliott, Foley, Frisbie, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hamilton, Hendricks, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, March, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Nave, Owen, Ritchey, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, and Yocum—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Beach, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, May, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor and Mr. President—75.

So the section was not re-committed.

The next question was on the adoption of the 29th section.

The section was adopted.

And then, on motion,

The Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY DEC. 20, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BADGER.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

There being no reports to be made from committees, the Convention proceeded to the standing orders of the day.

DISTRICTS.

The first thing in order being the section, upon its third reading, which provides that Senatorial and Representative districts shall be composed of contiguous counties, and that no county, for Representative purposes, shall be divided.

MR. STEVENSON moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to strike out the words “and no county, for Representative purposes, shall ever be divided.”

I was very anxious at one time, said Mr. S., that the Convention should adopt a section requiring the Legislature to divide the large counties; but upon this question, I am satisfied the Convention has come to an adverse decision. It appears that they are determined not to do it. But I think it is going too far to declare, in the new Constitution, that the Legislature shall not hereafter divide the large counties. I think the question should be left open, so that the Legislature may be at liberty to do as they think best hereafter.

The question being on the motion to re-commit, with instructions,

MR. STEVENSON demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

MR. BORDEN said, it appeared to him that although a majority of the Convention might be of the opinion that it was impolitic to divide the counties, still the question should be left open, so that if the Legislature should deem it proper to divide them hereafter, it might be done. He thought there could be no harm in leaving it to the discretion of the Legislature; at all events, it would be decidedly wrong to insert a positive prohibition, in the Constitution, because they could not now properly determine what might be necessary to be done hereafter, in regard to this matter.

Mr. BRIGHT. In justice to myself, let me say to the Convention, that this question of dividing counties in representative districts, was directly referred to the committee, under a resolution proposed by the gentleman from Putnam, and the committee determined that no county should be divided for representative purposes. This was done, not at my suggestion, but it resulted from the suggestion of the gentleman from Putnam, (Mr. Stevenson.)

Sir, a great deal may be said on both sides. There are reasons why counties should be divided, and there are many reasons why they should not. If we would consult convenience in this matter, we would not make minute divisions for representative purposes. The extent of territory embraced within the limits of a county is small enough. The inconvenience of dividing them into small districts, is a strong argument against it. These are the considerations that weighed with the committee, and it was on account of them, that the committee decided to report the section as it stands.

Mr. WALPOLE. My known hostility to corporations, and the influence they exert upon legislation, requires that I should say a few words upon this question. I regard it as one of the most important questions that can be addressed to the consideration of the Convention. It is a question whether the agricultural interests of the country shall be swallowed up by the commercial interests. That it has been, and is so, is unquestionably true. What is the case in this Convention? Madison sends three delegates, not one of which represents the agricultural interests. Indianapolis, or the county of Marion, has four. Terre Haute three, Fort Wayne two, not one of them representing the agricultural interests.

Mr. COOKERLY. I beg leave to correct the gentleman.

Mr. WALPOLE. Does the gentleman not live in Terre Haute?

Mr. COOKERLY. No, sir, I live a mile and a half from the town, in the midst of an agricultural community.

Mr. WALPOLE. No matter. How is it with the other commercial points in the State? There are three delegates from Laporte, Evansville and Vanderburgh county send three, all representing the commercial interests, and after your districting system shall have been adopted, you will have other representatives from those commercial towns, and your free banking system will tend still farther to increase the number of those representatives; and, sir, they will hold in their hands the destinies of the State. Their energies will be directed to the breaking down of the agricultural interests.

It is to prevent this that I desire to leave the power to the General Assembly so to district the State that each part of it shall be fairly represented. The proposition as it now stands precludes the Legislature from dividing counties for representative purposes. I hope the matter may be left open, that the Legislature may act upon it as the necessities of the State may require.

Mr. MAGUIRE said he was opposed to restricting the Legislature in reference to the districting of the State. That which would be good policy at present might not be good policy for all time to come. He was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Putnam, to re-commit the section, with the instructions which he had proposed.

Mr. COOKERLY remarked that the power ought to be left with the Legislature to district the State or not. This the present proposition did. He thought the Convention would be satisfied with it.

The question being upon the re-commitment of the section with instructions.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 67, nays 54—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, and Yocum—67.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Carr, Carter, Chandel, Clark of Hamilton, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gregg, Haddon, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Logan, May, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Tannehill, Todd, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—54.

So the section was re-committed.

Mr. DUNN of Perry. Is it in order to move additional instructions.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly the gentleman can offer additional instructions.

Mr. DUNN of Perry. I will move then that the committee be instructed to strike out the section, and substitute a provision that each county having two-thirds of a representative ratio, shall be entitled to one representative.

The question being on the adoption of the instructions.

The yeas and nays were demanded.

Mr. COOKERLY. I want to get rid of this question; and, sir, I move that the instructions be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WATTS rose to a question of order. This identical proposition, he said, had been offered and voted down two or three times.

The PRESIDENT remarked that it was in order to offer the same instructions on a different day, and at a different stage of the question; and that it was for the Convention to determine whether they would adopt the instructions or not.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. It is true that this proposition has been before the Convention on three several occasions; and, sir, it was adopted by a vote of the Convention. That vote was subsequently re-considered, and it was then rejected. If there be not a majority, there is at least a very respectable minority in favor of it. It is a proposition that many of us are anxious to see carried out. I think, therefore, the section ought to go to the committee. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Vigo will not be adopted by the Convention. It is not altogether proper to treat the friends of the proposition thus cavalierly.

Mr. COOKERLY withdrew the motion to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. PETTIT said that it seemed to him that the proposition was a very absurd one. It was too late in the day to talk about representation upon such a basis; it was too late a day in the science of government to adopt any such proposition. The representation of acres, and not of persons, was a thing that he could never consent to. The Convention had settled the question as to the ratio of representation, and it would be as well not to undertake to disturb that decision. Representation should be based upon population, and upon nothing else. Those upon whom the laws are to operate should be the basis of representation. Every man in the State should have a voice in making the laws. He was in favor of representation by single districts. He was for dividing counties into small divisions, and giving a representative to each. He was glad that the section had been re-committed.

Mr. BASCOM. If the gentleman from Tippecanoe will allow votes to be given on this floor according to his own criterion, he will allow me three votes to his one. The gentleman talks about representation resting upon a fair and just ratio. If he will examine the representation here, he will find that I represent double the number of voters that he does.

We ask it as a matter of right, that the smaller counties shall have a separate representation. We have been swallowed up long enough by the large counties. I ask an equal voice for my county according to her population. If you give us a representative for a two-thirds ratio, we ask nothing more; but so long as you attach us to another county, and take double population to make a ratio, we have reason to complain that injustice is done to us.

Sir, the northern part of the State has not half the voice she ought to have. The evil has been justly complained of by the smaller counties, and I hope that we shall be able to obtain redress. The smaller counties have as deep and as abiding an interest in the welfare of the State as the larger counties; and they ask that their interests shall be looked to, and that equal justice shall be meted out to them. This is all that we ask. If gentlemen give us this, we shall be satisfied. All that we ask is a representation according to the mode proposed by the gentleman from Perry. I hope the gentleman's proposition will be adopted.

Mr. HOVEY. I do not think that the people should be compelled, by a Constitutional provision, to vote in their own townships. It may be a good principle as a law, but there is no necessity of embracing any provision of that kind in the amended Constitution. There are hundreds of men, dissatisfied with the township law, who will vote against the Constitution we may frame, if we embrace that provision. I am fearful that we will need all the friends that we can obtain, for the adoption of the amendments we may make, and would warn Delegates not to heat the Constitutional boiler too hot, without leaving open the safety valves, or it may collapse, when it comes to be tested.

Mr. EDMONSTON. This matter has been thoroughly discussed, and I merely rise for the purpose of saying a single word in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Tippecanoe. He maintains that the principle of representing territory and not population, is wrong; and in order to sustain his argument, he shows that the populous counties have all the representation.

Mr. PETTIT. If the gentleman will allow me, I say no such thing. I say, divide up the Counties, and let one Representative come from each Representative District.

Mr. EDMONSTON. It is no matter whether you divide them up, or let them elect by County ballot. The principle is the same. Now I ask whether it is just and right, that those Counties that are populating so fast, that in five years they will have a population equal to five times the Representative ratio, should not have justice done them? If you do not adopt this proposition, a very large portion of their population will be unrepresented. Is it not right, then, in view of the immigration that is pouring into the State, that you should legislate to meet the wants of these people, and not keep the power in the hands of the present populous Counties?—if it is not compatible with the principles of free government! There is a rush of population to the new Counties—they are taxed equally with the most populous Counties, and are not half represented.

Mr. RITCHEY. I regret the vote that has been taken this morning, to recommit the section with instructions, principally for the reason that if you leave the matter open, you put it in the power of the Legislature, in times of excitement, to gerrymander the State. Sir, it will no doubt be recollected that Ohio, a few years ago, was thrown almost into a state of anarchy by this means.

Now, leave it to the Legislature to decide this matter, and let such a state of excitement prevail, as there was in 1840, and you will leave it in the power of the dominant party to gerrymander the State. I hold that liberty should not be given to either party, to gerrymander the State, in order that party ends may be secured. For that reason, I regret exceedingly, that the section has been recommitted; and I hope that the sober second thought will induce us to keep it in the shape which it now is.

Sir, it is said that there is great inequality in the representation of the State. I admit it. The great north has grown up with unexampled rapidity; but when the census shall have been completed the north will have justice done her, and in the course of five or six years a new apportionment will take place.

I have voted for a similar proposition to that of the gentleman from Perry on two or three different occasions, and I did it in the belief that the principle is right; but I am wearied with the continual applications of the friends of the measure to have it engrafted in this Constitution. The Convention has decided the question two or three times, and I now feel myself under no farther obligation, coming, as as the proposition does, in connection with a proposition so injurious to our system of representation, to support it.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have not risen to discuss the question, but merely to remind gentlemen that the practical operation of this provision will be to give a county of two thousand voters the same representation in the halls of the Legislature, as a county that has three thousand voters. A principle of this kind, should not for a moment be entertained. Why can we not leave the matter to the Legislature? There is no doubt that they will act judiciously in reference to it. Your Constitution, if there were no other objection to it except this, would not be sustained by the people. They desire that there should be an equality of representation.

Mr. DOBSON. From the indications that we have had here a few days ago, I supposed that this principle would have been agreed to. It is true it does not mete out exact justice to all, but gentlemen will remember that it is utterly impossible, without disregarding county lines entirely, to have a fair representation, based upon population; and I go for men being represented, and nothing else. But at the same time I wish to avoid another difficulty; that is, the difficulty of legislating on the subject, and giving to the dominant party too many votes. I say it is impossible to do complete justice, without disregarding county lines. We should then approximate as near as we can to what is correct, and avoid, as far as possible, doing injustice to any portion of the State.

And again, you should keep the large counties from doing injustice to the small, for if you have counties represented in the way in which they have been heretofore, the large counties will have the power, and they will be very apt, like individuals, when they have the power, to act for their own particular benefit.

In relation to the position assumed by the gentleman from Vigo, I will ask him whether if two thousand be the ratio, it is not great injustice to say, that a county containing fifteen hundred voters, shall have no representative, while one having twenty-five hundred shall have two?

For the purpose of obviating this difficulty then, we ought to district the State, and to keep the question out of the Legislature, and say that each county having a certain number of voters should have one representative, and then leave it to the Legislature to dispose of the balance as they please,

How would you get a ratio unless you disregarded county lines? You must have some rule. A county having eighteen or nineteen hundred voters, otherwise would have no representative. You cannot have the exact number in each county. You must do injustice to one county, in one way, or else do injustice to another county, in another way. And I take it, that each average county having a separate interest, ought to have a separate representation in the Legislature. And that representation ought to be equalized. It ought to come from every portion of the State, and be as equally apportioned to each county as possible.

Now this system of transferring floats, or surpluses from one county to another, is there any justice in it? I ask you to look back to the year 1840. Look at the districting that took place in that year. The county that I represent, had for five years, a sufficient number of voters to be entitled to another representative, during all that time, not represented at all. Where did that surplus go to? The gentleman from Hancock recalled it to my recollection this morning by his remarks. It went to the counties of Vigo and Jefferson. Why did it go there? Simply because they had the power to take it. I know no other reason; there was no justice in it.

I would like to have a rule adopted that would be nearer right, if I could get it, but I would rather have this, than none at all, and I say I have no fears for my own counties. Each of them having a little over an average number of voters or polls, they will each have a representative, and so will each of the larger counties, some of them have two.

The average counties have nothing to fear. But I want justice to be done to all, and in such a way that it cannot be undone by the Legislature. Therefore I hope that those counties having two-thirds of a ratio will have the privilege of sending a representative to the Legislature.

Mr. MAGUIRE. If I were engaged, as a legislator, in making an apportionment of Representatives, I should undoubtedly feel it my duty to give a Representative to such counties as at the time of making the apportionment should contain over two-thirds of the number fixed as the ratio. I think the Legislature has heretofore, and there is no reason to doubt that they will, hereafter, do ample justice to counties thus situated. The provision would not at all affect the county of Marion at the next apportionment, for we have a surplus of several hundred, both for Senators and Representatives. I could not, however, excuse myself for voting to place permanently in the organic law, a provision that two-thirds should be equal to a whole. The true principle, as I suppose, upon which to base representation is population or polls, and we can do nothing rightfully here, but to establish correct general principles, and leave the application to the Legislature. I think there need be no reason to fear that the Legislature, when called upon from time to time, to make an apportionment of Senators and Representatives, will act with liberality towards the small counties. They cannot do otherwise than give a Representative to counties that come nearly up to the ratio. As I said before, I would unhesitatingly carry out the principle of this proposition if I were acting as a legislator and dividing the representation among the counties, but I cannot think it is our duty to go further in the fundamental law than to settle correct general principles. According to the return of polls recently made, there are about fifteen counties, which contain over two-thirds of the ratio for a Representative, and which would, under the two-thirds principle, be entitled to a Representative each. Assuming the number of polls at 187,000 and the number of Representatives at one hundred, and the ratio for a Representative will be 1870. The fifteen counties to which I have referred as having over two-thirds of the ratio, contain in the aggregate 22,643 polls, which is 5,407 less than the full number for fifteen Representatives. This 5,407 polls must of course be thrown upon the 85 remaining Districts, and would raise the ratio in them from 1870 to 1933. Take Wells and Dubois (both of which lack a few votes of two-thirds) into the calculation, and the ratio will be increased to 1966. It may thus be seen that the provision under consideration would but slightly increase the ratio in the other Districts, and could work but little injury anywhere. I dislike therefore to vote against it, and would not if I did not think it wrong to place such a provision in the Constitution, which if adopted by the people may continue for half a century—and if I did not believe that the Legislature will always do justice to the small counties. I shall add no more. I did not feel at liberty to vote against the proposition without these brief remarks.

Mr. NEWMAN. I have listened to the remarks of gentlemen on this question with some interest. It is true that a fraction of one thousand over the representative ratio will not be entitled to a Representative as I understand the proposed provision, nor would nineteen hundred and ninety-seven over such ratio, if two thousand voters should be adopted as the ratio, whilst this provision gives to a county possessing two-thirds of a Representative ratio—say thirteen hundred and sixty-seven voters—the right to a Representative in the Legislature. This, sir, to my mind, renders this provision manifestly an unjust one—one that ought not to be incorporated in the organic law.

We say by it that two-thirds of the ratio—say thirteen hundred and sixty-seven voters—are entitled to a Representative; but thirty-nine hundred and ninety-seven voters shall not have more than one Representative. It does not provide that a fraction of two-thirds over the representative ratio shall be entitled to a Representative for such fraction, and this to my mind is a provision which should not even be thought of.

It is undoubtedly true that the small counties of the State have an advantage over the larger counties as regards representation. There never has occurred an instance in the apportionment of the representation in which this has not been the case. For example, the county of Wayne, with forty-eight hundred voters, had three Representatives and one Senator; while the county of Marion with fifteen hundred votes is entitled to one Representative. Our county has something like eighteen hundred votes as the fraction over the senatorial ratio, for which we get nothing; and we have a fraction of three or four hundred over the representative ratio. It is manifest that this overplus of strength goes to some other portion of the State; and it must be distributed among the smaller counties somewhere. It does seem to me, then, that gentlemen can safely trust the Legislature to take care of this matter; and with facts of the kind I have mentioned before them, they will be able to settle the question satisfactorily.

Justice has uniformly been done to the small counties, and I think there can be no kind of doubt that that will continue to be the case.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) to the instructions offered by the gentleman from Perry (Mr. Dunn),

And it was not concurred in.

Mr. BERRY moved to amend the pending instructions by adding the following:

"And any county having one or more Representatives and an excess of two-thirds of a ratio for a Representative over such member, shall have a member for such excess."

Mr. WATTS moved to lay the instructions and amendment on the table.

Mr. BORDEN called for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first taken upon laying the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Berry) to the instructions offered by the gentleman from Perry (Mr. Dunn) upon the table.

On this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 70, nays 52:

AYES.—Messrs Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chenowith, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Lockhart, March, Mather, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—70.

NAYS.—Messrs. Balingall, Barbour, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Gregg, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Kinley, Logan, May, Mooney, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Snook, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, and Zenor—52.

So the amendment to the instructions was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question will now be taken upon laying the instructions offered by the gentleman from Perry (Mr. Dunn) upon the table.

Upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, were taken with the following result—yeas 62, nays 63:

AYES.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gregg, Haddon, Hardin, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Jones, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, McLean, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Snook, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, and Zenor—62.

NOES.—Messrs. Badger, Bascom Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Chenowith, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Lockhart, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Nave, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Sherrod, Sims, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Trimby, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—63.

So the instructions were not laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs upon the adoption of the instructions.

Mr. PETTIT. I move, Mr. President, a call of the Convention, as it cannot be possible that a proposition so absurd as this can pass this body.

Upon this motion, a division was called for, and by ayes 56, noes 54, it was decided in the affirmative.

The roll having been called through.

Mr. CRUMBACKER moved that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the instructions,

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson remarked that he thought it would be well for gentlemen who were pressing upon the Convention a proposition so odious to a large portion of the people of the State, to consider that although they might pass such a proposition and engraft it in the Constitution, yet the people would finally be called upon to decide upon it. He ventured to say that if they inserted this provision in the Constitution, giving to two men located in one part of the State the same vote and influence in the Legislature that was possessed by three or four men in another part of the State, that the people of Indiana would toss the Constitution higher than the cow with the crumpled horns tossed the dog. [A laugh.] Now all that we ask, who represent the populous counties of the State, is that population shall be made the basis of representation, and that no discrimination will be made in our favor, as we will submit to no discrimination made against us. He would go as far as any gentleman would go to accommodate the smaller counties, and it was for that reason that he went in favor of the provision providing that the larger counties should be divided into representative districts; and he had himself proposed to diminish the Senate to thirty-five in number, and to increase the number in the House to one hundred and fifteen, thus giving the smaller counties separate Representatives in the House. But all these steps could be retraced, and he hoped that those who were pressing this proposition so earnestly would look a little ahead, and consider the effect of their proposed action upon the reception of the new Constitution by the people.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick said he had only a few words to offer in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn). He regretted much to hear the expressions of gentlemen that if this or that proposition was proposed to be engrafted in the Constitution they would hold the threat, in terrorem, over the final action of the Convention upon it, that the new Constitution would be rejected if it was adopted. Now this was South Carolina doctrine, which he trusted would not influence the action of the members of the Convention, or deter them from the conscientious and faithful discharge of their duties.

How were they to judge of the sentiments of the people of Indiana, if they did not suppose that every shadow of opinion in the State was reflected in this body of one hundred and fifty men, elected from among the people themselves. And if a majority of this body decide to engraft certain provisions in the Constitution, certainly that majority must be supposed to represent the will of the majority of the people of Indiana, or else this Convention did not represent the whole of the people of the State. There might be some propositions engrafted in the Constitution that would not meet with his approval, yet as a whole he expected to advocate its adoption. It could not be expected that every one of its provisions would meet with the hearty approval of every member, yet as in other legislative bodies and forms of government, the will of the majority should be acceded to. This should be the general rule for the guidance of gentlemen in framing organic laws for the government of the State of Indiana.

Mr. WALPOLE remarked that the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Newman,) the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) and the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) had stated in the course of the debate upon this proposition, that the small counties had been dealt by generously. Since this statement had been made, he would refer to the census of representation and see how the matter really stood.

Mr. W. here read from statistical tables to prove that a certain number of the smaller counties were unjustly apportioned under the existing system of representation.

The representation was made at least twenty-five per centum in favor of certain larger counties; that is, that certain smaller counties—which he enumerated—were deprived, and that too on the basis of population, of a fourth portion of their representation, which was transferred to certain larger counties.

Mr. COLFAX called for the previous question.

The question was put upon seconding the call, and upon a division, by ayes 46, noes 44, the call was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put, by consent.

The question was then put upon adopting the instructions offered by the gentleman from Perry, (Mr. Dunn,) and the yeas and nays upon the question having been demanded and ordered, they were taken, and the Secretary reported the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Chandler, Chenoweth, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hamilton, Harbott, Hawkins, Helmer, Hogan, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Lockhart, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Murray, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Sherrard, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—63.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gregg, Haddon, Hardin, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Jones, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, McLean, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, and Zenor—65.

So the instructions were not adopted.

Mr. FRISBIE moved the following instructions: Add at the end of the section, "Any county having three-fourths of a representative ratio, shall be entitled to one Representative."

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Chandler, Chenoweth, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Debsen, Dunni of Perry, Edmonston, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Lockhart, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Murray, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Trimby, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—62.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gregg, Haddon, Hardin, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Jones, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, and Zenor—65.

So the instructions were not adopted.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The consideration of the section providing that the compensation of members of the Legislature shall be fixed by law, &c., was resumed.

Mr. HALL moved to amend by adding the following:

“Provided, That after the first fifty-six days from the commencement of the session, the compensation for their services shall not exceed the sum of one dollar and fifty cents per day, for the remainder of the session. This provision shall not apply to the first session of the General Assembly which shall commence after the adoption of this Constitution.”

Mr. HALL. I am of opinion that something of this kind should be adopted. It is expected that some curtailment of the expense attendant upon the meetings of our Legislatures should be made. We have done nothing as yet; have not even reduced the number of representatives, but have retained the number under the present system of one hundred and fifty. If we do not then adopt some rule fixing the duration of the sessions of the Legislature, we will have done nothing towards economy in that department of the government. It does seem to me that with the exception of the session immediately following the adoption of the Constitution, the future sessions of the Legislature should be limited to eight weeks. It is proposed to fix a certain time by this amendment, and if the Legislature sits beyond it, the compensation of the members shall be reduced.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick would inquire of the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall) why the services of the session of the first Legislature under the new Constitution if that session extended over sixty days were worth more than the services of subsequent Legislatures that might possibly sit beyond that time?

Mr. HALL replied that it was fair to presume that the first Legislature that met after the adoption of the new Constitution would have a great deal of legislation to perform necessarily attendant upon a change of the Constitution of the State, so that it would probably have to sit some three months.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick could not but think then it was fairly to be presumed that the Legislature would at no session continue to sit any longer than they had business before them to transact. If the proposition of the gentleman was adopted, the inference was that the Convention considered that the Legislature sat here merely for their pay, and for one he had no desire to cast such an imputation upon that body.

Mr. MAGUIRE said that he should vote against this proposition, for the same reason that he had voted against others of a similar character, viz: that it interfered with the duties of the Legislature. He would submit to the gentleman from Gibson, whether after this Convention had continued in session some three or four months, they could with propriety say to the Legislature if they sat beyond a certain period of time their per diem should be reduced. He hoped that no restriction of that kind would be imposed upon them. They had shown a disposition to restrict themselves for several sessions past, and there is no reason to suppose they will abuse their discretion.

Mr. HALL would simply remark that this proposition if adopted would prevent the Legislature from following the bad example the Convention had set them.

Mr. DOBSON said he would vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Gibson if it was so modified as to read “that after the year 1870 the Legislature may extend the time.” He was willing to have a rule of the kind proposed in the Constitution, but he did not wish it fixed for all time to come. In the course of the future the growth of population and increase of wealth in the State, would render it necessary that they should hold longer sessions than at present.

Mr. HALL accepted the amendment.

Mr. SHERROD moved to lay the amendment to the section upon the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered they were taken, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 64, nays 61—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Jones, Kelso, Kilgore, Kirley, Logan, Maguire, Mather, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Yocum, and Mr. President—64.

YAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Beeson, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Butler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Conduitt, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Lockhart, March, May, McClelland, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Zenor—61.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

THE PRESIDENT. The question is, shall the section be engrossed for a third reading.

MR. READ of Clark moved to amend by adding the words:

"Such compensation shall not exceed three dollars per day, for the period of sixty days from the commencement of the session, and shall not exceed the sum of one dollar and fifty cents per day, for the remainder of the session, and this provision shall not apply to the first Legislature that shall meet after the adoption of this Constitution."

MR. R. said that in regard to the motion that had just carried by a small majority, gentlemen had spoken of it as humbug, when every State which had of late years adopted new Constitutions west of the Allegheny mountains, with perhaps a single exception, had adopted similar restrictions. And as the gentleman had remarked the other day in regard to railroad facilities, that they enabled the farmer to take his produce to market, and that if that was monopoly, he was for giving him more of it; he (Mr. R.) would say if this restriction is humbug, give us more of it.

The Convention had already refused to reduce the number of senators and representatives, and now it was proposed to refuse to restrict the length of their sessions to some seven or eight weeks. If some plan for restricting the Legislature was not adopted the expenses of that body in future would be nearly doubled.

Allusion had been made to the fact that the Legislature, to a certain extent, had restricted itself; but where did that restriction originate? It had originated in a democratic caucus, and such was its good effect, that scarcely any attempt had been made, from the time of its adoption to the present day, to repeal it; but, as they were about to change our Constitution, the six weeks law would in all probability be repealed.

Look at Illinois and Tennessee. In the first organization of their State Governments, their Legislatures were restricted to biennial sessions, but the duration of those sessions were not limited; and how did they act? They set three, four, and five months; and one of the main arguments that had induced the people of Illinois to call a Convention to revise their State Constitution was, to restrict the Legislature, who had abused their power, and passed, in three or four months, just about double the number of laws they would pass if they had had short sessions, and many of which were entirely unnecessary. Among the first acts the Constitutional Convention of that State adopted, was one to restrict the Legislature to six or seven weeks' sessions. All he wanted was, that there should be some limitation in this respect. So far as he was concerned, if he went home and told his people that they had not reduced the number of their senators and representatives, nor restricted the Legislature as to its expenses, they would tell him that the Convention had not done that which the people had sent them there to do.

Again: They had made provision for doing away with local legislation, and to have a uniform system of laws throughout the State; and of course, this being the case, there was no necessity for long sessions of the Legislature. He was in favor, therefore, of restricting the Legislature in the mode which he had suggested.

Experience had taught him that there was a great deal of time unprofitably spent in legislation. Our legislative acts had been too numerous, and too often changed. Before the people knew what the laws really were, they were often repealed or amended. True, they had adopted biennial sessions of the Legislature, but, as he had stated before, they had refused to reduce the number of members to the Legislature; and now, if they refused to restrict the length of the sessions, they had gained but little, indeed, by adopting biennial sessions. He feared that their sessions would be as long again, and double the number of acts would be passed; if so, what had they gained? Constitutional reform, economy, and retrenchment should be the order of the day. Let them, then, carry out those measures. For one, he would exert his humble powers to effect those ends.

Gentlemen said that this would be restricting the people themselves. That was what they came here for; all civil and religious governments had to be restricted, and unless this had been done, they would not have been blessed with their present form of government, which was the boast and pride of every true American. The people of the State could not assemble here in mass to make a Constitution; but they had sent their delegates here with full power to make such restrictions as they might think expedient and necessary; and this, he thought, was one that would meet with their entire approbation.

Mr. FOLEY said he would move to amend the amendment by adding: "And the same compensation shall be the per diem allowance of the members of this Convention."

Mr. BORDEN. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President. I assert that the Convention has no right to fix its own compensation.

Mr. PETTIT. You cannot take my per diem away from me by any sort of amendment. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT. This may be a just proposition, but it is not just now in order. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Madison (in his seat). The President Judge ought to know what is right. [A laugh.]

Mr. BARBOUR remarked that he had not had much experience in a legislative point of view, but he supposed it was in accordance with the theory of our Government, that the members of the Legislature represented the will of their constituents, and if they did so, he could not see any difficulty that would arise from leaving this question to be settled by the Legislature. He knew this much in regard to the legislation which they had had for the last several years—he would not say it was because of short sessions—it was the poorest legislation Indiana ever had.

Mr. READ of Clark inquired how it was in 1836?

Mr. BARBOUR said he was not prepared to speak of the legislation of 1836, but of the general character of the legislation during the last several years, and it was the purest legislation Indiana ever had.

Mr. READ of Clark (in his seat). In your opinion.

Mr. BARBOUR said: Certainly; that was his opinion. He had never known a representative who came before the people that did not advocate what was popular with them. Now, if it was popular with the people that the sessions of the Legislature should be limited to a certain time—if that was public sentiment—the Convention could safely leave the settlement of the question with the people and their representatives. There were a great many things of this kind that could be safely left to the healthful action of public sentiment.

As to the examples adduced of other States, for one, he did not think it necessary to follow them. He believed the people of Indiana knew what they were about; and he thought they would send representatives here to carry out their will and enact such laws as they wanted.

Pending the question,

On motion by Mr. SHOUP, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The question being upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Decatur to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Clark,

Mr. RITCHEY hoped the Convention would adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Clark. They had been told that the State had suffered much from vicious legislation since the Legislature of 1842 had thought proper to limit their sessions to six weeks. Now, if they would compare the legislation under the six weeks rule to that which they had when the Legislature was in the habit of sitting from ten to twelve weeks, there was no question that the legislation under the six weeks rule was as good, and as much approved of by the people of the State, as under the twelve weeks rule. No winter had passed since the adoption of the six weeks rule without efforts having been made to abolish it—every effort having proved abortive—and this proved most conclusively to him that the people of the State had approved of the limitation; and he hoped that some restriction of the kind would be engrafted on the Constitution. If the Legislature, in six weeks, had been able to do all the business of legislation heretofore, he could not but think that sixty days were amply sufficient to transact all the business to be done in future, especially when it was remembered that special and local legislation were to be abolished. No evil could result from such a proposition. The great object of the people in calling the Convention together was, to effect a retrenchment in the expenditure of the State; but the mere adoption of biennial sessions, allowing the Legislature to sit twice as long as they now sit, would not effect the retrenchment desired.

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Foley) on the table.

The question being taken, the motion was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to amend by striking out the present number, and inserting "42." I am in favor of the general principle introduced by my friend on the left (Mr. Read) My opinion is that we ought to make the time shorter. This subject was advocated in my section of the country; and when it was proposed that the term of the sittings of the Legislature should be reduced, it was urged that as biennial sessions would hereafter obtain, those sessions would be as much longer in proportion. If the Convention should conclude to do away with all special and local legislation, "six weeks" would be amply sufficient. I believe it is well known that I am no demagogue. [Great laughter, and cries of "consent, consent."] I do not doubt, Mr. President, that gentlemen will "consent" to that, because I believe it is well understood to be true. But, inasmuch as my friend from Clark wishes to introduce a principle with which we have nothing to do, I want to carry it out, and when I say that, in doing so, I am satisfying the wishes of my constituents, that is enough to satisfy me. I, therefore, propose to strike out "60," and insert "42."

Mr. JOHNSON moved to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster) on the table,

Which was agreed to.

Mr. KILGORE. I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Read,) on the table.

Mr. READ. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Butler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hitt, Hogan, Kent, Kilgore, Maguire, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, and Mr. President—47.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Bascom, Beeson, Bicknell, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Logan, March, May, McClelland, Milligan, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—68.

So the amendment was not laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN proposed to amend the amendment, by adding the following words:

"Or to sessions at which a general revision of the laws may be made."

Mr. H. said he would not occupy the time of the Convention in discussing this amendment. It would be manifest to the Convention that, if the time were limited to "60" days, an exception ought to be made in respect to the sessions to which he had referred.

Mr. RITCHEY said, that at the passage of the present Revised Statutes, the length of the session was only ten weeks, and much time, out of that, was occupied in electing officers, and doing other legislative business; and if they could get through with so large a book as the present volume of Revised Statutes, besides doing the usual business, the same thing could be done again.

Mr. DOBSON said he thought the gentleman from Johnson (Mr. Ritchey) had forgotten the time that had elapsed since this volume was made. It should be remembered, too, that the revision of the statutes was made the duty of the Governor—that competent persons were employed by him to do the work, and that four-fifths of the statutes as revised, were passed upon by the Legislature, at once. He thought the amendment was a good one; and he should vote for it.

Mr. MILLER said it would be remembered that the Revised Statutes were read by the title only; and that not a single gentleman knew what revision had been made. He was present himself, and he knew no more of what was in the Revised Statutes, than "the man in the moon."

Mr. CHAPMAN. This is another blow at the legislative department. As I have said before, repeatedly, the weight of this Convention seems to be directed, almost exclusively, against the legislative body—weakening its authority at every point, and at the same time conferring additional power upon the executive department. Gentlemen seem to forget that we have adopted the system of biennial sessions. In addition to that, we have had propositions for the reduction of representation, which would have carried, doubtless, had not gentlemen discovered, during the discussion, that many of the medium sized, as well as the small counties, would lose their Representatives. Then followed a proposition, placing all special sessions exclusively under the control of the Governor. We shall confine the Legislature to the enactment of general laws, to pass which, we require the votes of a majority of all the members of both Houses. These last rules I subscribe to in full. They are more important, practically, in restraining bad legislation, than even the division of the legislative body into two Houses. With the biennial arrangement, and these stringent rules, we have gone far enough, without adopting the measure now suggested by the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read).

We have been referred to the eastern States, by the author of this proposition. New York, alone, I believe, has adopted such a restriction; but then, New York, like all the rest of those States, maintain annual, and not biennial sessions, though they have not half the need of annual legislation that we have. I would vote for limited annual sessions. I have, all along, preferred such a system to the biennial; but for one, I cannot consent to confine the power of the people, in the great matter of legislation, under any and all circumstances, to a six or eight week's session, for a period of two years.

It is admitted that public opinion shortened the sessions under the annual system. An enlightened public sentiment is still sufficient under the biennial arrangement. I would rather trust to such a sentiment, than to such a Constitutional interdiction of the kind proposed. We are running to extremes, and to extremes which are altogether anti-republican. I cannot sanction a course so thoughtless and extravagant, and, therefore, shall vote against this additional restriction.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I know that the Convention is not willing to hear anything like discussions, and I have been very unwilling to say anything upon this subject. I am one of those who thinks that it takes considerable time to legislate for a great State. I believe it requires a considerable amount of mind to legislate to advantage for any people, and the greater the amount of mind and care expended upon legislation, the better it will be. We have already agreed to have biennial sessions; and let me inquire of this, the most enlightened body that has ever assembled within the State, whether they believe that legislation for all future time can be done in six weeks out of every two years! Let us look over the ground, and try and turn the attention of gentlemen to what they will have to do. It will be the duty of the Legislature to overlook the fiscal action of the State of Indiana, to pass laws, to levy taxes, and to overlook the Auditor's and Treasurer's books; and I would ask gentlemen whether they can overlook these accurately, and understand them, in less than three weeks! That will take one-half of the time. The State is going to have a system of banking, and their reports will be made to the Legislature. They will also have a great system of railroads and internal improvements, and reports and returns will have to be made to the Legislature, which that body will have to overlook. We shall have a system of incorporations all over the State, because, if the State is improved at all, it will have to be done by incorporated bodies, and the Legislature will have to look over their proceedings; and with all this to do, what time will be left out of six weeks, to govern the affairs of Indiana?

Mr. President, in the process of time—in less than thirty years—the reports made to the Legislature, and the documents they will have to overlook and investigate, will be such that no sensible set of men can do it in six weeks.

Mr. President, I have indicated these things, for the purpose of calling the attention of gentlemen better calculated to talk and think on the subject than I am, so that they may give their opinions here. But, Mr. President, I am in favor of a reasonable limit to legislation, and if the Convention were to come out and say, by a positive clause in the Constitution, that the Legislature should not exceed a definite limit, in which they should hold their sessions, then we should be acting wisely. Suppose we say that the Legislature shall not exceed ninety days in their sessions, and that we give them that time to do their work in satisfactorily. There should be a limit for this reason: the State of Indiana is a great State now, and is going to be still greater, and hence the necessity for setting a limit to the Legislature. And why? Because we leave it to the Legislature to settle the compensation, and in the process of time, the people will make the office of Representative a very respectable one, in point of compensation. The people will regard a small item of that kind but little, and Legislators will come here and stay for months on months, with an increased compensation. Have we not evidence on this subject? Look at the Congress of the United States. The long sessions of Congress usually lasted five months, and from that they have extended into ten months, and very shortly we shall find them held all the year round.

Mr. President, I think we ought to have a limit fixed, beyond which they should not go. I am in favor of allowing them a reasonable time—not forty-two, nor sixty days; but I think they should not exceed ninety days. In that time, they would have ample opportunity to revise your laws, to investigate all the multifarious concerns of the State, and to act wisely upon all matters that may come before them.

Mr. WALPOLE. It seems to me that it is important we should adopt the principle offered in the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Clarke, (Mr. Read,) as to the term the Legislature shall hold their sessions. Without the adoption of some such provision, all the object to be obtained by biennial sessions, will be defeated. The object of that provision, I apprehend, was to reduce the expenses of the Government. If no restriction of that kind is adopted, it will be as the gentleman from Ripley says—the Legislature will continue for months in session, and the object of the amendment of the Constitution, will be defeated. But it is to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, that I would more particularly address myself. He proposes that this restriction should not operate as to sessions at which a revision of the statutes is to take place. Sir, does not every gentleman see how easy it would be to avoid the effect of such a provision? All that would be necessary, would be for the General Assembly to resolve to go into a revision of the statutes, and this they might do every two years.

Mr. HARDIN moved the previous question, which was sustained.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. Holman, and it was rejected.

The question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. Read, the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and were taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beeson, Bicknell, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dick, Dobson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Logan, March, May, McClelland, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Stevenson, Thomas, Trimby, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—66.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Jones, Kent, Kilgore, Maguire, Mather, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, and Mr. President—55.

Mr. HOLMAN. I merely rise to inquire whether the previous question applies to the section!

The PRESIDENT. The previous question is exhausted. It extends only to the main question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following amendment; Add "Or to sessions at which there shall be a general revision of the laws."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Dearborn, that that amendment has just been voted down, and it is not therefore in order to offer it again.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is different in phraseology.

The PRESIDENT. It is the same in substance.

The question was then taken on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading, and a division being called for, there were ayes 46, noes 50.

So the section was not ordered to be engrossed.

EX POST FACTO LAWS.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention will now proceed to the next section.

The section was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"No ex post facto law, or law either impairing the obligation of or giving effect to contracts, otherwise void, shall ever be passed."

Mr. McCLELLAND proposed the following as a substitute for the section:

"Laws made to punish for actions done before the existence of such laws, and which have not been declared crimes by preceding laws, are unjust and oppressive, and inconsistent with the fundamental principles of free government; and laws impairing the obligations of contracts, shall never be passed."

Mr. MATHER moved to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. McCLELLAND demanded the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered and taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Logan, Maguire, Mather, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—89.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Chandler, Chenowith, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Garvin, Hardin, Hawkins, Hogin, Kinley, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Milligan, Morgan, Pepper of Ohio, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Walpole, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—34.

So the proposed substitute for the section was laid upon the table.

Mr. BIDDLE moved to amend the section by striking out the word "either" in the 128th line, and the words "or giving effect to," and "otherwise void," so as to make it read as follows:

"No ex post facto law or law impairing the obligations of contracts, shall ever be passed."

Mr. B. said that that was the form in which he thought the section ought to be passed. A contract was an agreement between individuals, and the Legislature never had the power with or without a constitutional restriction, to make a contract for any man whatever, and therefore a contract otherwise void, never could be put in force merely by legislative enactment. The words of the section, however, might have another meaning, and if they should have such meaning then he thought the section ought not to pass in that shape. If it was meant that the Legislature should not pass any healing provision to imperfect records, or imperfect contracts, then it should not pass.

Now the words "ex post facto" simply applied to criminal proceedings, and never had any other application. A strict translation of the phrase might give it another and a somewhat different meaning, but that was the sense in which it had always been used, and so far as judicial proceedings were concerned, it only applied to criminal law. But if the power was carried so far as to deprive the Legislature of the right to make that perfect which is only imperfect in regard to some matter of form, they would deprive that body of one of its most useful attributes. For example, township proceedings and sometimes the proceedings of counties were informal, owing to the then existing state of the law, and it was found necessary to pass acts legalizing those proceedings, because they would be void without this healing application. There was a large class of contracts, too, in the nature of bonds of our public officers, which without legislative enactment would often be voidable. Statutes sometimes provide particular forms of contracts, which, however, are not always observed, and then it is found necessary to pass another general statute providing that if they do not have the exact literal form they shall nevertheless be good. Now if we cut off from the Legislature this power, we cut off from them a very essential one. I presume that the reporting of the section in this form, arose on the supposition that the words "ex post facto" applied to civil as well as to criminal proceedings, which they do not. Let us hold of course to the old rule that no ex post facto law shall be passed, but let us leave to the Legislature the right to heal up all these defects and make good that which was voidable at the time, because it is by consent and for the benefit of all the parties concerned, that these civil matters should be made good. It is in the experience of every man who has had to adjudicate law, that this kind of legislation is frequently necessary to perfect that which our courts could never cure. It strikes me therefore, that this provision as it stands in the section, is an alarming one — one that should not pass. I could present many other reasons than those I have already given, did time and opportunity offer. What I ask the Convention to do, is at least to pause for a moment if they do not see the full force of my remark. But if it is the deliberate intention of the Convention to pass it, of course I shall submit to the will of the majority.

Mr. BRIGHT. I propose to substitute the 18th section of the first article of the old Constitution, which is as follows:

"No ex post facto law nor any law impairing the validity of contracts shall ever be made, and no conviction shall work corruption of blood nor forfeiture of estate."

Mr. B. said he entertained great doubt as to the propriety of inserting the section as reported by the committee. There had been on instance in which a contract which was void was made valid by subsequent legislation—a case of usurious interest. It was no doubt with reference to that particular case, that the report was made by the committee. The more he reflected on this subject, the more he saw the impropriety of so restricting the Legislature that they should not have the power to cure that class of defects which have been so well pointed out by the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle). An instance occurred a few years ago, in our State, in which the Legislature gave effect to a marriage which was otherwise void on the ground that the husband had another wife living in another State. After being married to his second wife some eighteen or twenty years, and in that time accumulated property, it was ascertained that he had another wife living in another State, to whom his property should have lawfully belonged, if the Legislature had not interposed. The Legislature did interpose and legalized the second marriage, which would otherwise have been void and his first wife would have been entitled to claim that which he had acquired while living with his second wife. The same defects in regard to township business and to business in your county and circuit court, which not unfrequently require application to the Legislature to legalize their proceedings, would prevent the adoption of this provision to the original section, or even if it were adopted it would not be competent for the Legislature to grant redress to that class of cases, and I believe in no instance has any wrong been done. The case in which effect was given to a usurious contract may be thought to be a hard one, but while the party was relieved from paying usury, he was required to pay what was right. For myself, I would much prefer to see the section of the old Constitution adopted. I think it is altogether better.

Mr. BIDDLE. The class of contracts to which the gentleman from Jefferson refers, I do not regard as contracts to be affected by the section under consideration. They stand in the light of contracts which have been discharged or to which there is a good legal defense. But I have not risen to detain the Convention. I will withdraw my amendment for the present to give the gentleman from Jefferson an opportunity of offering his.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion to strike out the section and insert what has been read.

Mr. HOVEY. I think, Mr. President, it should be the aim of the Convention to make the Constitution as concise and as brief as possible, and not to surcharge it with matter entirely unnecessary. If gentlemen will look at the Constitution of the United States, section 1st, article 10th, they will find that this ground is entirely covered. The Constitution of Indiana is above all other law of the State, and the Constitution of the United States is above all other law in the States. Believing, therefore, that both the section and amendment are unnecessary, I move to lay them both upon the table.

The question being taken on the motion, it was not agreed to.

Mr. NAVÉ. I propose to amend the amendment by inserting the following in its proper place: "or to affect the enforcement of remedies." [Cries of "No, no."] One word, Mr. President, before gentlemen cry "no." I admit that the proposition offered by myself, proposes to make a radical change in the organic law of the State, but I hope that gentlemen will not prejudice it until I have an opportunity of explaining the objects of it and its effect upon the country. This proposition is not only true in regard to what fell from the gentleman from Jefferson, but it seeks to secure to every man in the State for all time to come, that whenever a contract is made between two individuals in good faith, with an eye to the law which may be in force at the time, the Legislature should not make any law affecting the parties at the time of this remedy. Gentlemen may have learned this fact, that in consequence of legislation in Indiana, under the old Constitution, by which the Legislature affected the remedies, that legislation has entailed curses upon us instead of blessings. Then why not incorporate in the Constitution a provision, that the law in force at the time of making the contract, shall be the law in force until the contract is wound up? Why should we permit the Legislature to annihilate contracts by their action that are already made? I ask gentlemen if there is anything in the proposition that is contrary to justice; anything that violates the first principles of honesty? If there is, I should suppose it ought to be voted down. But if it is full of justice, and honesty, and equity, it should not be voted down, but incorporated in the Constitution.

Mr. DOBSON. If gentlemen will reflect for a moment, they will see that there is no necessity for this provision. It is quite true that laws have been passed, violative of contracts, but if gentlemen will remember, it was the Constitution of the State that was looked to, and not the Constitution of the United States. There was a variance between the Constitution of the United States and that of the State of Indiana. The Constitution of the United States says that no ex post facto law shall be passed, nor any law impairing the "obligation" of contracts. Now, what says the old Constitution of the State? It says "no ex post facto law shall be passed impairing the 'validity' of contracts." In the one case it is "obligation," and in the other "validity," and we did not impair the validity of the contracts referred to but the obligation. If we would use the words used in the Constitution of the United States, then the provision would be broad enough, and every individual would have his rights.

Mr. RARIDEN. I do hope that the Convention will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Hendricks. The effect of it will be to perpetuate vicious legislation. Now, if I understand the philosophy of government, it is something like this: When we enter into the compact of government, we surrender a very important right—that of redressing our own wrongs. The Government stipulates the remedies for the evils inflicted upon us, and if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, the effect of it will be that if we have vicious legislation with regard to remedies, so far as contracts are affected under that legislation, they would be perpetuated forever. I trust, therefore, that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. PETTIT. I concur most heartily with what has fallen from the gentleman from Posey—that there is no earthly use in putting this proposed clause into the Constitution. It is effectively, and in better language in the Constitution of the United States, which is the paramount law of the land. Any enactment contravening the Constitution of the United States, would be void entirely. The clause upon this subject expressly applies to the States. I shall not go into a dissertation or detail of the different powers, or grants, or restrictions in the Constitution of the United States, many of them apply to the United States delegating authority to the United States as a Government, and others again, restrict the United States as a Government, in the exercise of their power. And then, again, there is another clause that restricts all the States, by which the States themselves, in their own Government, stipulated to be bound. There is a good reason why this clause has been put there. In the Constitution of the United States the provision is that no State shall pass any ex post facto law, nor any law impairing the obligations of contracts. If this restriction had not been made a contract, might be made in New York by a party, who, coming to reside in Indiana, might be set at liberty from his obligation. Hence all the States are thus bound together, to give effect and force to contracts in the several States. Sir, we would have precisely a re-enactment of the policy of Texas without such a provision in the Constitution of the United States. It is well known that with the avowed policy of inducing emigrants to go to that State, she passed laws tantamount to relieving all persons from contracts made in other States, providing that after a residence in Texas for so many years the doors of her courts should be closed against claims made upon any citizen who had fled from the United States. It was for that purpose that the clause was put in; and by reading it, it will be found to apply strictly and literally to the States. "No State shall enter into a treaty," &c., "grant letters of marque," &c., "bill of attainder," &c., ex post facto law," &c.;—the States are all restricted from doing any of these things. That law is paramount to anything we can enact. There is, therefore, no necessity for this provision at all. But if the Convention is desirous of re-enacting this—and we do, and have re-enacted many of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, in the various Constitutions in the States, and in anticipation of one thing that is clamored about some little here, and a great deal more elsewhere, I say in anticipation of Vermont and South Carolina getting by the horns and dissolving this Union, and it, like Sampson, they should be enabled to tumble this fabric to the ground, it may be well enough to provide for a form of Government to enable us to exist as a sovereign power of the earth; and for that purpose, and with reference to that calamity, it may be necessary to put in this clause. But, supposing we take this precaution—for a great many men carry their umbrellas in sunny weather—we, like prudent men, in laying the foundations of our Government, will lay them broad enough to provide for all contingencies. I believe it is now in order to perfect the section. The motion now is to strike out the section and insert the provision of the old Constitution. I will move to amend the section by striking out the word "either" and inserting the word "contracts" after the word "of;" then it will read:

"No ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, shall ever be passed."

The question being taken on the amendment it was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) to that of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright).

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Jefferson to strike out the section and insert the section of the old Constitution on the subject.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope that will not be stricken out. In the section of the old constitution, there are some words which there can be no necessity for, and no propriety in. Such for instance as "no conviction shall work corruption of blood," &c., Is there any probability, or any possibility that any member would ever come to the Legislature, with that idea in his head. That can have no reference to contracts.

Mr. NEWMAN. I would just appeal to the gentleman's own argument in reference to the States falling to loggerheads. Although there is no prospect of anything of the kind at present, we do not know what may occur in time to come, or what emergencies may arise. If there should be a great political commotion, we do not know what may be done. It seems to me well enough even at this period of time, to guard against that contingency.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. Bright, to strike out the section, and insert the provision in the old Constitution, and it was not stricken out.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL LEGISLATION.

Mr. READ of Monroe, offered the following as an additional section:

"No law shall be passed the taking of effect of which, shall be made to depend upon any authority, except as provided in this Constitution."

It is a late hour said Mr. R., and I fear, not a propitious time for introducing a principle requiring grave consideration.

The design of the section which I have proposed, is to cut off a species of Legislation, not recognized by any American Constitution; and which, until within a few years past, was never heard of in any State. A law is passed not complete and effective, when it goes through the forms required by the Constitution to give it the validity of a law, but is made to take effect upon a vote of the people approving it. It is a species of legislation which has never been demanded by the people, and in the only State, where the Constitutionality of such legislation has been tested by the highest courts, has been declared unconstitutional. I have no doubt but a similar decision would be made by our own Supreme Court, in regard to all such law making. It has been resorted to for the mere purpose of evading responsibility, and is I think generally condemned.

In the case of the school law, the mode of submitting it to a vote of the people however intended, amounted to little else than a fraud. The question propounded to the voters was, "are you in favor of free schools," if "yes" was the answer, he was thereupon to be set down as voting in favor of the long school law, which in nineteen cases out of twenty, if not in a larger proportion, the voters had not even read.

One would think that the provision of this section is implied in every Constitution directing the manner in which laws are to be enacted; and therefore not necessary to be expressed in direct terms upon the face of the Constitution. But the strange practice which has crept in, originating from whatever motives, requires to be met by a direct Constitutional provision.

It would seem to be an axiom, that there shall be no legislation except as prescribed in the Constitution, and that no law shall depend upon any authority except as provided by the Constitution.

If the people are to be called upon to act as a kind of lower House in the passage of laws; let us adopt the plan in the Constitution itself; and in that case, it will be hardly necessary to have two Houses at Indianapolis, in order to propound bills for the people to adopt or reject. I do not however think, that such a mode of making laws, in the march of progress, is yet required by the people of Indiana.

Mr. RARIDEN thought this was a very important section, and ought to receive the careful deliberation of the Convention.

Mr. FOLEY moved the previous question, which was sustained.

The main question was then ordered to be put, and the question being on the adoption of the section, it was adopted, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. MAGUIRE offered an additional section to the following effect:

"That the members of the General Assembly shall receive for their services, a compensation, not exceeding three dollars per day, but that no increase of compensation should take place at the session at which such increase might be made."

Pending the question on the adoption of the section, the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, DEC. 21, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MILLS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the Auditor of State, containing an abstract of the expenses of Circuit and Probate Courts, chargeable upon the respective county treasuries, for the year 1849. The abstract embraces all the counties in the State, except Blackford, Crawford, Elkhart, and Posey, from which there have been no returns.

In the 86 counties reported, the footings of the table are as follows:

Amount paid	Probate Judges, - -	$717 00
"	" Associate Judges, -	7,397 25
"	" Grand Jurors, - -	14,323 15
"	" Petit Jurors, - -	21,039 95
"	" Sheriffs, - -	7,864 40
"	" Bailiffs, Clerks, &c., -	14,388 85
		$65,730 60

In several of the counties, the accounts of the Grand and Petit juries are not separated. Dividing the sum equally, the expense of the Grand Jury would be $15,372 98, and of the Petit Jury, $19,990 21.

The communication having been read, it was ordered "That it lie upon the table, and that it be printed."

This being the day set apart for resolutions, The Convention proceeded to the consideration of those heretofore offered.

The resolution offered on a former day by Mr. Read of Monroe, in relation to the continuance in office of the State officers after the adoption of the new Constitution, was taken up.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. READ of Monroe. My general impression had been, that with the new Constitution, we should have a new set of officers.—That in this respect, we should have a new dispensation.—That we should make a tabula rasa, a clean sweep. I have not had, nor do I now have, any feeling upon the subject. The decision which has been made by the Convention in regard to county officers, may be best. I voted for it. But it seems to me right, that we should adopt the same rule in regard to State and county officers. If we constitutionize one set of officers out, we should constitutionize all out. If we retain one class of officers, that we should retain all. I want a uniform rule.

It has been said that county officers were elected by the people, but not the State officers. But it must be remembered that all equally received their offices, under the Constitution. State officers as well as county, received their offices in the just expectation, that they would be permitted to serve out their terms. State officers, not less than county, have made their arrangements in accordance with this just expectation. If removal, by the terms of the new Constitution is a hardship in the one case, it is not the less so in the other.

There are President Judges in the different parts of the State, who have given up a practice in the law for their place on the bench. There may be State officers at the seat of government, whose terms of office will not have expired upon the adoption of the new Constitution. In these cases, the officers would have some claims, if we admit such claims in any case. I know not how the proposed provision will affect any single State officer. I have not made the inquiry. No one of these officers has spoken to me. But it seems to me right, that the rule which we adopt, should be the same for all officers.

County officers are numerous. State officers are few. I will not for a moment suppose that the influence coming from every county in the State, will induce the Convention to have great respect and consideration for many officers; while the few, from the less general influence which they can exert, will be overlooked, and their interests and feelings disregarded.

The simple rule of equality, without regard to numbers, is all that I want, and for this reason, I hope the resolution will prevail.

Mr. BASCOM moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Read of Clarke, in relation to future amendments of the Constitution, to be separately submitted to the people, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick said, he was of the opinion that if power were given to the Legislature to take action in reference to amending the Constitution from time to time, the result would be that half of the time of each session would be spent in that way. Men would come up to the Legislature from different portions of the State, and bring a favorite proposition for amending the Constitution, and long discussions would ensue, and finally it would cost the State more to amend and improve the Constitution in that way, than the calling of a Convention once in ten or fifteen years would cost. He thought the proposition ought to be rejected, and he would move that it be laid upon the table, were it not that he did not wish to prevent gentlemen from expressing their views in relation to the subject.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to amend the resolution by striking out "a majority of the qualified voters," and inserting "a majority of all the votes cast for and against the same."

Mr. READ of Clark. I accept the amendment as a modification of my resolution.

Mr. STEVENSON. I look upon it as one of the most important questions that have been or have to be acted upon by this Convention. Gentlemen must be very well satisfied, I think, by this time, that it will be no easy or brief task for the Convention to remodel the whole Constitution. It will take this Convention at least four months to do it; whereas, if there had been a provision of this kind in the old Constitution, the necessary amendments might have been made with a very trifling expense. I say it is one of the most important provisions that will come before the Convention; and it is not a new proposition; it is one that has been adopted by a number of the States. There is a similar provision in the Constitution of the United States, that amendments may be proposed by Congress, and if agreed to by three-fourths of the States, such amendments shall become a part of the Constitution. I believe that Pennsylvania was the first State that adopted a provision of this kind in her Constitution. New York has adopted a similar provision, and so has Wisconsin and some other States. I hope that gentlemen will not insist upon laying the proposition upon the table, because it is a meritorious provision, and one which I feel satisfied ought to meet with the approbation of the Convention.

Mr. WOLFE. I am in hopes that this resolution will be adopted. It is a matter that has been discussed to some extent before the people, and they expect that a provision of this kind will be incorporated in the Constitution. As has been remarked by the gentleman from Putnam, if there had been a provision like this in the present Constitution, there would have been no necessity for calling this Convention. I hope that the necessity for calling another may be avoided by the introduction of this clause into the amended Constitution. I would suggest the propriety of referring this resolution to a committee of thirteen, one from each congressional district, inasmuch as the whole State is interested in the matter.

Mr. COOKERLY. I move to amend the resolution, by making it a resolution of inquiry.

The PRESIDENT. There is an amendment already pending.

Mr. RITCHEY. As the chairman of the committee on future amendments of the Constitution, it is perhaps due to the Convention that I should state that the committee met, and proposed to take the subject under advisement, but in consideration of the immense amount of business before us we have not thought it important, as yet, to act upon it. Most of the reports now before the Convention have, perhaps, never been read; and unless the Convention intend to tie our hands, I think it is quite unnecessary to adopt a provision of this kind. The committee do not like to be trammelled by positive instructions until they had made their report. The committee were waiting for the Convention to make some progress with other matters. If we make a good Constitution, there will be little necessity for inserting a provision for its alteration.

Mr. READ of Clark. The gentleman who has just taken his seat, intimates that this resolution is prematurely introduced; that we should wait a few weeks longer. Sir, I have been in expectation that some proposition in relation to this subject would be introduced. I regard it, and I have no doubt the whole Convention regard it, as an important matter. Why should we not settle it at this time as well as at any other? I accept the amendment of the gentleman on my right, as a modification of my resolution. It is precisely what I intended. I do not claim this proposition as being original. I copied it, with some little alteration, from the Constitutions of some of the other States; and, as has been observed, I do not believe there has been a Constitution formed within a few years past, that does not contain a provision relative to its amendment.

Let us examine the case for a moment. As my friend on my right says, suppose such a provision had been contained in the present Constitution, the State would not have been under the necessity of expending some eighty thousand dollars in the calling of this Convention. There were but few of its provisions that required amendment, and those amendments could have been easily made by the Legislature with the approbation of the people, they having the opportunity to accept or reject the proposed amendments. The gentleman from Putnam says that it will create continued legislation. Sir, there is another point of the section which will prevent that. There is a provision which directs that amendments to the Constitution shall be laid before the people only once in ten years. If then any provision that we may adopt in the amended Constitution, should prove to be oppressive or injurious in its effects an amendment may be adopted by the Legislature, and submitted to the people for their ratification. If there should be a change of popular sentiment in relation to the establishment of a State bank, or in relation to the negro question, or in relation to the rights of married women, and a change should be desired in any provision that we shall make in reference to any of those subjects, instead of calling a Convention at the expense of some eighty thousand dollars, the amendments could be made without burthening the people with any expense whatever. I think our present condition admonishes us that such a provision ought to be adopted. We have been in session eleven weeks, and we are not yet able to say when our work will be completed. Indeed the end seems to be as far off now as it was at the commencement of our session. Forty or fifty members are now absent, although perhaps if they stay away altogether we shall get along just as well. I apprehend the country will not suffer much by their absence; but, sir, they come back here and move to re-consider what has been done in their absence, and we have to go over the whole ground again. This has been the case ever since the commencement. I have never known an instance where there were so many absentees in the case of any deliberative body.

Sir, I will not detain the Convention. I trust that a proposition of this kind will be adopted. I am not particular as to the precise mode, but let us have some provision of this kind—let it be left to the people to say whether they will approve of this or that amendment, and permit the Legislature once in ten years to submit to the people such amendments as may be deemed necessary, and you will avoid all the trouble and expense of calling a Convention.

MR. COOKERLY. I now renew my motion to make the resolution a resolution of inquiry.

THE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam.

MR. COOKERLY. That amendment has been accepted by the gentleman from Clark.

THE PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that it is not in the power of the gentleman to accept the amendment. The Convention has already acted upon the resolution by ordering that it lie over for a week from the time of its introduction; the resolution, therefore, is not now in the power of the gentleman.

MR. OWEN. I agree with my friend from Putnam, that this is one of the most important matters that will come before us; and I further agree with him that some such provision as this ought to be incorporated in the Constitution, for the reason suggested by the gentleman from Clark, and for other reasons. I do not agree, however, with the details of this resolution. In the first place, I think that the latter clause ought to be stricken out. We ought not to say that the people shall not move an amendment to the Constitution, except once in ten years; and in the next place, I think that any amendment proposed to be made, ought to be submitted to two successive Legislatures, and to be voted for by a majority, at least, of the Legislature, before being submitted to the vote of the people.

We adopted a section yesterday, which I think a very good one, on the motion of the gentleman from Monroe, on my right, (Mr. Read,) which provides that a law shall not be submitted to the people, but that the Legislature shall take the responsibility of their own acts. But in the organic law, it is a very different matter. We do not propose that the organic law shall be in the power of the Legislature.

Now, I think, if it be made imperative that an amendment proposed to be made in the Constitution, shall be voted for by two successive Legislatures, to be elected with reference to that particular subject, the question will be debated before the people, and they will send Senators and Representatives here with a special reference to that question. This, it appears to me, will be a sufficient guard against improper and ill-advised amendments, without restricting the action of the Legislature to periods of ten years.

MR. BORDEN. I entirely disagree with the gentleman from Posey, in regard to the propriety of conferring upon the Legislature the power to submit propositions to the people to amend the Constitution. I think it would be better to retain a provision similar to that in the old Constitution, that a vote shall be taken on the question of calling a Convention once in ten or twelve years, and that if a vote on the question of calling a Convention at any other time than at the regular period, should be taken, a provision should be inserted similar to that in the old Constitution of Kentucky, that the Legislature should pass a law submitting the question to the electors, and they should twice vote in its favor, before a Convention should be held, other than at the regular period. I think that if we leave it in the power of the Legislature, or by a simple majority to propose amendments, this evil will result: there will be frequent changes made in the organic law, and a necessity will be created for the calling of a Convention in order to modify the provisions thus made in a hasty manner by the Legislature. I think this Conventions should be called sometimes; but if we give to the Legislature the power to act whenever they think proper upon this subject, having taken away from them local and special legislation, in order to have something to do they will go to work upon the Constitution, and amendment after amendment will be made, and in a few years you will not be able to tell what the Constitution is. Sir, I am for having the question of calling a convention to amend the Constitution submitted once in ten years. I oppose giving the Legislature the power to change the Constitution whenever they think proper. And I am in favor of placing in the Constitution this guard, that before the question of calling a Convention shall be submitted to the people it shall receive the sanction of two successive Legislatures; but I am decidedly opposed to giving the Legislature the power to amend the Constitution, or to propose amendments whenever they think proper.

Mr. DOBSON. The question is, I believe, on referring the matter to a committee.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam.

Mr. DOBSON. I shall not argue this question, sir, as to the propriety of inserting a provision of this kind in the Constitution; but I think myself that we should refer the matter to a committee; and I apprehend that that course will meet the approbation of the Convention. A provision of this kind ought to be very carefully guarded. Amendments should not be frequently made to the Constitution. The organic law should be stable, and not subject to frequent changes. I am for having the matter deliberated upon by a committee before we adopt it. I move that the subject be referred to a committee as a matter of inquiry.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that the resolution proposes a reference to a committee.

The question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. COOKERLY. I now move to amend by inserting the words "inquire into the expediency of."

The amendment was agreed to, and

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

THE TIPPECANOE BATTLE GROUND.

Mr. PETTIT offered a resolution directing the committee on the public institutions of the State to inquire into the expediency of incorporating a provision in the Constitution providing for the permanent inclosure of the Tippecanoe battle ground, donated to the State by the late General John Tipton.

I take it, said Mr. P., that this is a duty incumbent upon the State, and inasmuch as the Legislature does not perform it, it is proper, I think, that a Constitutional provision be made in relation to it.

It will be recollected—or it will be seen by reference to the history of this matter—not to go back to a very early period, that the Legislature, by a joint resolution, passed, I believe, in the year 1834, directed Governor Noble to open a correspondence with Gen. Tipton, the owner of the ground, to know upon what terms he would transfer it to the State. Gen. Tipton returned an answer, generously refusing to take any compensation for the ground, but offering to deed it in fee simple to the State, provided the Legislature would keep it inclosed, in order, as he said, that the bones of his companions in arms should be kept from being disturbed—that the ground where they reposed should be protected from the walks of men. Upon the receipt of that communication the Governor laid it before the Legislature, and the Legislature, on the 7th of January, 1835, passed a resolution authorizing the Governor to accept the donation upon the conditions specified, and to take possession of the ground by himself, or by a special agent, and enclose the same. I have not the letter of Gen. Tipton before me, but I have the joint resolution that was passed by the Legislature.

In a conversation that I had with the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Pepper,) last evening, he informed me that he was the bearer of the letter from the Governor to Gen. Tipton, and that he also brought back Gen. Tipton's answer. He was the Indian Agent, and resided at Logansport. In the letter of Gen. Tipton, he says, there was the express condition that I have mentioned, namely: that he would convey the ground to the State, provided the State would keep it inclosed thereafter. I will remark further, while I am up, that this resolution is not peremptory, but simply a resolution of inquiry. I hope the Convention will allow the matter to go to the committee, and that they will take the trouble to procure the correspondence, if it can be found, and the deed by which the ground was transferred to the State; and if it be found to contain the stipulation that I have mentioned, I think there can certainly be no objection to adopting the provision which I have suggested, and placing it in the Constitution.

The resolution was adopted by unanimous consent.

PLURALITY OF OFFICES.

Mr. HOLMAN offered a resolution directing the committee on miscellaneous provisions to inquire into the propriety of ingrafting into the Constitution the following section:

"SEC. —, No person who shall have been elected to and accepted any civil office of profit under this State, shall be eligible to any other office of profit during the continuance of the term for which he may have been elected:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to extend to persons elected or appointed to any township, town, or municipal office."

[Cries of "No! no!" and "Consent!"]

I hope, said Mr. H., gentlemen will not object to the adoption of this resolution, as it is merely one of inquiry.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. OWEN offered a resolution to the effect that the sections of the new Constitution that are already passed be printed for the use of the Convention, and that the sections hereafter passed be printed weekly.

I will state to the Convention, said Mr. O., that I believe I am the only member of this body who has an opportunity of examining all the sections as they are passed. They come into my possession as chairman of the committee on revision. Members are frequently desirous of looking over what they have already done; and I think it will be a great convenience to have them printed.

Mr. KELSO. I do not rise to oppose the resolution, but merely to inquire whether a resolution heretofore passed does not cover the ground—whether it does not authorize the committee of which the gentleman is chairman, to print the resolutions as they are passed by the Convention, and also the sections as amended by the committee on revision, in order that they may be laid side by side before the Convention, one day at least before we are finally required to vote upon them? It seems to me that there is nothing to prevent the committee from having them printed, if they think proper, and furnishing a copy to each member.

Mr. OWEN. The committee on revision met the other day, and examined with care the resolution alluded to by the gentleman from Switzerland, and we found that it provides, that when we have closed our labors, we shall print, in the first place, the sections as they were sent to us, and then the sections with any changes or alterations that we may make. But this cannot be done until nearly the close of the Convention. There is not yet an article completed, nor nearly completed, and there are many members who desire to have the sections that are passed, before them. It will involve a very trifling expense, and be a great accommodation to the committee, as well as to the members of the Convention generally.

The resolution was adopted.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BORDEN. I have a resolution to offer, and I wish to say this in relation to it: It proposes that the Convention shall adjourn sine die on the 25th of January.

SEVERAL VOICES. "Buncombe!" "Buncombe!"

Mr. BORDEN. If it be thought too early a day, strike out the 25th, and insert a day more remote. But it seems to me that the Convention should at no distant day determine when it will adjourn. I believe that we have but two or three subjects remaining, that will excite much discussion. I suppose there will be some discussion upon the organization of the Courts of Justice, upon the Bank question, and upon law reform. I hope the Convention will fix upon some day for its adjournment.

Mr. TAYLOR. I thought that the renewal of a proposition of this kind had been precluded entirely by indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution is not in order, a similar proposition having been indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BORDEN. I was not present when the vote was taken upon the indefinite postponement of that proposition. Will it be in order to move a re-consideration of that vote?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir. The Chair would remark, that this day a week ago, a resolution proposing to adjourn on the 15th of January, was indefinitely postponed; and the parliamentary rule is, that the subject shall not be again acted upon until the time specified in the resolution shall have elapsed.

REMOVAL.

Mr. BASCOM offered a resolution, that a select committee of three be appointed to wait upon the Governor, Treasurer, and Auditor, and ascertain what arrangements have been made for the accommodation of the Convention, and that said committee proceed forthwith to the execution of that duty.

My reason for offering the resolution, said Mr. BASCOM, is this: It is well known that a day or two ago, we adopted a resolution requiring the State officers to procure for us the Masonic Hall. Rumor says—I do not know whether it be true or not—that no steps have been taken to fit up the Hall for us, because the officers think they have no power to do so; and the Convention well know that it is necessary to take some steps in regard to this matter, without delay, as the time is approaching when the Legislature is to meet. If we stay here until the time of their meeting, we shall be all confusion, and the probability is, that we shall break up in a row.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution, but I will state to the Convention, that I have had a conversation with the Auditor of State, who informed me that they were fitting up the Masonic Hall, and that it would be ready for us on the 26th instant.

Mr. PETTIT. In a conversation that I had with the Governor yesterday, he said that the adoption of the resolution that was passed by the Convention the other day, was regarded as an acceptance of the proposition that has been made to us to give us the use of the Masonic Hall for twelve dollars a day, and that it will be accordingly prepared for us.

Mr. KELSO. If that is the case, there can be no necessity for adopting this resolution.

Mr. PETTIT. I do not object to its adoption. I merely state the fact, that the Hall is being prepared.

Mr. BASCOM. I will withdraw the resolution.

MARTYRS.

Mr. GREGG offered the following preamble and resolution:

"WHEREAS, It is desirable to curtail the expenses of this Convention, so far as it can be done without detriment to the public service.

"And whereas, We have a corps of Stenographers at an expense of some sixty dollars per day, to report the debates of this Convention, which duty can be better performed by the members themselves, and without any additional expense to the State.

"And whereas, We have now employed nine door-keepers at an expense of twenty-seven dollars per day, and it being understood that the Superintendent of the Masonic Hall in this city will hereafter undertake to furnish said building for our accommodation, providing temporary desks for each member, perform all the labor and duties now performed by our door-keepers, furnish all the fuel and lights necessary, &c., and receive in full compensation therefor the amount paid to seven of said door-keepers: Therefore,

"Resolved, That on and after the twenty-fifth instant we will dispense with the further services of a stenographer and all of the door-keepers except the one elected by this body, and that arrangements be made with William Sheets to carry out the foregoing suggestions, as to the cost of the Masonic Hall."

The resolution having been read —

Mr. KELSO. I am decidedly opposed to the passage of these resolutions. The act authorizing the call of this Convention authorized the Governor to appoint a stenographer, and his duties were there prescribed. The Governor, in obedience to that provision of the act, appointed that officer, and we, by resolution, have accepted his services. He, with some half dozen assistants, has been laboring for us from the commencement of our session until now, and this resolution proposes that we shall break up his contract and dismiss him, without regard to the liabilities to which he may have subjected himself with those whom he has employed. I do not know whether we have the power to do so; if we have, it would be a very improper thing to do.

Now as to the door-keepers there may be nine of them, though my opinion is that this is a mistake; but I remember when it used to be customary here to employ an enrolling clerk, and I remember that Mr. Sheets came in with a proposition that he would undertake to do the enrolling for two hundred dollars, a less sum than that paid to the clerk. The arrangement was made, and there have since been great complaints in regard to the loss of bills between the different branches of the Legislature. Some bills, of no ordinary importance, have been lost.

At the commencement of our session gentlemen came from different parts of the State and tendered their services to the Convention; we elected a door-keeper, and he employed assistants; they have learned their duties, and are discharging them faithfully; and now, for the sake of saving five or six dollars a day, it is proposed that we shall turn these men out of employment. It is sufficient that we pay twelve dollars a day for the use of the Hall. I am opposed to dismissing these officers, who have been discharging their duties faithfully. I hope that some gentleman will move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion moved to amend, by adding the following:

"And that Mr. Sheets be authorized to employ a proper person to make a Constitution for the people, without the assistance of the members of this Convention, merely as a matter of economy, for buncombe, and other innumerable reasons."

This proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, said Mr. M., is an old "Monsieur Tonsion." There has been an attempt on the part of those having the control of the Masonic Hall to make the Convention occupy it, almost volens volens. Mr. Sheets made an offer to the officers of State that he would do all the outdoor work of the Convention by contract; they declined the proposition. They were of the opinion, and I believe the people will come to the same conclusion, that the representatives of the people of the State of Indiana know how their affairs should be arranged about as well as Mr. Sheets does. I believe they are not disposed to put the patronage of the Convention into the hands of Mr. Sheets. They like to be their own masters, and have the privilege of managing and regulating their comforts and accommodations to suit themselves, without having an overseer placed over them. I hold to the opinion that we are as capable, at least, of managing the business of the Convention as Mr. Sheets is, and if there are any gentlemen who do not think they are capable of doing their share of the management, they had better resign their seats and go home. There are some gentlemen who seem particularly anxious to spread their fault-finding upon the permanent record. I am not ashamed to record the amendment I have offered in connection with these resolutions, because I think it expresses a feeling which pervades the breasts of some members and which induces them to thrust their propositions continually before the Convention. If we have too many door-keepers let the gentlemen come up manfully and propose to dismiss some of them, but do not let us farm out the work to the lowest bidder. Mr. Sheets may be a very patriotic man, but he has, first and last, under the pretence of economy, cost the public more money than any other man in the State.

Mr. KILGORE. I regret exceedingly that upon every occasion, when this matter has been presented to the Convention, the same attacks have been made upon the Superintendent of of the Masonic Hall. He has had an application made to him for the renting of the Hall, and it was a fair business transaction between the Committee of this Convention, on the one side, and Mr. Sheets on the other. He has a right, as the agent of the stockholders, to submit propositions, and if the Convention are not willing to accept the terms he proposes, there certainly is no harm done. He has a right to make proposals, and the Convention may accept or refuse them, as they may see fit, but this certainly should not be made an apology for attacks upon him by the Convention. Mr. Sheets does nothing more than to say that he will furnish the Hall for the use of the Convention, and supply the necessary attendance, for a certain sum. If gentlemen are not willing to accede to the proposition, let them say so in courteous terms, inasmuch as he has not the privilege of defending himself on this floor.

One word, sir, in regard to the Stenographer: I voted, in the early part of the session, for dispensing with the services of the Stenographer, but I think it would now be doing that officer and his associates great injustice,—now that their places are filled in Congress—it would be doing them great injustice, I say, to dismiss them, even if it were not a violation of contract. That part of the resolution, I oppose. I hope the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Marion will be withdrawn, and that it will not appear on the journal.

Mr. PETTIT. Well, sir, this is resolution day, and we have resolutions, with a vengeance! These resolutions seem to have been introduced with two objects. In the first place, to remove an officer, other than our own. I acknowledge the power of the Convention to remove our own officers, but a proposition is here made to remove, or dispense with the services of the Stenographer, an officer created by law, commissioned by the Governor, and over whom, I repeat, as I stated in the early part of the session, we have no authority. I shall not, therefore, vote for the resolutions, on that account, if for no other.

But a few words to the Convention, in reference to the other branch of the resolutions. What is it? Is it anything more or less than a proposition to elect Mr. Sheets doorkeeper of this Convention? It is that, and that alone. It cannot, by any legerdemain or delusion, be turned into any other than a proposition to elect Mr. Sheets doorkeeper to this Convention.

At the commencement of the session, we elected Mr. Johnson. I believe that Mr. Sheets is the only man in the State who has had the impudence to ask us to remove our doorkeeper.

A MEMBER. "He does not ask that; he only asks that the deputies be removed."

Mr. PETTIT. Well, that is the same thing. He does not want to be principal doorkeeper, but he wants to be deputy doorkeeper. [A laugh.] Now that is the idea. Did any man ever before hear of such a thing as a Convention hiring themselves to be kept by any man? It appears that we are really becoming a menagerie, and are to have Mr. Sheets for our keeper.

Mr. GREGG. The proposition did not come from Mr. Sheets.

Mr. PETTIT. I am glad to hear that it did not. I have always entertained a good opinion of him. I am glad to hear that it proceeds from the mere motion of the gentleman from Jefferson himself, out of his excessive love of economy. I ask any gentleman, did you ever hear of a deliberative body getting officered, or getting themselves taken care of, by any other than the men of their deliberate choice—men who, if they do not serve us well, we can remove, and replace with others? I am for going to Masonic Hall, because it is now certain that we cannot get through with our labors before the meeting of the Legislature. But I am opposed to taking Mr. Sheets in place of our doorkeeper. I would move, only it is a motion that I dislike to make, that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. KENT. I have been waiting for an opportunity to make that motion, but I see the gentleman from Jefferson rising; if he wishes to reply, I will withdraw it.

Mr. GREGG. I do not know, sir, that there has been anything said that calls for a reply from me. Much that has been said with regard to Mr. Sheets, appears to me to have been wholly out of place and uncalled for. That gentleman has made no proposition here that would interfere with the rights of any officer of this body. Knowing that the agent of the Masonic Hall was willing to furnish that building and pay all the expenses of keeping it in order, and waiting on this Convention, for a sum equal to what we are now paying seven of our door-keepers, I took the responsibility, with his consent, to lay the proposition before this body. And I did so mainly to meet the objections of certain gentlemen here, who seemed disposed to make a great ado about the exorbitant rent of the Hall. But finding that economy and retrenchment is not really the paramount object with them, I have modified the resolution so as to strike out all that part relating to door-keepers.

In regard to the Stenographer I desire to say but little—and in saying that little, I have no desire other than to promote the public interost, and the credit of this body, which I fear is becoming a discount among our constituents. I came up to this Convention, sir, fully satisfied of the impolicy of employing a Stenographer, and of reporting and publishing our debates. And I am now more than ever convinced of the correctness of my position in regard to this matter, and I have no doubt but that a large majority of this Convention will now agree with me in opinion, however they may vote on the question now before us, I verily believe, sir, that if the resolution offered by myself on the third day of the session, to decline the services of a Stenographer, had been adopted, it would have saved to the State some $25,000 to $30,000 dollars; and we should have completed our labors ere this to the credit of ourselves and to the satisfaction of the people.

Doubtless the estimate I then made of the probable extent of our debates, was considered wild and extravagant, or the proposition would have met with more favor. You will remember, sir, I then stated that if we availed ourselves of the services of a Stenographer, our debates would not be less than 2400 pages, making three volumes of 800 pages each, and that our daily journal of proceedings would make another volume of about the same magnitude. This estimate was regarded as a mere fancy sketch of mine—and the idea was rather ridiculed by some of the leading members of this body whose influence was then almost omnipotent. My resolution soon found its way to the table without even affording me the poor privilege of recording my vote in favor of it. A committee was subsequently raised to inquire into the probable extent and expense of these debates, of which the gentleman from Warrick (Mr. Graham) was the chairman, who, after reviewing the whole ground, reported that the volume of debates would probably make some 800 pages, and that it would cost about 80 cents per copy for 750 copies, exclusive of the binding—whereupon the Convention then ordered the printing of 750 copies of the debates in book form.

And now, sir, what are the facts of the case in regard to this matter? Why, sir, we have already printed in book form over 1000 pages of the debates, and there is enough matter in type and in the hands of the reporters to make some 300 pages more. And if we should continue in session for sixty days longer, as we probably shall, our debates will reach to full 2400 pages, the mark made by me at the beginning. And what will be the cost of this volume of debates? I have taken the trouble to make a little estimate of the matter, for the correctness of which, in the main, I pledge my veracity. And here it is, being estimated up to the present time:

3,550,000 ems composition @ 60c., $2,130 00
508 tokens press-work @ 45c., 228 00

Stenographer's compensation for reporting 1,643,500 words @ 20c per 100, Binding 750 volumes @ 50c,

3,287 00

375 00

Total for 1300 pages, $6,020 00

Being eight dollars per volume for the 750 copies ordered to be printed.

Now, Mr. President, if we must of necessity have our debates published, why the necessity of paying so much to the Stenographer for doing that which we could better do ourselves, and which many of us have to do for ourselves? I do not know how it is with others, but for myself I can say that with one exception, he has been of no earthly advantage to me. For I have found that the easiest way to correct his reports is to write them all out from beginning to end. In one speech that I made here, occupying between one and two hours, I fearlessly assert that there was not one single sentence reported correctly—and yet, for reporting that speech, he received some $25. And so it is with other members. They write out their own speeches, and the reporter gets paid for it. Why, sir, in yesterday's Journal I see there is a speech published which no man can deliver on this floor in an hour; and yet it was made under the fifteen minutes rule. Will any man pretend that that speech was reported by the Stenographer? No, sir; nothing of the kind.

[Cries of "name him," "name him." "Whose speech is it?"]

Mr. GREGG. I allude to the speech of the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden).

Mr. BORDEN. That is the report of remarks made by me on several occasions. I took the reports of the Stenographer and embodied them all in one speech.

Mr. GREGG. I understand something about that. And I assure the gentleman from Allen that I do not object to his writing out speeches for the press, and to his having them copied, too, by the reporter, if he likes. But I do protest against our paying the Stenographer some twenty dollars for reporting a speech that was never made in this Hall.

Mr. PARIDEN. I do not rise to debate the subject. I cannot perceive why there should be any cause for warmth or irritation upon a question of this kind. In regard to the reporters I have no cause of complaint. Sometimes the bad English that I make use of here is reported, and sometimes it is translated into good sense and good grammar. I cannot say whether it is in the power of the Convention to dismiss them or not. I entertain some doubts about that. They are here by law, and they are here as a protection to the public, being here to report whatever is said or done. It is a guard that the Legislature has placed over us, in order to protect the public interest; and I doubt very much whether the Convention has any power over them. It is a matter of contract between them and the State.

But in regard to what is said about this proposition, coming from Mr. Sheets, I do not know that there would be any harm in Mr. Sheets making any proposition that he might choose to make. I understand that he proposed, at the commencement of our session, to furnish the Hall and all necessary attendance for the sum of twenty dollars a day. Well, if we had accepted that proposition, it would have been a saving of twenty-five dollars a day to the State. Would that have been allowing him to participate in the doings of this body? Why, the whole community have a right to be here and listen to what is said, and witness what is done. Does any gentleman think that there is anything arrogant or presumptuous on the part of Mr. Sheets, when he proposes to furnish us the Hall and men to take care of it and keep it clean. There is this reason for it, and I can perceive it very readily: the owners of the Hall have left it in the charge of Mr. Sheets; he would be inexcusable if he were to neglect his charge. He must have men to watch the building and keep it secure. I cannot blame him for accompanying his proposition to lease or rent the Hall, with a proposition to furnish the necessary attendance. It is but a fair business transaction. I cannot see that there is anything in it that is deserving of censure. If there are nine door-keepers here, I would like to know what they all have to do. I do not know that there is a man too many—I do not say there is; but it strikes me there are more than is necessary, and if Mr. Sheets can perform the service for a less sum than we are paying, I should so far, be in favor of his proposition.

As to the Stenographer, it is another matter. I doubt the power of the Convention to dispense with his services, and if we could, I would not be disposed to do it at this period. Whether the Legislature acted right or not, in putting that guard over us—in throwing that security around the public interest, is not a matter that is left for our determination. The Legislature thought proper to do it—they have done it, and we have acquiesced in it.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I merely wish to say one word upon this subject, as an introduction to the vote that I shall give. It must be evident to every gentleman, that we are here under a law of the Legislature. Well, sir, if we are governed by one section of that law, we must be by another. If one part of the law is obligatory upon us, the whole is. Then it is no fault of the Convention that the Stenographer is here. I admit that it was, in my judgment, an error on the part of the Legislature, to entail upon the State the expense of employing a Stenographer. It is an expense that the people did not ask for; but if we can repeal one section of that act, we can repeal the whole code of our Revised Statutes. Then, as the Stenographer is here by law, I admit that the Convention have no right to dispense with his services. And even if we pass a resolution declaring that we will dispense with his services, the Stenographer has a right to stay and exact pay for all the labor that he performs.

Mr. PETTIT. There's not a doubt of it.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I wish to make one statement in regard to the Stenographer. I am told that, at the opening of the session of Congress, he was telegraphed to know whether he would go on to Washington, it being difficult to obtain a sufficient number of reporters, in consequence of the fact that Conventions are being held in several of the States; there being a Convention in New Hampshire, one in Maryland, one in Virginia, and one in Ohio; besides our own; all at the same time. Well, this gentleman, after consulting with members of the Convention, and, perhaps, feeling himself under an obligation to respect his appointment, declined going.

Would it now be doing justice to him, that the Convention should dispense with his services under circumstances of this kind? I think not.

Mr. GREGG. In order to disincumber this matter, I will move to strike out all that relates to the door-keeper.

Mr. RITCHEY. I regret the introduction of this proposition. We are spending as much money by wasting time with it, as the Stenographer and door-keepers will cost us. I move that the resolutions be laid upon the table.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. Will the gentleman withdraw his motion for two minutes only?

Mr. FOSTER. Then other gentlemen will want to speak; and the gentleman from Marion has already spoken once.

Mr. MORRISON. I merely desired to withdraw my amendment. But it is of no consequence.

The question being on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 65, nays 47—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Brookbank, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Sneok, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Watts, Wiley, Work, and Yocum—65.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Beeson, Befry, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Jones, Kendall of White, Maich, Miller of Fulton, Moore, Morgan, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Smiley, Tannehill, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—47.

So the amendments were laid on the table.

A MEMBER, whose name the reporter failed to obtain, moved a resolution to the effect that the Convention will hereafter proceed with the business legitimately before it, and refrain from discussing irrelevant matters.

Mr. SHERROD moved to amend, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

"That the business of this Convention is to organize the fundamental law of the State of Indiana, and not to act upon measures of a purely legislative character; and, in order to hasten our deliberations to a speedy and happy close, we will fearlessly reject such Buncombe measures as have retarded the action of this Convention, especially for the past week."

Mr. S. said: It is well known, Mr. President, that I have not trespassed upon the time of this Convention, either in resolutions, motions, or speeches; and, sir, I have not offered this resolution with a view of dictating to this body, but because it is well known that our proceedings have been retarded by propositions that have no place and should never have been introduced here, in any shape or form—propositions, too, of a purely legislative character, and matters too, I regret to say, that every member of this Convention must be convinced were purely for buncombe. Who is it, sir, that have got up in this body and denounced gentlemen for making speeches? Why the very men who have introduced propositions of the character I have alluded to—that they knew would not succeed; and then, too, after the decision of the Convention has been passed upon them, they have introduced amendment after amendment to effect their purpose. These are the men, sir, that the people will hold responsible for retarding the action of this Convention. I trust that the Convention will put down all such action. These are my sentiments, and these the reasons that caused me introduce this resolution.

Mr. BASCOM. I would be glad if the gentleman from Orange, (Mr. Sherrod,) after all the wisdom and logic with which he has lectured this Convention, would be so polite as to inform us whether the amendment he has introduced here, belongs to a legislative or a constitutional body. If the gentleman, instead of lecturing this body in regard to its business, would attend to his own legitimate portion of it, I think he would be much more profitably employed. For him to introduce such a nonsensical proposition as the present one and then undertake to lecture members for their action, it appears to me, places him in rather an inconsistent and ungraceful position. But very few members have offered anything irrelevant, in my opinion, except the gentleman from Orange himself. I trust, sir, that the business of the Convention will go forward, henceforth, with despatch, and that each member will perform the legitimate duties which devolve upon him.

Mr. KENT moved to amend the amendment, by adding the words "That the gentleman from Orange be appointed a committee to determine what questions are constitutional and legitimate."

The amendment was not concurred in.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Orange, (Mr. Sherrod,) and it was concurred in.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the resolution as amended, it was rejected.

ADJOURNING OVER.

Mr. HOVEY. It will be remembered, Mr. President, by the Convention, that on last Saturday a resolution submitted by the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall) proposing to dispense with the rule setting apart Saturday as resolution day, was then laid upon the table. I now move that that resolution and pending amendments be taken up from the table.

Mr. SIMS. I would ask the gentleman from Posey to withdraw his motion for a few moments, until I have offered a resolution.

Mr. HOVEY. Certainly. With pleasure.

Mr. SIMS then offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this Convention will not adjourn over the holidays, but remain in session and attend to the business the people have sent us here to perform."

Mr. PETTIT. I hope, sir, that this resolution will not be adopted. I am perfectly willing that we should not adjourn over the week including the holidays, but any gentleman who has had anything to do with deliberative bodies knows very well that they will not sit either on Christmas or New Year's day. If you were to pile up resolutions as high as heaven, you could not get this Convention together either upon Christmas or New Year's day. I move, sir, to amend the resolution so as to except Christmas and New Year's day.

Mr. COOKERLY. I hope, sir, that the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) will not be adopted. We have been here already, sir, eleven weeks, and I do not see any necessity for wasting our time by adjourning over Christmas and New Years, and putting the State to a great expense by such action. [Here a cry of "Buncombe!" was heard in the Hall.] You may call what I say "buncombe" or not; I do not care. It is so with every proposition introduced here that has for its object economy; the cry of "buncombe" is raised against the mover, and the proposition itself. Sir, I desire to get through with the business of the Convention, and go home to my own business and to my family. I do not wish to remain here upon Christmas and New Year's day and loaf around the streets on these days, but desire to come here and attend to our regular business. I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. I think, sir, that we had better adjourn over Christmas and over New Year's day, for if we come here on those days there will be no regular business done. Resolutions will be offered and speeches made not at all pertaining to the subject under consideration, and it will be viewed by some, probably, as occasions for frolic and amusement; and such proceedings will all have to be recorded, at the expense of the State. It will be a saving then, sir, I think, if we do not meet at all on Christmas and New Year's day.

Mr. BORDEN. I think, Mr. President, that the Convention ought to adjourn over Christmas, as it is a day of religious observance among Christians, and has been regarded as a holiday from time immemorial. Besides, we are to meet on the day following the 26th, in our new room. We want one day to get fixed, and get our papers arranged in order for business. I trust the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) will be adopted.

Mr. READ of Monroe. There is no member, sir, who desires to get through with the business before the Convention, more than I do. I supposed, when this Convention was first called, that it would not require more than six or eight weeks to transact our business—especially when I took into consideration the fact that, in 1816, it required only nineteen or twenty days, for a body of thirty men to frame our original Constitution. I remarked once, to one of my friends, perhaps jestingly, that it could be determined by arithmetic, how long the Convention would be in session, and said, that if it took thirty men to make a Constitution in twenty days, in what time would it take one hundred and fifty men to make a Constitution? But when I came here, I found we represented different districts of the State, having different views upon various subjects. Some men from one portion of the State were in favor of the principle of the homestead exemption, and others opposed to it from other portions of the State; and so with regard to other great questions—and therefore it could not be expected that questions of that kind could be settled in a few days, by one hundred and fifty men. There has been a great deal of difference of opinion, also, in regard to what is proper to be introduced into the Constitution—which instrument, of course, should define the forms and power of government. [Here there were cries of "question! question!"] I had intended, Mr. President, to make a few remarks in vindication of the Convention, in regard to the time it has occupied; but if gentlemen are not disposed to listen to me, I have no desire to trespass upon their attention. [Loud cries of "go on," "go on," amidst which Mr. R. took his seat.]

Mr. KELSO. I would have no objection, sir, to the resolution, if I thought it was necessary; but I think its adoption would have a different effect from what it is intended to have. There is no difficulty about our sitting upon Christmas or New Year's day, if there is no impediment in the way, making it indispensably necessary to adjourn over. But, sir, to pass a resolution, a week in advance of those holidays, saying that we will bind ourselves to do so and so on those days, it appears to me is saying to the people that we are disposed to neglect our business, and that it is absolutely necessary to whip us, in advance, into the performance of duty. If gentlemen are told they must meet here on those days, I fear that a great many will be disposed to show their independence by appropriating those days to themselves, as holidays are generally. I believe we had better wait until those holidays arrive, and then we can settle the matter.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to lay the resolution and pending amendment, upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

RESOLUTION DAY.

Mr. HOVEY. I now renew my motion to take the resolution offered by the gentleman from Gibson, (Mr. Hall,) and the pending amendments, from the table.

The motion, upon a division, was not agreed to.

BINDING OF DEBATES.

Mr. GREGG offered the following resolution: "That the Committee on Accounts contract for the binding of seven hundred and fifty copies of the first volume of the debates of this Convention, at a cost not exceeding fifty cents per copy."

Mr. KILGORE. I would inquire of the gentleman from Jefferson, if he can give us any information as to the size of this volume, and whether it is to embrace everything that has been said and done up to this time?

Mr. GREGG. It will make a quarto volume of about eight hundred pages; but of course it will not embrace the debates up to the present day, as they have not all been published.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. Can we get them bound for fifty cents the volume?

Mr. GREGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELSO. I wish to make an inquiry. Why ask to bind only seven hundred and fifty copies, if they are to be sold for the benefit of the State? Why not bind a thousand copies? and the larger the number, the cheaper they can be bound.

Mr. GREGG. Seven hundred and fifty copies was the number ordered by this Convention.

Mr. PETTIT. I shall not vote for this resolution, sir. I hold that this Convention has no authority to authorize or direct the printing of our proceedings in book form, or the printing of the Constitution we shall frame. We sit here under a law, sir, providing that when we have finished our labors, we shall deposit the draft of the Constitution, together with our proceedings, in the office of the Secretary of State, there to be acted upon as the Legislature which is coming, shall see fit. To that body should be entrusted the charge of printing and binding any extra number of our proceedings that may be necessary.

Mr. GREGG. I hope the resolution will be adopted, sir. We have gone to the expense of some six thousand dollars, to prepare this work; and to make it valuable, and to preserve it, it must be bound. The binding will cost three hundred and seventy-five dollars, a very small sum, in comparison to the expense of the unbound volume. It will be very convenient for us to have the volume before us for reference.

Mr. BORDEN. It will be recollected, sir, that at the commencement of our sessions, I stated that I considered we had nothing to do with the publication of our proceedings in this form, and I voted against the proposition then presented upon the subject. I never have believed that we had the power to draw a dollar out of the treasury for any such purpose. For the same reason, sir, I believe that we can have nothing to do with the binding of this book. The Legislature provided, in the law authorizing this Convention, for a Stenographer, to sit in this body, and report our proceedings; but they never authorized us, in that law, to pay for the publication of these debates. I think, sir, if the question was legally investigated, it would be found that we have violated that law. I desire to act consistent upon this subject, and therefore I shall vote against this resolution.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. Certain gentlemen are making constant complaints about expenditure of time and money, while at the same time they are occupying more of the time of the Convention, than any other gentlemen here. I wish to see the business of this Convention progress, for there is no man more desirous of being at home, than myself. I wish to see economy practiced also; but at the same time I do not wish, while I am crying out against the waste of time, to occupy more of the time than other gentlemen, thus increasing our expenses. In view of this fact, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The resolution was laid on the table.

TAXATION.

Mr. DICK offered a resolution providing that a select committee of one from each Congressional District, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting a clause in the new Constitution, providing that each tax-payer shall furnish the County Assessor, annually, with a schedule of all his rights, credits, monies, and effects—deducting therefrom the amount of his own debts—to the truth of which statement he shall make oath, and subscribe his name.

Mr. DICK said—

Mr. President, as I hear some manifestations of dissent, I shall offer a few remarks in support of this resolution. I believe there is not a man in this Convention, who will pretend to be ignorant of the great inequality and injustice practiced in the simple process of assessment. The plain farmer cannot conceal his rude improvements, his bulky implements, or thrifty stock. A few acres of land, cleared and fenced by a few thousand of new rails, stares the assessor full in the face. The raw material of the manufacturer or mechanic, is too ponderous for concealment. All they own, and often much that they have not yet paid for, is duly assessed to them. But even of this we do not complain. Sir, there is not a member in this house, but can point to numerous instances of gross frauds, committed annually by his neighbors, on the revenue of the country, by rendering false accounts of their taxables to the assessor—and it may be that some members of this house have an interest in sustaining the system as it is. It is next to impossible to find an assessor with the capacity and vigilance to assess correctly the mixed property of the merchant, who is actuated by the fraudulent design of avoiding the payment of his proportion of taxes. The real value of the property, credits, moneys, and effects, of a dishonest merchant, are easily misrepresented, under our present defective system. The value of the multifarious articles in which they deal—the amount of stock on hand, on their shelves and in their cellars, cannot be estimated with any degree of certainty; besides, it requires an uncommon degree of moral courage, in an humble assessor, to doubt the word of a mighty merchant. Hence, through these combined circumstances and defects, frauds are committed and perpetrated to an enormous extent. All we ask, is an equal and uniform mode of assessment—one that will neither excuse the rich, nor screen the poor—one that will reach the pittance of the humblest, and the thousands of the wealthiest, alike—one that will impose upon all a moral and pecuniary responsibility, which is filed against them living, and a record against them when dead. There is no greater hardship in swearing a man as to the value of his property, than there is in requiring him to bear testimony to the value of that of his neighbors, in a witness box in a court of justice. Besides the common frauds on the revenue, which are known to all, and practiced by too many of those who have been most fortunate in acquiring property, and in concealing its value, there are extraordinary frauds, that gentlemen must acknowledge to exist, in the almost total exemption from taxation of incorporation stocks. It will be seen, by a glance at the statistics of internal improvements, that at least six millions are invested in rail roads, plank roads, navigation companies, canal and banking companies, which almost entirely escape taxation. By reference to the Auditor's report to the General Assembly, of last year, it will be seen that the whole corporation stock of the State is set down at $116,364, on which taxes are paid. At the lowest estimate, the aggregate amount of property in the State, which evades our present assessment law, is set down at thirty millions of dollars; and this circumstance is much aggravated by the fact, that this large amount of property is the most profitable, productive, and active capital in the State—quick, and not sluggish in its returns—managed at small expense, and yielding from 10 to 25 per cent. per annum. It is owned exclusively by the wealthy, who are best able to pay. If this evil, sir, this monstrous evil, was fairly understood by our hardy sons of labor, who have often to solicit their fellow men for the poor privilege of toil, for the dollar with which they pay their poll-tax, it would, in my opinion, revolutionize the State. Under a just, rigid, and uniform system of assessment, our public debt could be discharged in a few years, and then our taxes would be reduced at least one-half, or perhaps one-fourth.

The resolution was not adopted.

On motion, by Mr. PETTIT, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Mr. R. A. CLEMENTS, a Delegate from the county of Daviess, elected to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Terry, appeared, produced his credentials, was sworn into office by Judge Borden, and took his seat.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention then resumed the consideration of the orders of the day, the pending question being on the final passage of section thirty-one, which is the same as existed in the old Constitution.

Mr. MARCH moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to strike out the words, "ex post facto," and insert in the proper place, words in English equivalent to their meaning.

Mr. RARIDEN. If the gentleman will furnish those words to us we will insert them.

The question being taken on the motion to re-commit, it was rejected.

On motion, it was ordered that the rule requiring the yeas and nays on the final passage of a section be dispensed with.

The section was then passed.

The question then was on the final passage of the thirty-ninth section.

Mr. COLFAX hoped the yeas and nays might be ordered on that, for he wished to record his vote against it.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope the gentleman may be accommodated, for I wish to record mine for it.

Mr. COLFAX. The gentleman from Tippecanoe is a little larger than I am, but luckily my vote will count as much as his. It seems to me that there might be cases of emergency in which the Legislature might desire to submit their laws to the people. Besides it was a democratic principle, and would be followed out in regard to the adoption of this Constitution.

Mr. BASCOM moved to re-commit the section with the following instructions: "To except the question of banking."

The question being taken on the motion to re-commit,

The section was not re-committed.

Mr. BORDEN thought it was quite possible that in the Constitution itself the Convention might provide, that any question of banking should be submitted, and he doubted whether it would be right to tie up the hands of the Legislature and the people in this respect. He thought they had better leave the matter as it was. If the people did not want these questions submitted to them, the Legislature would not submit them.

Mr. TAYLOR believed it would be wise on the part of the Convention, not to pass this section. There were always, in the course of Legislation, times—and time proved sometimes the folly as well as the wisdom of men—when it was desirable that the people should express their opinions. He did not wish to discuss the merits of the section, but he thought it ought not to pass. At all events, he should vote against it.

Mr. OWEN. In regard to this matter I wish only to say, that just in proportion as the Legislature shifts the proper responsibility from their shoulders, just in that proportion they will become time servers. So far as I know anything about the people, they have no desire for any such submission. They desire that we should take the responsibility and make as good laws as we can, and if they do not suit them, they can repeat them the next session.

The yeas and nays being demanded, and ordered on the final passage of the section, were taken, with the following result—yeas 68, nays 38:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Elliott, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, May, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—68.

YAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Borden, Brookbank, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Colfax, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Haddon, Hardin, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, March, McClelland, Milligan, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, and Zenor—38.

So the section was passed.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in the order of the day is the following additional section:

"The members of the General Assembly shall receive a compensation not exceeding three dollars per day, but no increase of compensation shall take effect during the session of the Legislature at which such increase is made."

Mr. READ of Clark inquired, whether it was in order to introduce a matter which had been voted down the previous day.

The PRESIDENT. On examination of the question, the Chair finds that it contains different matter.

Mr. RARIDEN moved to re-consider the vote on the section which was rejected yesterday on the same subject.

Mr. WALPOLE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken, and resulted as follows—yeas 60, nays 51:

YAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beeson, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Carter, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, March, May, McClelland, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Nofsinger, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sims, Smiley, Stevenson, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—60.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Beach, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Clements, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Foley, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Kelso, Kilgore, Maguire, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, and Mr. President—51.

So the motion to re-consider was agreed to.

Mr. NAVE. Will it be in order to move to strike out the section, and insert a substitute?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. NAVE. Then I move to strike out the section and insert the following:

"The members of the General Assembly shall receive a compensation not to exceed three dollars per day, during their personal attendance on the same; but shall not continue in session more than eight weeks, except at the first session under this Constitution; and that they shall receive also the sum of three dollars for every twenty-five miles travel performed in coming by the most direct route to and returning from the Capital."

He desired to submit a few remarks to the Convention in support of the amendment. If there had been any one thing that the people of the State had approved of and endorsed, it was that the Legislature should be limited as to the time of their holding their sessions. He would venture to say that there would not three men be found in the State unfavorable to such limitation. They had a good precedent for this in the present law limiting the sessions to six weeks. And where was the man who had been found to lift up his voice against that law? No such voice had been heard in that Hall, or in the south end of the Capitol. It was important that the Legislature should be limited in their action. If the Convention had been limited in their action, there would have been much more expedition and promptness in their action. Why was it important that there should be such a limitation? One good reason was, that men would come here from day to day and make speeches, not for the purpose of exhibiting themselves before the country, but because they get excited on political questions—questions which they were not sent to legislate upon, but mere party questions, which had consumed more time than all the legislation that had been done for the State. If the sessions were limited to eight weeks, be believed no man would be sent here who would desire more time. Wherever biennial sessions had been adopted by the States, this principle of limitation had also prevailed; and where had there been any complaint against it? This was an important principle—one calculated to secure to the people of the State all the legislation required to promote their interests. [A voice—"Buncombe."]

When he made these remarks, he made them not for Buncombe. He did not believe that any gentleman on that floor would say that he made any such suggestion for that purpose. He was there for the purpose of aiding in making an organic law, and not to incorporate any sentiments of his own in that instrument. He was there on principles of conservatism, and in favor of such principles his votes had always been recorded. Too much legislation proved a curse to any country. The legislation that had been had heretofore had proved a curse to the country, and for that reason he wished to limit the time of the Legislature in their sessions.

Mr. PETTIT. This is a question which legitimately belongs to another committee, and I believe they are ready to report upon it—the committee on compensation, salaries, and the tenure of office. I was a member of that committee, and we had settled the pay of the members of the Legislature, and directed a report to be made. Whether that report has been made or not, I do not know. This is a question purely appertaining to that committee, and not to the committee on the legislative department. I therefore move to lay the section and pending amendment on the table.

Mr. DOBSON, as chairman of the committee on compensation, &c., explained that a report had been drafted as to the compensation of officers, Judges of the Supreme and Circuit Courts, State Auditors, members of the Legislature, &c.; but before he had left the committee room he was requested to withhold it until the committee had another meeting. He informed the gentleman from Tippecanoe of this request. It was thought unimportant for the present, because they did not know how many officers to fix salaries for. For that reason the report was not made; but it would be made in due time.

Mr. NAVE demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the section and amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Beach, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hawkins, Hitt, Hugin, Howe, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Maguire, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Work, and Mr. President—56.

NAYS.—Messrs. Balingall, Bascom, Beeson, Borden, Bowers, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, March, May, McClelland, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rarider, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sims, Smiley, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—58.

So the section and amendment were not laid upon the table.

Mr. SHERROD moved to amend the amendment so as to provide that, from the first day after the expiration of eight weeks, the members of the Convention should not receive more than one dollar and fifty cents per day.

Mr. BORDEN. The motion of the gentleman from Orange appears to me to be entirely out of order. Suppose the gentleman should propose that the pay of the members of the British Parliament should be eight dollars a day, would that be in order?

The PRESIDENT. The motion would be in order, but it would not be very relevant.

Mr. SHERROD. I wish to test the sincerity of the House on the proposition before us. If we have a right, and if it is the duty and the province of the Convention to say how long the Legislature shall be in session, and what their compensation shall be, I contend that we ought to look to ourselves; and I will say that it comes with a bad grace from the members of this Convention. The law limiting the pay of the members of the Legislature has to this time been a purely legislative enactment. The gentleman from Clark says that this proposition was brought about for the purpose of making political capital. Well, sir, if this be true, I suppose the same spirit will bring about the same effect; and as I have defined my position, and intend to oppose every measure brought into this body of a legislative character, I shall oppose this measure, unless the amendment I have offered is adopted.

Mr. READ of Clarke. I excuse my friend from Orange for his very pithy address, when I look round and see that there is present a number of the fair sex. [Great laughter and applause.] I am satisfied he would not have made that speech unless the ladies had been in the lobby. He knew, however, that he was pulling against the wind, and rowing against the current. If I am wrong in my proposition, all the other States are wrong; and I speak and vote on this occasion conscientiously. I honestly believe that, if we adopt a provision of that kind, we shall save to the State some fifteen thousand dollars annually for all time to come. I again repeat that, if we do not adopt this rule, it would be far better not to adopt the system of biennial sessions. I am perfectly satisfied that the section ought to pass, and if every member is of the same opinion, it certainly will pass.

Mr. SHERROD. I excuse the gentleman from Clark for his very patriotic speech for the same reason that he excused me. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOKERLY. This measure, like many others, has received great opposition. The gentleman from Orange has attempted to bring the measure into ridicule by saying we have no right to pass it. Why, then, have all other Conventions done the same thing? I consider that this is an important measure, and I believe that the people wish it to be adopted.

Mr. SHERROD. I do not doubt the right of the Convention to pass it, but I doubt the propriety.

Mr. COOKERLY. I do not doubt the propriety. I believe it is right that we should adopt it. Since the year '42, the Legislature has never sat longer than six weeks but once, and then only one week longer. It is a good principle, and instead of meeting with the ridicule of the Convention, it ought to meet with their hearty sanction. Let gentlemen ridicule this measure as much as they please, I can tell them that they will meet with that hearty contempt from the people which they justly merit. ["Consent! consent!"] Have we come here and sat eleven weeks, and are we to sit eleven weeks longer, and effect nothing for the people in the way of economy? Are we to spend a hundred thousand dollars, and the people receive no good? I protest against it in the name of my constituents, and in the name of the freemen of Indiana.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I hope the amendment will be adopted. If we apply the same principles to ourselves which we would apply to others, we would progress much better with the business we were sent here to do. The gentleman last up says we are to spend a hundred thousand dollars. Let us bring the principle of economy home; and, as the gentleman from Orange well said, let us test the sincerity of these men. If they want to economize, let it commence in this Convention now. Let it begin from this day forward. Sir, with what kind of grace could these gentlemen carry back to their constituents a tale like this: that the delegates on this floor were seeking to curtail the per diem allowance of those who are to come after us in the business of legislation, but that the same proposition was made on this floor to apply to themselves, and that they refused to pass it. [Great applause.] If the amendment is not adopted, I shall be compelled to vote against the section. [Consent.]

Mr. KELSO. This is a matter about which I do not care a great deal. In the former Constitution no limit was fixed to the time of the sittings of the Legislature, nor was there any to their pay, except as they were not permitted to go higher nor lower than a given sum. They legislated for a long time at two dollars per day, until the Legislature fixed the amount at three. It remained at that till 1842, when the Legislature took it into their heads that the sessions had been longer than had been useful, and they then passed the law limiting the time of the sessions to six weeks, and fixing the pay at three dollars a day, prescribing that from and after it had exceeded that number of weeks it should be a dollar and half per day. I now venture to say here that the legislation has been worse since that law was passed. It is true that there has never been a longer session than seven weeks, and it may be all very true, as the gentleman from Vigo has said, that at the end of the period the legislators were anxious to get home. That has been the very reason why the legislation has been done so badly. When men cannot obtain a sufficient compensation they will accordingly do the business of the people in a very slovenly manner. Now the gentleman exults that in the Constitutions of other States there is a restriction of this sort. Now the Constitutions to which the gentleman refers restrict their members both in time and compensation; and if it be right in the one it is right in both; and if it is wrong in the one it is wrong in the other. If the Legislature under the new Constitution is likely to sit too long, it will be a matter which the people will take into their own hands. They will elect men who will attend to their wishes. Sir, this is against our notions of honesty. It is equivalent to saying that we have no confidence in men; but that every two years they will come here and drain the treasury by uselessly wasting their time. I have no such opinion of the people of Indiana. If the Legislature have sufficient time to do their business in they will do it well. If you hurry them they will do it badly.

Mr. KILGORE. I think it will be necessary to fix some limits to the sessions of the Legislature, but that the time proposed is too short. I had drawn up an amendment which I had proposed to offer, fixing the limit at seventy days, which I think will be time little enough. We will doubtless provide for biennial sessions, and if we should do so we must necessarily expect from the increase of population, and wealth, and business, that there will also be required an increase of legislation. We find now when our Legislature meets annually that they consume six weeks and sometimes a little more than that. I propose to limit their regular sessions to seventy days, and their extra sessions to thirty days. I also propose to strike out the word "exceeding," and insert the word "less," so as to fix the amount of compensation below which the Legislature should not go. I would be willing to say that the compensation should not be less than three dollars per day, but I am not disposed to fix a limit beyond which they shall not go. We all know that the price of boarding and everything necessary for the comfort and convenience of the members of the Legislature here, must necessarily be increased with the growth and prosperity of the country. We intend this Constitution to stand for many years. The price of boarding will soon reach such a point that three dollars per day will not be an adequate compensation for members here. What will be the consequence? Why that none but the wealthy men of the land can accept a seat in the Legislature. A poor man could not leave his business and pay a hand to do his work, besides paying all his other expenses; and I am unwilling to put anything into the fundamental law which would prevent the poor men of the country from occupying a seat in the Legislature. Yet this will be the inevitable result if you limit the compensation to that fixed point. And not only so, but I am willing that the Legislature should pay such a compensation, with the approbation of the people, as will secure the best talent and the best business men of the country. I would be willing to vote for such a compensation as would induce distinguished men to turn their attention from other pursuits for the time being to serve the people in the Legislature. We could undoubtedly obtain men at a dollar a day—men who would be willing to come for the glory of the thing. But the time may come when that will not pay their boarding bills, and I am not willing to place things in such a condition as that none but wealthy men should control all the places and offices. That is the main reason why I do not wish to fix a limitation beyond which they shall not go.

In regard to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Orange (Mr. Sherrod) I have not a word to say. I do not for a moment imagine that it will be adopted. The gentleman thinks it is right and that we have the power, but that it is not expedient. That gentleman undoubtedly acts with a view to expediency. He might think it quite right and proper to get married, but perhaps not expedient. (Laughter.) He does all with an eye to expediency. I think we ought not to limit the sessions of the Legislature, at least below the length of time which we have consumed. We have been here some seventy-six days, and we have not done more than would be embraced in one single act of the Legislature; and yet we would require the Legislature to pass all laws necessary for the State in less time than we have spent in doing nothing at all. I have now done. I shall offer my amendment at the proper time.

Mr. ZENOR. I have not risen to make a speech but a motion, and that is to lay the amendment of the gentlemen from Orange upon the table; simply remarking that a dollar and a-half per day might be quite sufficient pay for that gentleman. [Great laughter.] I do not claim three dollars per day for any great speeches

I have made, or any particular service I may have done the Convention, but I do think I am fully entitled to it for the patience and fortitude I have manifested in sitting here from day to day, listening to Buncombe speeches. [Great applause.] I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The question being taken the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. KILGORE moved to amend the amendment by striking out "eight weeks" and inserting "seventy days," and also to strike out the word "exceeding" and insert the word "less."

Mr. MOORE moved to lay the amendment to the amendment upon the table, which was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER. I am in favor of the section as reported by the committee, believing it to be right, and seeing that we are spending our time here nonsensically and unprofitably, I move the previous question.

The previous question was sustained, and the main question being ordered to be now put, the question was first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave).

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, were taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of P., Farrow, Foley, Gregg, Hawkins, Holman, Howe, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Maguire, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Monroe, Sims, Smith of Ripley, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Watts, Wiley, Zenor, and Mr. President—50.

NAYS.—Messrs. Balingall, Beach, Bicknell, Borden, Brookbank, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cookerly, Dobson, Edmondston, Elliot, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—67.

So the amendment was not adopted.

The question then being on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading,

The yeas and nays were demanded, ordered, and taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Balingall, Bascom, Beeson, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Butler, Carter, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Lockhart, March, May, McClelland, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zeror—68.

YAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dunn of P., Edmonston, Foley, Garvin, Graham of Warwick, Gregg, Haddon, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Wiley, Work, and Mr. President—48.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day, is the following section on its second reading :

"The General Assembly shall have no power to grant divorces, or direct by special legislation, the sale of estates belonging to infants or other persons laboring under legal disabilities, but by general law, shall confer such power on the courts of justice."

Mr. WOLFE moved to amend the section by inserting after the word "divorces," the words "or try impeachments."

Mr. RARIDEN. There is a report on the subject of impeachments.

Mr. WOLFE. There is one on the subject of divorces, too, and they ought to go together.

Mr. RARIDEN. They are not much alike. The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The section was then ordered to a third reading by unanimous consent.

The next thing in the orders of the day was the following section, the question being on ordering it to be engrossed:

"No act of the General Assembly shall ever be revised or amended by a reference to its title, but in such case, the act revised, or section amended, shall be re-enacted and published at full length."

The section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by unanimous consent.

The next thing in the orders of the day being section 28,

Mr. HOWE moved to strike it out and insert the following as a substitute :

"Suits may be brought in all cases, against the State, in manner prescribed by law, but no special act authorizing suit or suits against the State, shall ever be passed."

Mr. H. said he had not been informed whether the legislative committee intended that some other provision should be made or whether they purposed leaving the question open in regard to presenting claims against the State. He took it that the design was to prevent in any case, the bringing of a suit against the State, and to make the General Assembly a judicial tribunal for the determination of claims against the State. For one, he protested against the adoption of such a rule. No civilized country as yet had adopted a provision of that sort. In all cases wherever a citizen had a claim against a State, the justice of which depended upon the determination of legal questions, he had precisely the same right to have his claim adjudicated upon by a competent tribunal, as any citizen had against another citizen. They all stood upon the same right and hence, in the absence of any general law on the subject, the Legislature had always been in the habit of passing a special act for that purpose. Now there was no sort of doubt that injurious consequences had resulted from that course to the State. In some cases allowances had been given, which should not have been given, and larger damages awarded than would have been awarded, had the contest been between private individuals. But because this thing has been abused, that was no reason why a citizen should not have his just rights, but it rather tended to show that there should be some general rule adopted to give the individual his just rights. What he proposed, was to leave to the Legislature the power to determine under what general provision or rule of law, claims of that sort should be decided. There might be a board of claims consisting of the Secretary and other officers of State, in connection with the Attorney General, or the judges, or allow suit to be brought in the Supreme Court, or a claim might be investigated by one of your officers, and if he should reject it, then give an appeal to the Supreme Court. That would leave the question open and give to every citizen who had a claim against the Government, the same opportunity to prosecute it, as if it was a claim against an individual citizen. It would then stand upon a footing of natural justice—the broadest and best of all. A wise man (Solon) when asked what was the best government, replied "that one under which an injury to the meanest individual was looked upon as an insult to the whole community." Of all rights, those which regard the protection of life, liberty, and property are the most important. They are elementary or public rights only as they tend to carry out natural rights. Unless we adopt a provision of this sort, we strike at the very root of the right of the citizen to be protected in his property.

Mr. GRAHAM moved to amend the section by adding—

"Nor shall the Legislature ever make by special act compensation to any person claiming damages."

He did not know whether the phraseology of the amendment would convey the idea he intended, but he did not want the Legislature to have the power of settling difficulties between the State and contractors. They all know that contractors on public works were here annoying the Legislature year after year, to make them compensation for breaches of contract between them and the State. His object was to place the matter beyond the power of the Legislature, at the same time to give it to the courts of justice.

Mr. KELSO. I cannot for the soul of me, see what justice there is in saying that the State shall enter into a contract with an individual and then allowing them to say that they will break that contract.

Mr. GRAHAM. All I want is, that such matters should be decided by a court, and not by the Legislature.

Mr. KELSO. I give the gentleman the right hand of fellowship on that. I say that an individual ought to have the right of going into court and presenting his claim against the State when she has violated a solemn contract. I maintain, that everything of a judicial character should be kept from the Legislature—our courts of justice being a separate and distinct part of the Government. I am satisfied with this amendment, because, after the court has once passed upon it, it would be proper to have a provision to prevent parties from suing the same matter in the Legislature. But it would be the greatest possible hardship upon a citizen who enters into a contract with the State to perform a certain duty, and the State fails to perform her part of the contract, to say that he should have no remedy at all. Such a thing would be the height of injustice.

Mr. BORDEN said he was in favor of the section as it stood, but against the amendment. When was a State ever sued, and the plaintiff not succeed? What sovereigns had ever permitted themselves to be sued? Was it right to put a sovereign State down to the capacity of an individual, and call her into court? If such a principle were adopted, they would have to find some other way of raising taxes.

Mr. PETTIT. If we should pass this section, the last one is one that will require, and will have a good deal of discussion, for it involves a principle which I think is not right to be adopted. We shall not get through this evening, and as it is Saturday evening, I move that we adjourn.

Pending the question on the amendment of Mr. GRAHAM,

The Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, DEC. 23, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Dr. SIMPSON, of Cincinnati.

The journal was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention sundry reports and documents from the Ohio Convention, including the printed debates up to the 8th of the present month (December). The Debates, as far as printed, contain near eight hundred pages in small type.

Mr. WATTS moved to refer so much of the reports as related to banks, to the committee on currency and banking.

The motion was agreed to.

COMPROMISE RESOLUTIONS.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication and a series of resolutions upon the compromise measures, received from the Maryland Constitutional Convention. The resolutions were five in number. The fifth resolution demurred to the Fugitive Slave Law, as not being sufficiently stringent in its details, but for the sake of promoting harmony in the Union they would carry out its provisions.

Mr. OWEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President acknowledge the receipt of the resolutions just received from the Constitutional Convention of Maryland, and that he transmit to the President of said Convention the resolutions heretofore passed by this Convention, relative to the series of acts, usually called the compromise measures, passed at the late session of Congress.

Mr. RARIDEN said he was afraid that these resolutions would lead to difficulty. It was apparent by the resolution in the series adopted by the Maryland Constitutional Convention, that that body did not consider the Fugitive Slave law sufficiently stringent in its details; whereas the resolution adopted by this Convention upon the same subject set forth, that this Convention considered the Fugitive Slave Law too stringent in its details. He was afraid that by transmitting the resolutions they had adopted, to the Maryland Constitutional Convention, it would lead to a correspondence between the two bodies, in regard to the merits of the Fugitive Slave Bill, and lead to dissension and difficulty.

Mr. OWEN remarked that as this Convention had taken its stand in regard to the merits of the compromise measures, he trusted they would not be ashamed or afraid to lay the result of their deliberations before the Maryland Convention.

Mr. KILGORE stated that there could be, in his opinion, no ground of difficulty. This Convention had stated that it objected to the stringency of the details of the Fugitive Slave Law, but for the sake of the Union they were willing to sustain the measure as passed by Congress. It was open, of course, to future amendment. The Maryland Constitution had objected to the lack of stringency in the details of the fugitive slave law, but had declared also that for the sake of the Union it was willing to stand by it as it was. This was the ground upon which both of the Conventions met—the Union.

Mr. DOBSON said that this matter did not require any discussion at all. The Maryland Convention had stated they stood by the Union; this Convention took the same position. The Maryland Convention had informed us of the fact officially, and now this Convention was doing nothing more than was right and proper in informing that Convention that they stood upon the same platform.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved that the communication and resolutions be spread upon the journals.

The motion was agreed to.

FIREMEN'S FAIR.

Mr. KELSO said that he rose to ask the Convention to suspend the rules in order to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourn upon Saturday, the 28th, it adjourn to meet upon Tuesday, the 31st inst., at the usual hour."

Some time since, it would be remembered, the citizens of Indianapolis raised a portion of the price of a fire engine, hose, &c., and the State also contributed four hundred dollars toward the purchase, for the protection of private and public property here. Notwithstanding the sum thus raised, there was a balance yet unpaid. Now in order to raise that balance it was proposed to hold a fair in Masonic Hall for two successive evenings, and two evenings had been selected—the 30th and 31st. As the Convention had now engaged the Hall, the favor was asked by the originators of the fair that the Convention adjourn over Monday, and thus facilitate the purpose designed in getting up the fair. The Legislature would meet on that day, and it was not probable that there would be much business transacted.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. What amount is it proposed to raise by this fair?

Mr. KELSO. Some three or four hundred dollars.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. Well, I think, sir, it would be a great deal better for us to appropriate this amount to pay the debt, rather than lose six hundred dollars. I trust the rules will not be suspended, and the State be put to an unnecessary expense.

The rules were not suspended.

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE.

Mr. HITT presented a memorial from citizens of Knox county, praying for a clause in the Constitution that no persons be permitted the right of suffrage until they have paid a tax.

Mr. H. trusted the Convention would give the subject a due consideration at the proper time; and for the present he would move that the petition be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LICENSE.

Mr. KILGORE moved to take from the table the section reported from a select committee on the 19th inst., prohibiting the Legislature from passing laws for licensing the sale of spirituous liquors.

Mr. K. said that the reason he asked to take this section up from the table was, because a number of gentlemen did not understand its true character; they supposing that it was a provision prohibiting the sale of liquor in any form. The object of the section was simply to prevent the State from deriving any profit from the sale of liquor. If it was right that liquor should be retailed, it was intended by the section that no tax should be levied upon its sale; and if it was wrong that it should be retailed, it was designed that the State should not in any way sanction that wrong.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 36, nays 73:

YEAS.—Messrs. Balingall, Beeson, Bicknell, Bracken, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Davis of Madison, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogan, Holman, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Milligan, Milroy, Morgan, Murray, Newman, Niles, Prather, Read of Clark, Robinson, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Todd, Watts, and Work—36.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Dick, Dobson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Mather, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimby, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—73.

So the report was not taken from the table.

PAY OF THE LEGISLATURE.

The twenty-sixth section of Report No. 12, fixing the pay of members at three dollars a day for the services of the members, &c., was taken up and read a third time.

Mr. ROBINSON moved to re-commit the section with instructions to report the following section: "The members of the general Assembly, for traveling to and from the Capitol, shall receive for their services a compensation to be fixed by law, and for their services during the session a compensation not exceeding three dollars per day, to be paid out of the public treasury; but an increase of compensation shall take effect during the session at which such increase shall be made."

Mr. OWEN moved to amend the instructions as follows:

Strike out the entire section and insert "The members of the General Assembly shall receive for their services a compensation to be fixed by law; but an increase shall take effect during the session at which such increase shall be made."

"No regular session of the General Assembly, except it be the first under this Constitution, shall extend beyond the term of sixty days, nor any called session beyond the term of forty days."

Mr. O. said that he was sorry to see the manner in which this question had been treated; he thought it should be dealt with more seriously. He had no doubt that the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Reid) had introduced his proposition from good motives; and with a view to economy. But there was such a thing as running into extremes, and sometimes opposites nearly meet. Nothing could be more unstable than the value of the precious metals. Three or four hundred years ago the amount of money that would now pay for one week's board would have paid for board for ten weeks. Hallam in his work on the middle ages, informs us, that any given sum in the thirteenth century must be multiplied by twenty-four, in the fourteenth century by twenty, and in the fifteenth century by sixteen, to bring it to the standard of our day. In eight or ten years, even, the value of money might depreciate to a considerable extent; particularly when the great amount of the precious metals likely to be brought from California, was taken into consideration. Suppose a gentleman was to introduce a proposition here fixing the pay of the members of the General Assembly in the year 1900 at three dollars per day; not one tenth of the members of the Convention would vote for it. Yet that was what they were, in effect, about to declare if they adopted the proposition which he (Mr. O.) proposed to amend, provided the new Constitution they were framing remained, as he hoped it would, the organic law of the State for half a century to come.

He preferred to have an absolute limit of time fixed to the duration of the sessions of the Legislature. He thought it disreputable to insert any such constitutional provision as that, after a certain length of time, the per diem of the members should be reduced. It was much preferable, he considered, to limit the duration of its sessions by saying that no regular session should exceed sixty days, except the first after the adoption of the Constitution, and the called sessions should not exceed forty days.

As regarded the pay of the members, he thought that should be left to them to settle. There were always enough men ready, for popularity's sake, to place the amount of pay on the most economical basis. In fact there was more danger of the per diem being fixed at too low, than too high a rate; and if the former was the case the tendency would be, that the Legislature would become an aristocratic body. None but those who were rich enough to work for the people without a sufficiency of pay to support themselves would consent to accept the office of a public representative. He thought the question of the amount of pay might be left, with entire safety, to the General Assembly.

Mr. ROBINSON said that next to his own proposition he would go for the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) for the reason that that gentleman's amendment proposed to strike out all that part of the section which to his mind was most objectionable. He was opposed, however, to the amendment of the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read). He believed the adoption of a section containing a clause that the Legislature of Indiana, after the expiration of a certain number of days, should transact the business necessary to be done by them at one and a half dollars a day, was an unjust reflection upon the character of the people of Indiana. He believed that the people of Indiana desired to have their legislation faithfully executed, and that they were entirely willing to pay their representatives liberally for the faithful discharge of their duties. He did not charge upon the gentleman from Clark that he was actuated by demagogical motives; he knew him too well to suppose for one moment that he was influenced by any motive of the kind in introducing this section; but he could only view it as a measure that most properly would emanate from a demagogue. It never originated from the just, common sense of the people, but more particularly partook of some of the efforts of the stump demagogue.

One word as to the difference that existed between the proposition of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) and the one he had submitted. He was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, because it limited the time allowed to the Legislature for the transaction of the business they were sent to perform. It was impossible for this Convention at this time, and any experienced legislator must perceive it, to know what the length of the sessions of the Legislature should be in future time. Emergencies might arise, and will no doubt arise, requiring long sessions, and of those emergencies the Convention at present could have no idea; and, therefore, in his opinion it was neither wise or politic to fix the duration of future sessions of the Legislature, as we had no data by which to judge correctly. The members of the Legislature were the representatives of the people, and as such, were amenable to them for any unnecessary protraction of their sessions. He considered, therefore, it was the more judicious plan to leave the subject with them, and let them fix the duration of their own sessions. To confine the period of their action within certain limits, would lead to hasty, improper, and injudicious legislation, fraught as he believed, with many evils which we could not now perceive. He hoped that if the instructions he had proposed were not adopted, that the amendment to the instructions offered by the gentleman from Posey would be adopted, so that they would get rid of the present odious feature of the section limiting the pay of the members of the Legislature, after sitting a certain number of days, to one dollar and fifty cents per day.

One word further in regard to limiting the length of the sessions of the Legislature. From the time the section first came up for consideration, it had appeared to him that this Convention was the last body in the world that should prescribe to another legislative body the duration of its sessions. Such dictation came with a bad grace from them. This was the commencement of the twelfth week of their labors in revising, amending, and altering a Constitution composed of about fifty-three pages, and they were scarcely able as yet to see the end of their labors. After setting such an example it was somewhat inconsistent, to say the least, and could scarcely fail to awaken restless feelings in the minds of the members of the Legislature to prescribe to that body a limited and a scanty term of session.

Mr. FOSTER said he had but a word or two to say in relation to this matter. The remarks of the gentleman from Posey in regard to the depreciation of the value of money, so far as they applied to its depreciation during the last few years, he did not think were correct. Public economists told a different tale—that money had not depreciated in value for some years, and it was not probable that money would depreciate in value for some years to come unless a universal system of banking was established—every man to have the privilege of issuing shinplasters; and even then it would be only the “rags” that would depreciate in value, not the hard money itself.

Gentlemen seemed to have a wish to limit the Legislature to one dollar and a half a day, if they sat longer than sixty days in any one session. But he had only to say that so far as his section of the State was concerned there was no proposition in regard to which the people were more united than in regard to limiting the term of the sessions of the Legislature; and for years past the course pursued by the Legislature had been approved of by the people.

In regard to the per diem of the members he thought that the proposition of the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read) was extremely liberal. He had nothing to say in relation to the per diem being reduced. He was informed that the annual salaries of judges was to be fixed in the Constitution, and he saw no reason why the per diem of the Legislature should not also be fixed.

He thought that the per diem allowance of the members of the Legislature had better be fixed at once so that there would be no doubt in regard to it; therefore, he believed on the whole that the section as it now stood was much better than if either the amendment of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) or the gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Robinson) was adopted.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved a call of the previous question; which call was seconded by the Convention.

The main question was then ordered to be put,

The question being, Shall the amendment to the instructions be adopted?

Upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 70, nays 42:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Clements, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Harbolt, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Murray, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wiley, Work, Zenor, and Mr. President—70.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Butler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon, Hardin, Helmer, Hogin, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, May, McLean, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, and Yocum—42.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then being upon re-committing the instructions as amended by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen),

The yeas and nays were demanded, and, being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 66, nays 45:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Clements, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliot, Foley, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Murray, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wiley, Work, Zenor, and Mr. President—65.

NAYS.—Messrs. Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Butler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Dobson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hugin, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Maguire, March, May, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, and Yocum—45.

So the section was re-committed with the amended instructions.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The sections prohibiting the Legislature from granting divorces and special legislation with regard to the sale of estates belonging to infants, &c.; and that no act shall ever be revised or amended by a reference: o its titles, but, in such case, the act revised or section amended, shall be re-enacted and published at full length, were read a third time and passed.

SUITS AGAINST THE STATE.

The section prohibiting special acts authorizing suits to be brought against the State, was again taken up—with the pending amendments of Messrs. HOWE and GRAHAM of Warrick.

Mr. WILEY moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Warrick by adding the words:

"This provision shall only apply to debts, contracts, and claims, made after the adoption of this Constitution."

Mr. GRAHAM accepted the amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I am well satisfied, upon reflection, that if we do not adopt some other section than that reported by the committee, we shall be justly obnoxious to the charge of causing a failure of justice in regard to one of the most important rights of the citizen. We have only to look back to the history of the past thirty-four years, and it will be seen that, under our present Constitution, and the various codes in force since its adoption, all disputed claims against the State, have been subjected to the mercy of the General Assembly, in providing special acts for their trial and decision. I think that my amendment, which I now propose, will afford the remedy for the evil complained of. Let this remedy be adopted, and then, if the Legislature neglects to carry out the details, the Constitution will itself afford the remedy. I will read it as a part of my remarks:

"The Auditor and Treasurer of State, and the Attorney General; or, if there be no Attorney General, then the Auditor and Treasurer of State and the Governor, shall constitute a board for the trial and decision of all claims against the State, not provided for by general or special acts of appropriation; and from the decision of such board, either party may appeal to the Supreme Court in all cases."

I think, sir, this is as good and complete a provision upon this subject, as can be adopted. The question naturally arises, if we adopt the provision that the State shall be sueable in cases of contested claims, and that those claims shall be provided for by the act of the Legislature—what remedy do you propose? Do you propose that the State shall be sueable in like manner as citizens are in circuit courts, and the suit carried up by appeal, as ordinarily? I answer, yes—so far as respects the application of legal principles to the decision of the merits of the case. And why not? When the State is spoken of as a party liable to be called upon to do justice, we are haunted by the antiquated objection, that it is derogatory to the dignity of a State, to be sued.

Now, sir, there is no just distinction between the sovereign and the subject, in respect to the obligation to do justice, and it is the right of the citizen or subject to demand that his claim against his sovereign, shall be determined on the same principles as his claim against another citizen or subject.

There is, it appears to me, a manifest propriety in constituting the Auditor and Treasurer a part of the board to adjust claims against the State; and if there is an Attorney General—which office, I trust, will be created—they can call in his legal services to assist in adjudicating upon legal questions that may arise. If gentlemen are not satisfied with this provision, let them prepare something better, and I will accept it. So much for the details of the principle.

A word now, with reference to the main question itself—the principle involved. An objection, as I have already remarked, exists in the minds of some gentlemen, and it is, that it is derogatory to the dignity of the State to be sued. Now, sir, I think if public sentiment has progressed at all since the adoption of our present Constitution, it must certainly have progressed so far as to see the necessity of providing for awarding complete justice to individuals, in all cases of this kind, without fraud or delay—for of what use or benefit is government, unless it is to carry out to the highest practical point of development, the fundamental principles of protection to life, liberty, and property? Sir, there is no distinction, so far as the equal administration of justice is concerned, between the sovereign and the citizen. Precedents have been referred to, and the question has been triumphantly asked, what sovereign power has allowed itself to be sued? Now, sir, in return, I would inquire, what sovereign in the civilized world, when anything like an approximation to Constitutional government exists, is there, who has not provided some legal and established remedy for the claims of the subject, which could not be adjusted under the ordinary provisions of the law? Look to the country from whence we derived all our legal institutions—to whose common law we look for guidance in our judicial decisions. In England, from a very early period, there has been a legal and fixed remedy for the subject. The sovereign there, is the king; but the majority of the people is the sovereign here. From the earliest period of England's history, through the medium of a remedy called the "petition of right," which is a common law remedy, the subject could have his claim against the crown adjudicated. The king's law officers are the persons to whom petitions are referred for claims, and they are subjected to legal adjustment upon the same principles—saving only certain maxims of prerogative—as if sued in the King's Bench. Instead, then, of precedents being in favor of this absurd notion of the gentleman, it is the other way. I trust my amendment will be adopted.

I think, Mr. President, I see in this section and pending amendment, one of the principles for which I have drawn my political sword and thrown away the scabbard determined to fight on, fight ever; I think I see in it the germ of political and judicial equality and right. I am in favor, sir, of the section as reported by the committee—unless it can be made better, which I think it can by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Warrick, (Mr. Graham,) believing it will conduce to a greater degree of justice in the administration of law, than the section proposed this morning by the gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe). Let us now consider for a few moments, the principle involved in this section.

And first, I would allude to the absurd doctrine that it is derogatory to the dignity of the sovereign to be sued. True the maxim of English law is, that the sovereign cannot be sued. And why, sir? Because the king is supposed to be always employed in advancing the interests of all his subjects, and therefore, he cannot give his personal attention to answer writs or subpoenas. He must be employed in his cabinet, endeavoring to administer justice to and promote the general welfare of his subjects.

Second, it is said in the English books that it is derogatory to the dynasty of the sovereign to be sued—because he represents in his person the entire population of England, and it would take away from him that respect and reverence to which the ruler of the people is entitled, by bringing him before the King's Bench upon every writ that might be issued.

Third, it is a maxim in England that the king is always ready to do ample justice to his subjects, and to effect that object, centuries ago, the right of petition was granted to the subject. This point has already been explained by the gentleman from Lagrange, so I will not dwell upon it.

In contemplation of law, the king holds his courts in person. This was another reason why suits could not be brought against the person of the king, because sitting in court himself, would render it an absurdity for him to be sued in his own court. Yet, sir, in England, the subject has his mode of redress against the king; and his claim can be settled as fairly as though it were against an individual. Then, sir, why advance this absurd doctrine, that the sovereignty may not be sued because such a course would be derogatory to its dignity. Why, sir, in this country, where the only sovereignty is the people, why should not the policy be adopted that the State shall be sued as well as individuals. The principle is the same, whether applied to one man or seven hundred and fifty thousand men, as it is in the city of New York—all may be sued. It would be impracticable to put all these names upon record; therefore, a nominal or fictitious name is given to the city when it is sued. All are sued, however, and all are sueable under that joint co-partnership of name. Hence, sir, I say whether it is one man or whether it is a million, all should be sueable. There is reason, there is justice in this.

I am opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Lagrange, (Mr. Howe,) because of its imposing an additional and unnecessary duty upon the officers of State. And then again, sir, this Board meets in this Capitol, and an individual residing in a remote part of the State must come away up to the seat of government in order to obtain the liquidation of their claims. Now, sir, I desire that the law may be so framed with reference to this subject, as that an individual may sue for the amount of his claim in his own county, and obtain satisfactory redress. Let us not sanction the idea that sovereignty resides in this capital alone. It is co-extensive with the State.

Now, sir, I am prepared to sanction the principle that the State is sueable in every Circuit Court in the State, leaving the details as to the bringing and conducting of those suits, to the Legislature. Where the sovereignty commits an injury upon the subject let it be liable for that injury. By this arrangement, sir, the State would be saved large expenses, for the committees of the Legislature have to spend their time in investigating claims, and when they report the Legislature has to debate them before they can be allowed, which proceeding is of course unnecessary. The settlement of these claims, I contend, more appropriately belongs to the judicial department of government than to the legislative.

The objection, sir, is advanced to the settlement of these claims in a court of justice is, that the claim is a large amount to the claimant but a small amount to the people, and therefore the jurors selected from the people will not be very particular in their decisions, but generally incline, from motives of generosity, to the liquidation of the claim. Now, sir, I think the facts in the case will show directly the reverse. The judge who sits upon the bench is interested in keeping the amount of the judgment small, because he must be taxed to pay his portion of it; and this is the case with the twelve freeholders who are to bring in the amount of damages.

If there is anything prejudicial to either party, sir, it is against the claimant; for judge and jurors are interested in bringing a judgment of a small amount, inasmuch as a portion of it has to come out of their pockets. There can, then, be no injustice in this mode of settling these claims. I hope, sir, that the section, with the present amendment, will be adopted; believing it will secure justice throughout the State so far as these claims are concerned, and establish a more effectual political equality.

Mr. BORDEN. Gentlemen will recollect that all our foreign bondholders have not yet come into the arrangement which was proposed in the Butler bill. If, then, we compel the Legislature to pass a law by which anybody and everybody may sue the State, these individuals will at once commence suit against the State, and bankrupt it.

Gentlemen have said that the objection to suing the State arises from the old exploded idea that the king can do no wrong, and therefore he should not be sued. This, however, is not the objection with me. If I lived under a monarchical form of government I should not object, probably, to the king being sued; but here the people are the sovereigns, and if suits are commenced against them what is everybody's business will be nobody's business, and the consequence will be that the people will be imposed upon.

I have only to say that I am willing to take the section reported by the committee and pass it; this will leave the matter entirely within the discretion of the Legislature.

Mr. KELSO. One of the plainest reasons that can be presented why the State has always been defeated in these suits brought by different claimants against the State, is, that the State, by passing acts allowing it to be sued, has acknowledged that the claims were just—and that the State has wrongfully refused to liquidate the claims as they should do. Another excellent reason why the State has always been defeated is, that the State has been eternally in the wrong in regard to these claims, and the claims presented have been just. An instance cannot be pointed out where suits have been brought against the State for violation of contracts wherein those suits have not been founded upon the principles of justice and equity. For vouchers to the truth of this statement, I refer to the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Now it is well known that the duty of the Legislature is to administer equal justice to all the citizens of Indiana. Heretofore, in cases of claims brought against the State, the Legislature after a due examination of them, have authorized by special acts that the State may be sued for them. The Legislature in regard to those claims acts in a judicial capacity, although they are not authorized so to act, and this occurs scores of times during the sittings. These claims are deliberately investigated by the Legislature, and if it is found to be correct, the Legislature by authorizing the State to be sued, openly declares that the State has violated a solemn contract and ought to be sued. There is where the jurors get their cue, and this is why the decisions of the Court are uniformly against the State—it is because the Legislature have pre-judged the case and have decided against the State.

If we will place in the Constitution a clause authorizing a general law to be framed, whereby in all cases where individuals consider themselves aggrieved by the action of the State, shall have a hearing as between individuals in a court of justice, there would be no difficulty about the adjustment of these claims. They will be laid before the same tribunal as the claims between individuals, and acted upon in the same impartial manner. If there was any weighty interest in favor of either side, it would be in favor of the State. The judge and jurors would be sitting there, not only to do justice to the rights of the claimant, but to the interests of the State and to themselves, for each one of them would be liable to contribute to the payment of the judgment.

The gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) seems to be alarmed in regard to bond holders; and fears that if a section of this kind is passed that they will come upon and bankrupt the State. Now, sir, it is my opinion if we adopt the simple principle here—as it is proposed to be done—that the bond-holders will stand a desparately poor chance.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Warrick (Mr. Graham) precludes these bond-holders from reaping any advantages by virtue of this section as proposed.

Can these bond-holders by virtue of this section come here and obtain possession of the most valuable property of the State so as to embarrass and impede the administration of the State Government? Certainly not, sir. If such were the fact, then we have organized a government for the benefit of all the people of the State, subject to be overthrown at any time upon the dictation of a few wealthy capitalists either at home or abroad. I hold, sir, that all the old contracts should stand upon the basis and be governed by the same laws under which they were entered into; and with regard to all new contracts hereafter entered into by the State, let them stand upon the same basis as those made between individuals and the State become sueable for them. We will then, sir, have no difficulty with regard to the adjustment of claims against the State. Nor will we have a set of State agents making loose and improvident contracts with a view to have the State violate them and then shield herself behind the broad mantle of her sovereignty.

That sovereignty, sir, furnishes no good nor even plausible reason why the State should not be held to a strict accountability for her contracts and undertakings. I am decidedly in favor of the proposition that when the State enters into a contract with her citizens and violates that contract, she may be sued and forced to fulfil such contracts as individuals are compelled to do.

MR. RARIDEN. I do not understand, from the reading of this proposition, whether it is intended to give to individuals the right to an action against the State for any other thing than contracts or not. If it is only to apply to contracts, I think it goes upon too narrow a basis.

A MEMBER. It applies to everything.

MR. RARIDEN. Then it confers a right of action against the State for all claims. It is true, as has been remarked by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) that the reason why sovereignty is not liable to be sued results from the doctrine that kings can do no wrong. This is a part of the theory of other governments, and there is some wisdom in it. It would be disreputable to the sovereignty if its acts were to be made the subject of discussion. Wherever a government allows the general discussion of acts of sovereignty and the exercise of sovereign power to be discussed by the people, they bring the sovereignty universally into disrepute, and replace it with a sovereignty of their own creating, and more to their liking.

We have another kind of sovereignty—that of State sovereignty—and its power is just as sovereign within its legitimate scope of action, as the power of a king. The security of the public lies in the diffusion of the powers of sovereignty into many hands. It is the people that select and delegates the representative of sovereignty in a State, and that representative is the common arbiter between individuals, and is always supposed to intend justice to all parties. It is a wrong idea, however, to suppose that the same rule applies here that prevails in England—that the sovereign of a State would willingly wrong individuals in that State. The petition of right should be just as efficacious here as in Great Britain. Whenever the sovereignty is informed of the rights of individuals, the charitable presumption is, that it will administer justice to individuals when informed of their just claims against it, when informed through the organs of intercommunication that exist between the people and the sovereign. That is the theory of sovereignty with us, and its liabilities are to public opinion. Sovereignities never do wrong. It is its spokesman and actors, and it is they that are responsible; and it is they that are and ought to be responsible for wrongs inflicted, or rights withheld in its name.

What would be the result of giving a general license to bring suit against the State and sovereign; for if the sovereign is liable for contracts and damages, it should be still more accountable for an outrage perpetrated upon individual members of society, through its officers and agents. The State sovereignty has a representative in every county of the State, who are called prosecuting attorneys, besides all other State officers who act under State authority.

The courts and juries, in criminal proceedings, generally extricate them from the difficulty, but at a vast expense and mortification of feelings. Now, I would inquire of the gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe) if it is intended by this amendment to allow each individual to bring an action against the State of Indiana for an outrage upon their feelings or rights, and the costs that may have been created?

MR. HOWE. Certainly.

MR. RARIDEN. Then the effect of this would be to make the State of Indiana liable for all the expenses incurred in criminal prosecutions as well for every wrong done through mistake or otherwise, by all her officers and functionaries, thus entailing a heavy expense. Yes, sir, more each year than ever, the State expended in the fatal system of internal improvements. From whence should come the means to meet those State liabilities, except from the people of the State, who are thus made the bondsmen of every petty State officer and agent?

We have here, as in England, held the minister, and not the sovereign liable for all public or private wrongs. What a beautiful scene to allow every scoundrel who would make a false accusation in the name of the State, against his neighbor, and propose himself to be summoned as a witness, to sue the State and recover costs for his time! Such a course would keep the State busy in levying and collecting taxes to meet such liabilities.

Then I object to it for another reason. If it be true that the subjects of a kind are secured in their rights, simply by the petition of rights—it is still more true in a republic like this, where the people are wiser and better than kings. That our people have greater protection afforded to their rights than in Great Britain, all must admit, and yet gentlemen are disposed to bring down the dignity and love of justice of this republic below that of monarchies.

Mr. READ of Monroe. The doctrine that a government should be sueable in its own courts as same as individuals, has been advocated by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) upon the floor of Congress. The same doctrine, sir, I have had the honor to advocate before a higher and more august tribunal—before the sovereign people themselves.

I hope the section reported by the committee that no special act allowing suit to be brought against the State, will be adopted. And further, I trust, we shall adopt an amendment, providing that the Legislature shall direct by law, in what manner, and in what courts, suits may be brought against the State.

The idea that the State is a body of too great dignity to be sued, is a remnant of the old doctrine of the prerogative of the crown. When an individual has a claim upon the State which is disputed, can any man give a sound reason why that claim should not be investigated and adjudged precisely in the same way, and by the same rules, as a claim against companies or individuals? On the common principles of justice and equality, the people existing in the form of an organized State, has no more right to be unjust collectively than individually; and if the State so far waives its dignity as to sue an individual in order to exact justice from him, how is it less dignified to allow him the same means to determine his rights against the State? If the claim is decided adversely to the State, provision ought to be made for its payment, as in the case of any other debt.

But a provision of this kind is essential to the safety of the State and the purity of legislation. What is the mode of obtaining a disputed claim under the present system? Why recourse is had to "lobbying," "log-rolling," "oyster-suppers," and it is greatly to be feared, to other appliances still more reprehensible, by which legislators are rendered supple and pliant. By such means many exorbitant and more than doubtful demands have been proposed and recovered; while just claims have been overlooked and neglected.

Besides the determination of legal rights appropriately belong to the courts and not to the Legislature. The Legislature is no proper tribunal for their decision. It is the wrong department of government for determining questions of right, and the reference to it of such questions produces an improper confounding of the peculiar duties of two distinct departments of government.

But the Legislature is also too expensive a tribunal for investigating legal questions, costing the State, as at present organized, for every day's session, at least six hundred dollars.

Where a special act is passed, permitting a suit to be brought against the State; sharp-sighted persons seldom fail to gain an advantage in the preamble or some part of the act; nor is there less danger, as the whole State has been made to feel in a recent case, in instituting a special tribunal by a special act. The objection of increased expense also lies against the establishment of special tribunals. The true and safe principle is, that the State should be entitled to the same legal rights, and held to the same mode of determining its legal obligations as individuals.

But far the greater portion of claims against the State arises from the State Government engaging in concerns foreign to all the true ends of government; and when the State, by suitable constitutional provisions, is strictly confined to its appropriate sphere of action, there will be very few doubtful claims for any tribunal to decide.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe moved an amendment to the section, to the effect, that the judgment of the Court, in cases of suits against the State, should be certified to the General Assembly for payment.

He said: I do not profess, Mr. President, to understand the subject very well; and therefore, if the Convention manifested any inclination to entertain it at all, I should not trespass on their patience. The only objection against allowing suit to be brought against the State, which seems to me to have any weight, is, that a judgment would bind the property of the State, and its revenues. On execution, both might be seized and applied to the payment of the debt. The amendment which I have proposed, prevents this result. It appears to me that a court of justice is a much more suitable tribunal to investigate claims against the State, than the Legislature. A citizen appears before the Legislature, with a claim against the State—it is difficult for him to interest in his behalf any member, unless it be those from his own county. The members suppose themselves charged with the responsibility of much greater interests—the interests of their constituents and the State. Hence, the claimant has to resort to personal appeals to the members—to the oyster suppers, and such other appliances as have been alluded to. This mode of obtaining a hearing is very expensive, and it is not wonderful that claimants should seek to indemnify themselves, as far as practicable, by asking for large allowances. But if the way to justice was open and easy, there would be no prejudice against the State. It is because of the inequality of the contest, that men sympathize with the individual.

Gentlemen speak of this as a degradation of the sovereignty of the State. Sir, if a State condescend to contract with an individual, she should be willing to provide the means of fulfilling her contract. And in cases of controversy, arising as to the nature of a contract, or where the State may have failed to fulfil, on her part, I think there is more degradation in refusing justice, than in condescending to submit the inquiry to a proper tribunal. The State has, I admit, the higher duty to perform, of maintaining its own existence, and may properly refuse to submit its revenues or public property to be seized on and sold. But if the court merely ascertain the amount which the State owes the individual, and reports to the Legislature, it must still exercise its sovereignty in making the appropriation. I think, with my colleague, that the principle is right, and that we ought, in some manner, to provide to carry it into effect.

Mr. RITCHEY moved to lay the pending amendments upon the table.

Mr. COLFAX called for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first taken upon laying the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark) to the original section upon the table.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 50, noes not counted.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon laying the amendment of the gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe), and the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Warrick (Mr. Graham), on the table.

Upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and having been ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 64, nays 47:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Bascom, Beeson, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chenoweth, Clements, Cookerly, Crawford, Dobson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Maguire, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—64.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Beach, Berry, Bidle, Bourne, Bryant, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, March, Mather,

May, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, and Wiley—47.

So the amendments were laid upon the table.

Mr. OWEN moved to amend by striking out and inserting the following:

“Suits may be brought against the State in all cases arising out of contracts made with the State after the adoption of this Constitution, in manner to be prescribed by general law; but no special act, authorizing any suit against the State, shall be passed; nor shall the General Assembly have power to make compensation to any claimant for damages under any contract that may be hereafter entered into with the State.”

Mr. O. briefly stated that he was in favor of having these claims adjudicated in the courts, and for very sufficient reasons, among which was, that courts were not subject to the many extraneous influences that could be brought to bear upon the Legislature, and which often prejudiced the settlement of claims.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the original section by adding the following words:

“But general laws may be passed for that purpose as to liabilities originating after the adoption of this Constitution, and no special act making compensation to any person or persons claiming damages against the State, shall ever be passed.”

Pending the question,

On motion by Mr. HOLMAN,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the orders of the day, the pending question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Johnson) to the amendment of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen).

Mr. HOLMAN. I would be glad to call the attention of the Convention to the language of the two amendments now pending, the one offered by the gentleman from Posey, and the other by my colleague. The language of the section which the gentleman from Posey proposes to strike out is as follows:

“No special act authorizing suits to be brought against the State shall ever be passed.”

The gentleman from Posey proposes to strike that out and insert as follows:

“Suits may be brought against the State in all cases arising out of contracts made with the State after the adoption of this Constitution, in manner to be prescribed by general law; but no special act, authorizing any suit against the State, shall be passed; nor shall the General Assembly have power to make compensation to any claimant for damages under any contract that may be hereafter entered into with the State."

The amendment proposed by my colleague, in addition to the original section, reads as follows:

"But general laws may be passed for that purpose, as to liabilities originating after the adoption of this Constitution, and no special act making compensation to any person or persons claiming damages against the State shall ever be passed."

The section, as thus amended, will read as follows:

No special act authorizing suit to be brought against the State, shall ever be passed; but general laws may be passed for that purpose as to liabilities originating after the adoption of this Constitution: and no special act making compensation to any person or persons claiming damages against the State, shall ever be passed."

It may be observed that there is but one shade of difference between the two propositions, and I will point out that difference to the Convention. It consists in this:

The language of the section proposed by the gentleman from Posey is as follows:

"Nor shall the General Assembly have power to make compensation to any claimant for damages under any contract that shall hereafter be entered into with the State."

The language upon that part of the section in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn is as follows:

"And no special act making compensation to any person or persons claiming damages against the State, shall ever be passed."

I will not enter into any discussion as to the respective merits of the two propositions. The section proposed by my colleague certainly covers the whole ground. The original section offered first, prevents any special act from being passed authorizing suit to be brought against the State. The great ground of complaint heretofore made has been that laws have been passed, and the preamble to those laws has usually taken for granted what ought to have been proved. The courts were in the habit of giving effect to the recital in the preamble. I believe that there has been no instance in which a special act of the Legislature has been passed granting to an individual the right to sue the State, in which such individual has not recovered; and in several instances the amount of damages recovered has been admitted to be much beyond the justice of the claim.

No special act should be passed by which suit shall be brought against the State, but a general law may be passed on the subject. The Legislature possessed this power; and the great object now is to prohibit special legislation. That is the great end to be attained. Another great end is that the Legislature shall not spend its time in investigating claims of individuals in future. This is the object intended by the last clause of the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn. I think these two important ends are obtained; and the third is the recognition of the general principle by which a sovereign State in her sovereign capacity shall become subject to the just claims of the citizen. I hope that the amendment as proposed by my colleague, will be adopted, for it seems to me to cover the whole ground; and if it is not better than the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, it is at any rate, equally as good, and I think in one feature it is better. I should not have said one word upon the subject but for this reason: My colleague is one of those meritorious men of whom I am happy to say that there are many in this Convention; and he has brought this matter forward and is not disposed to consume the time of the Convention by debate.

The PRESIDENT. The question is first on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn to the original section.

Mr. OWEN. I think the amendment covers the whole ground, and I am not particular about the words.

Cries of "question! question!"

Mr. MATHER (in his seat). No more speeches now.

The question being taken on the amendment it was adopted by consent.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Posey, to strike out the section as amended, and insert what has been read.

Mr. OWEN. I withdraw my amendment. I am satisfied with the section as now amended.

The question was then taken on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was so ordered by consent.

UNIFORM LAW OF ASSESSMENT AND VALUATION OF PROPERTY.

Mr. READ of Monroe. It will be recollected by the Convention that some days ago I introduced two sections on the subject of taxation. It was in the form of a motion to re-commit with instructions. There were objections made to one of the sections at the time. This seems to be as appropriate a place as any other in which to bring forward one of the sections, to which I believe no objection was made. I now propose the following as an additional section:

"The General Assembly shall provide by law a uniform rate of assessment and taxation, and shall prescribe such regulations as will secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, both real and personal, except only such, for municipal, educational, charitable, or religious purposes, as may be specially exempted by law."

I do not know that it is necessary to discuss this provision at any length. It is admitted that the subject of taxation is one of the most important that can occupy the attention of a deliberative body. It was, perhaps, sufficiently discussed a few days since, and no objection was made to the general principle of the sections now read at the Secretary's table. I do not propose to bring forward that section to which objection was made, at the present time, but I should like to have the yeas and nays on the adoption of the section I have just offered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; and the question being taken on the adoption of the section by a division, there were—ayes 27, noes 35.

So the section was not adopted.

LOTTERIES.

Mr. HELMER. I offer the following as an additional section:

"No law authorizing or sanctioning the establishment of lotteries shall ever be passed."

The section was adopted on a division—ayes 41, noes 27.

It was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GENERAL LAWS FOR INCORPORATIONS.

Mr. MILROY offered an additional section, to the effect that the General Assembly should have no power to grant any charters or special acts of incorporation, but should pass general incorporation laws, by which companies for all lawful purposes might incorporate themselves. Mr. M. said that, as the Convention were now engaged in forming that article of the Constitution which was to define the powers and place prohibitions on the legislative department of the Government, he thought this was the proper time to insert the section. This was a restriction on the legislative department of the Government, and it should come in the article they were now framing.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe said there was a section on the subject reported by one of the committees.

The question being taken on the adoption of the section, it was rejected.

MONEY APPROPRIATED FOR LOCAL PURPOSES.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the adoption of the last section of the twelfth article.

Mr. PETTIT. I move to amend the section by striking out the words "three-fourths," and inserting the words "a majority."

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "No! no! no!"

Mr. PETTIT. If gentlemen will not be in quite so great a hurry with their cries of "No! no!" perhaps I can assign one or two reasons why this ought to be done. It will be recollected that we have passed a section saying that no bill shall pass without the consent of a majority of all the members elected to both Houses of the General Assembly, and that, too, upon a call of the yeas and nays. I think that that rule might as well apply to private as to public appropriation bills. It will be recollected, likewise, that we have declared that two-thirds of either House shall form a quorum to do business; and now, by this section, we require that more than that quorum shall be present, and more than a quorum shall vote for the passage of such bill. If I understand this, as it reads, the assent of three-fourths of the members of the General Assembly shall be required to pass any bill appropriating money for private purposes. Now, sir, I maintain that every specific appropriation bill is a bill for private purposes. An appropriation to pay the salary of your Governor, or your Secretary of State, or your State Treasurer, or Auditor, or even a Door-keeper of your Senate or House of Representatives, or for stationery, or ink, or pens, or for the repairing of a desk, or the making of a new one, would be an appropriation of the public money for a private use, and that ought certainly not to require a greater number of members to sustain it than any ordinary appropriation bill to supply the common requirements of the State. It appears to me that there is an incongruity in it. No bill can pass without the yeas and nays being had; and that, with the other provisions we have adopted, it seems to me, will make the matter sufficiently secure.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Strike out the section altogether. Strike it out.

Mr. BORDEN. It seems to me that the gentleman from Tippecanoe has fallen into a great error in regard to this matter. It does not, in any sense of the word, apply to appropriations for the salaries of the Governor, and other officers of State, as being appropriations of public money for private purposes. This section was taken from the Constitution of New York. It was found in that State that the public money was frequently applied to private purposes, such as appropriations for seminaries, the building of bridges, &c. We have had instances in our State of similar appropriations; and had we had such a rule as that proposed in this section, those appropriations would not have been made. If we require a majority of all the members to pass any general law, I think we ought to have at least three-fourths of them to pass any law appropriating money for private purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I understand the committee as having reported this section for the purpose of preventing the payment of debts or claims by the Legislature. I was opposed to it myself. It was supposed that individuals always had the advantage of the State, and the design was, to prevent the State from being cheated. I think the section ought to be stricken out, and that matters of this sort ought to be put upon an equal footing with other laws. I move to lay the section and the amendment on the table.

The question being taken, the motion to lay the section and amendment on the table was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. PETTIT. I offer the following as an additional section to the article—

The PRESIDENT. It is now too late to offer an additional section. The article has passed.

Mr. PETTIT. Let me ask the President by what rule it is provided that all additional sections to an article must be offered before the last one is disposed of?

The PRESIDENT. The rule is, that all amendments to a bill must be offered while the bill is pending. This bill or report has been considered section by section; and the last section having been disposed of, the bill itself is finished.

Mr. PETTIT. But all the sections have not been disposed of. I voted in the affirmative just now to lay one of the sections of this report on the table, in order that I might have an opportunity of offering this additional section. In order that the bill may again be before the House, I shall move for a re-consideration of the vote laying that section on the table.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "Read the proposed additional section. Read! read! read!"

Mr. PETTIT. I will read it for information: "The General Assembly shall provide by law a uniform rule of assessment and taxation, and shall prescribe such regulations as will secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, both real and personal."

I now move to re-consider the vote I have already alluded to.

The motion to re-consider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on laying the section and pending amendment upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I will withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman cannot now withdraw his amendment.

Mr. PETTIT. Then we can vote it down.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe moved to lay the amendment to the section on the table.

The motion was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. PETTIT. So it is in order now to offer an additional section?

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. PETTIT. Then I offer the section which I read for the information of the Convention a few moments ago.

{The section is reported above.}

Mr. COLFAX. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Tippecanoe whether he intends that all churches, colleges, benevolent institutions, schools, and other public buildings, should be taxed?

Mr. PETTIT. I will answer the gentleman from St. Joseph in one word. Yes.

Mr. COLFAX. Then it is also intended that all court houses, market houses, state houses, and every other public building should be taxed?

Mr. PETTIT. I mean just precisely what the section says. I mean that all property that is protected by the laws of the State of Indiana, except what the State herself actually owns, should pay an equal proportion of the premium or expense of maintaining it. A few words upon this subject.

Any government may be well compared to an insurance office. The government of the State of Indiana affords protection to all persons and property in the State. It is no more than fair and just that all the property thus protected should pay an equal share of the burden of taxation imposed for its protection. Is there any property of any description in the State, around which the protecting arm of the law is not thrown? Is there any property in the State for an injury to which you may not go into your courts, and detain your judges, your witnesses, and all your officers? Is not every description of property as ready and as much at liberty to come in and demand the services of your officers for the protection of one piece of property as another? Now if the gentleman from St. Joseph has any particular sticking for churches, Masonic, Odd Fellow, and Temperance Halls, I am prepared to meet him. I ask that gentleman, supposing that he owned a dwelling house worth two thousand dollars and church property worth five hundred dollars, whether there is any difference in the property? Makes it any difference to him whether he pays all the amount of his tax upon his house worth two thousand dollars, or whether he pays an equal proportion upon that property and his church property? I say that the exemption we have had heretofore, exempts those who own church and other property from bearing a proper proportion of the expenses of the State. That property is protected by the law, and ought to pay a just proportion of the taxation for the protection it receives. I ask you, where is the justice, where the propriety of exempting it? Here, for example, is a Masonic Hall, erected undoubtedly for benevolent purposes, but still paying the stockholders a large interest on their capital, and why is it that they should be allowed to own that amount of property and pay no tax upon it, and thereby increase the burdens of the State upon those who own less than they do, or who own none at all? You have to resort to so much taxation for the expenses of the State, and you ought to resort to property for your taxation. Many citizens of my own town own property in buildings erected for benevolent purposes. There are many churches in my own town. I have no objection to tax church property, and I believe the laity of every church in Indiana is as much in favor of taxing church property as they are of taxing any other property. Are not your churches protected by your laws? If the torch of the incendiary reaches them, is he not to be prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary? Or if a mob should assail them, are not the courts of the State open for redress? Ought they not, then, to pay their portion of the taxation? What is the difference? They have to pay their proportion on other property. The only difference is, that those who do not own church property are yet compelled to maintain it. This, sir, I hold to be wrong. You say in your Constitution, that no religious sects or creeds shall be maintained at the expense of another, or of the people at large, and that nobody shall be compelled to maintain any given religious principles against their will; and yet you say that corporations may erect property, and churches may be built, which shall be free from taxation for public uses, and you compel every man who is taxed for the support of the State, to contribute to the maintenance of such property. Sir, if the owners of such property require the protection of the law they will be ready, like good citizens, to pay their fair proportion of the expense of sustaining such property under the protection of the law.

Mr. MILROY offered to amend, by adding excepting only such property as may be specially exempted by law."

Mr. READ of Monroe proposed to amend the amendment, by confining the exemption to such property for municipal, educational, charitable or religious purposes, as may be specially exempted by law.

Mr. MILROY accepted of the modification.

Mr. HAMILTON proposed so to amend the section as to include churches, school houses, grave yards, court houses, and other public buildings belonging to the several counties of the State.

Mr. PETTIT. I shall feel constrained to ask the yeas and nays on all these amendments. The proposition is a very plain one.

The PRESIDENT. The question is first on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Hamilton).

Mr. COLFAX. I desire to say one word in reply to the observations which have fallen from the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit). Although I agree in the general principle that all property should be taxed, I believe with those who have gone before us in this State, and in all other States of this Union, that there should be exceptions to this general rule. I must say therefore that I differ decidedly from him in the extreme views which he has presented. I believe it to be the true policy of the State, to encourage, rather than to discourage the building of churches, and school houses. Government can give no aid directly to any sect, or creed of religion. It is far better, both for the Church and the State, that this should be so. But it is wise—it is expedient—it is the highest policy, to exempt the temples of Religion and education from taxation. They are not built, sir, for purposes of gain, nor for personal use. They are reared, either wholly or partially, by the munificence of benevolent citizens. Their object is simply and solely the advancement and elevation of the morals, the intelligence, the Christianity, of the community.

Sir, if the Convention should adopt the section as it is now offered, and advocated by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, this State can have the unenviable distinction of being the first State in the whole Union, which has had the honor of taxing such institutions. I have, for one, no desire that the State of Indiana should be the pioneer in such a backward movement. On the contrary I would rather by any and every reasonable means, which would not effect men's consciences, or discriminate in favor of any creed, encourage the erection of buildings for such purposes. The influences which have thus been disseminated, have resulted in the advancement of civilization, and the heightening of civil freedom. Our land has won the proud pre-eminence it now enjoys among the nations of the earth in a great degree, because here, more numerously than in any other nation, do churches and school houses dot our valleys and our plains. And on this account mainly it is that we participate in the blessings of a christian civilization.

But let us look still further, and more closely at the language of the section. It is mandatory in its character—positive in its requirements. According to it, you command the taxing of court houses, jails, county buildings, market houses, poor house farms, for State purposes. You go further—you require that this very State House in which we now hold our sessions, shall be appraised, and the county tax upon it poured into the treasury of the county of Marion, and the corporation tax upon it, into the treasury of the city of Indianapolis, both of which are already greatly enriched and benefited by the location of the Capitol in their midst. Still more, you command that your beautiful benevolent institutions, which stand at either end of the Capital, which have been reared by the freely-offered taxes of every man in the State, and which have reflected so much honor upon her generous and benevolent citizens, shall be assessed and the annual taxes upon them paid to the county of Marion, which neither asks or expects such a privilege. And your State's Prison too must be taxed, for the benefit of the treasury of the county of Clark. All these county taxes—heavy as they would be, and large in amount—are to be taken from the State taxes, paid in by the citizens of the whole State, and given to counties, who do not ask them, and would have no right to claim them.

It was not expected by the people, when they sent us here to revise the Constitution, that we would undertake anything of this kind. They expected—and if such a proposition had been advocated in the canvass, they would have demanded—that the same liberal rule, in regard to public buildings, churches, and educational edifices, which has prevailed in all other States, shall be continued here. These exemptions have been the settled, the uniform policy of every State in the Union so far as I have any knowledge, and have been most cheerfully acquiesced in by the people generally. For by these means, education, morality, and religion are encouraged in a manner which does violence to the sentiments of no man; because all sects and creeds, whatever their peculiarities and forms, their doctrines or their principles, are equally benefited by it.

Widely different indeed would be the case, if it was sought to make a discrimination in favor of any particular denomination. This, as is well known, is not advocated or intended, and for one, I must say that I shall oppose to the very last, such "progress" as is indicated in the section of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, unless it be so modified as to continue the exemption that I have alluded to in these remarks.

Mr. WOLFE. I do not wish to trespass upon the patience of the Convention, but I must say that I do hope the section proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, will not pass. This thing of taxing churches, school houses, and other public buildings, which have so long been exempted, is a proposition which the people will not bear, and should it be incorporated in this Constitution, I know of no other proposition which could be more effectually incorporated into it in order to ensure its rejection by the people. To insert it, would therefore be impolitic in the highest degree. Sir, let it be taken into consideration for a moment, that most of our meeting houses and school houses are built by means furnished by a very few men; that these men receive no interest for the capital thus expended, and in addition to that, are frequently the main contributors to the support of ministers and teachers. And who are you going to tax? Who would have to pay it? It would be those few who have exerted themselves to the utmost to build these churches. Now suppose the taxes are not paid; are you going to sell these churches? Will you put them up at auction to the highest bidder, in order to raise the amount levied in the way of tax? Certainly not. Then let us go on in the old beaten path, in regard to which no whisper of complaint has ever yet been heard.

Mr. RITCHEY. I hope the section will not be adopted as proposed. I entirely agree with the gentleman from Sullivan, when he says that this is a new and important proceeding, and one which I would not like to see ingrafted upon the Constitution. The gentleman from Tippecanoe has spoken of churches, as if like other property, capital was invested in them for the purpose of realizing interest; and he would say that the man who has given a hundred dollars towards the erection of a church, should be further taxed upon the amount of property which he has given away. I have contributed to almost every church in the town in which I live, and yet the gentleman would tax me on the amount I have contributed. Sir, when I have contributed any sum towards the building or repairing of a church, I consider it as gone.

Mr. PETTIT. I do not propose to tax those who contribute, but those who own the property.

Mr. RITCHEY. It makes but little difference, for this kind of property usually pays no rent. Now, suppose a man contributes to the building of most of the churches in his township, besides helping to sustain the minister. I ask you whether it is fair to tax these few men on the property which they have there given away?—for the payment of the taxes would fall upon them. So far from attempting to impose any such restriction as this on the building of churches—for I can look upon it in no other light than as a restriction—I would rather see those buildings encouraged in the towns and neighborhoods of the State. And, sir, let me say, that just in proportion as churches are built up, just in that proportion do you render your village sites and country localities desirable places for dwelling in, in the State of Indiana; and I hope they may be exempted from taxation, so that they may be considered as sacred, and that every individual in the State may feel that he has an interest in their establishment.

Mr. HAMILTON withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BASCOM said he was not going to argue the propriety of taxing churches or corporations, but there were so many other corporations got free from taxation under the garb of churches, that he hoped gentlemen would set forth in plain language what they wanted to be exempted. We had now one of the worst systems of assessment and taxation, that could be adopted. A great portion of the capital of the State was exempted from taxation, and he hoped that some means would be taken to lighten the burdens of taxation borne by those who had but little property, by placing a proportional share of it upon the shoulders of those who had much.

Mr. MATHER. I think this subject has been debated as much as it is worth, and I therefore move the previous question.

The call for the previous question was not sustained.

Mr. READ of Clarke offered to amend the amendment by exempting churches, school-houses, cemeteries, and grounds on which religious edifices are erected, not exceeding in value the sum of two thousand dollars.

Mr. MAGUIRE said he was in favor of the section as it had been offered by the gentleman from Monroe. He had had his attention called to this subject several years since, and he knew that there was great inequality in the assessment and taxation of property, both real and personal. He had, in his official capacity, as Auditor of State, called the attention of the Legislature to the subject. In the annual report made to the Legislature in December, 1847, he had made out a table, showing the average rate per acre at which the lands in the several counties were valued for taxation, in 1842 and in 1847, by which it appeared that very great inequality existed. By this table it appeared, also, that the lands, in some counties, were rated much lower, at the general valuation in 1846, than at the previous general valuation in 1841. This would appear singular enough, when we reflect, that in 1841 a general pressure prevailed all over the country, affecting sensibly the value of property, and that in 1846, every thing had become comparatively prosperous, and when every species of property was, consequently, held more valuable. In some counties, as shown by this comparison, the average value of the lands was but little over half as high in 1846, as in 1841. He would not detain the Convention by particular references to this table, his object being simply to call the attention of members to the subject, and to show that a remedy for such inequality was loudly demanded. It could hardly be expected that justice can be done, and that real estate can be equitably valued, under our system. At present, there is no check upon county assessors, and each one values the property according to his own notion. Some of them value property high, and some low, according to their respective opinions of justice, and it may be that they may sometimes be influenced to make low valuations, for the purpose of acquiring popularity. It had long appeared to him, that there should be some sort of a Board of Equalization, by which something like an approximation to equality might be attained.

With regard to personal property, he said, the matter was perhaps still worse. He was satisfied that the present system of assessing personal property, as carried out in many counties, if not universally, was exceedingly defective and inefficient. By our system, as practically carried out, every individual is permitted, as a general thing, to put what value he pleases, upon his own personal property. In Ohio, and perhaps in other States, a blank schedule is furnished to each tax-payer, which he is required to fill up, giving a description of the various kinds of property, of which he is the owner, with the value of each, and to this statement he is required by law to make affidavit. He would not say that we should require an affidavit, but something should be done to remedy the evils obviously attendant upon our present system. Some individuals, no doubt, give in the whole value of their property, whilst others probably rate theirs, for taxation, at less than half of its value. There is no question, that a large amount of personal property, entirely escapes taxation. This is unjust to those whose property consists of land, and which, being visible, never escapes taxation.

In regard to the amendments to the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, he would make a single remark: If the amendments should not prevail, and no exemptions be permitted, Indiana would be the first State in the Union, if not the first country in the world, to set the example of taxing churches, and school-houses, and grave-yards. He could not believe that this Convention would adopt a section, which would prevent the Legislature from making exemptions in favor of charitable and benevolent objects. He did not care to say what particular property, or what amount, should be exempted from taxation, but thought it the duty of the Convention, if any section about taxation should be adopted, to recognize the principle of exemption for such purposes, leaving the details to the sound discretion of the Legislature.

Mr. WATTS. Mr. PRESIDENT: I did not expect to take any part in this debate; but, sir, I feel bound to say a few words in opposition to the section as introduced by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). There are several reasons why I oppose the proposition:—one is that it lays the broad ground to tax everything—meeting houses, school houses, and all other benevolent institutions in the State. Mr. President, that is laying a broader ground for taxation than I am willing to go for.

It is true, sir, that we may lose a little tax on this kind of property; but, sir, much more than the amount lost in that way, will be gained in the correction of the morals of the people of the State, and thereby saved to community, in preventing crime; and in criminal prosecutions in your courts of justice for violations of your laws. And, Mr. President, there is one other reason I will offer before I sit down, and that is—that I consider our civil and religious liberty and prosperity, is so inseparably connected to each other, that the one cannot exist or prosper, without the other; and, sir, when the laws of the State encourage good morals, education, and religion, you thereby diminish vice, immorality, and crime, and the result will be, a lessening of the burthens of your government; and for these reasons, and others that might be named, I hope the proposition may be voted down without further delay of the Convention.

Mr. ZENOR moved to lay the section and pending amendments upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT asked for the yeas and nays which were ordered.

Mr. HALL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. ZENOR. I will do so if the gentleman from Gibson wishes to speak, but I think we have consumed time enough on this matter.

Mr. HALL. I merely wished to say that I think the section, as proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, is based upon a correct principle. I think that the Convention should do something towards equalizing the taxation, and that the principle embraced in this proposition will do it. Perhaps, however, it would be better to re-commit the section, in order that it might be brought before the Convention in a proper shape. I move that the section be re-committed to a select committee, to consist of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, the gentleman from Harrison, and the gentleman from Marion.

Mr. KILGORE. The section proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, I understand to be an original section. It may have in view a very praise-worthy object, and if ingrafted in the Constitution, may have good consequences. Take it in connection with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) and I think it covers the whole ground. It leaves to the Legislature to specify what objects should be exempted from taxation, and if the time should ever come when the people are prepared to levy a tax upon the churches and other institutions of the country, the Legislature will have the power to do so. I hope, however, that the time will never come when the Legislature of Indiana will be prepared to tax churches or other buildings constructed by the charitable portion of the community, for charitable purposes. Sir, is it so that you, in the first place, appeal to an individual to contribute to the building of a church or an asylum, and then ask him to pay a perpetual tax upon his contribution? On the one hand, it is a voluntary act; on the other it is constraint. The burden of building churches most generally falls upon a few individuals, and the burden of paying taxes, if you undertake to tax them, will fall upon the same.

There is another objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe. In most of our counties there is a pauper farm for the benefit of the indigent; and if this proposition is adopted, then, sir, you will tax even the labor of the pauper.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President: I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. PETTIT. The gentleman from Delaware is not confining himself to the question. The motion is to refer the matter to a select committee, and the gentleman is speaking on the merits of the section itself.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Delaware must confine himself to the question under consideration.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, I want the Legislature to have the power to exempt churches and charitable institutions, if they think proper to do so. Reference has been made to Masonic lodges, and other institutions of the kind. If the Legislature think proper to levy a tax upon them, let them do so. But if these institutions are intended for the benefit of the poor, then I think they ought to go free. True, if they are got up upon a joint stock principle, and the stock pays a good interest, then tax stock. You can reach it just as well as you can reach any other individual property. But, sir, I do hope that the State of Indiana will never adopt the old English mode of taxation, which begins with the highest luxury a man enjoys, and runs down even to the very hangman's rope, the lumber of the culprits coffin, and the very screws which fasten down forever the remains of the violator of the law. The people of Indiana are not prepared for any such mode of taxation. All that is required, is, that there should be a uniform mode of taxing property which is properly the subject of taxation. It is not simply the amount of property that is exempted that the State feels; but it is the amount that is not reached, and that is not exempt, which makes the remainder of taxation fall heavily upon some portions of the country. I know that great injustice is done; that individuals worth two or three hundred thousand dollars, not unfrequently give in their property as being worth not more than fifty thousand dollars. Now, what we want, is, that the actual property should be assessed, and taxed, and when that is done I think that there will be little fault to find in regard to churches, and institutions intended for benevolent purposes. When that is done, I think we will obtain all that the country can ask at the hands of the Legislature.

Mr. PETTIT. I believe that the section I offered, embraces a principle, fair and just in itself. It is true that I had not time to give it all the consideration that might be necessary to bestow upon it; and I have, therefore, no objection to its being referred, with the amendments, to a select committee, that it may be perfected and brought back to the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. Of what number does the gentleman propose the committee shall consist?

Mr. PETTIT. I should think a committee of five.

The question was then taken on the motion to refer the section and amendments to a select committee of five, and a division being called for, there were for the motion—ayes 45, noes 35.

So the motion to refer was adopted.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR LOCAL PURPOSES.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the adoption of the last section.

Mr. BORDEN. I move to amend the section by striking out the words "three-fourths" and inserting "two-thirds."

Mr. STEVENSON moved to lay the section and amendment on the table.

Mr. BORDEN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Farrow, Frisbie, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Helmer, Hendricks, Hovey, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Mather, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Watts, Wiley, and Mr. President—61.

NAYS.—Messrs. Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Borden, Golfax, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Maguire, March, May, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Murray, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Robinson, Schoonover, Smiley, Trimby, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—45.

So the section and amendment were laid upon the table.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS.

Mr. NEWMAN gave notice that he should move to alter the rules so that after all the sections of a report had been finally passed upon, additional sections might be offered.

Mr. COLFAX also gave notice that on Saturday next he should move that the time for offering resolutions should be confined to the hour between 9 and 10 o'clock on Saturdays; and that speeches on resolutions should be limited to five minutes each.

VOTING AT ELECTIONS.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in the orders of the day is report No. 13.

The first section of the report was read as follows:

"In all elections not otherwise provided for by this Constitution, every white male citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has resided in the State six months immediately preceding such election; and every white male of foreign birth of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has resided in the United States, conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, and having resided in this State six months immediately preceding such election, shall be entitled to vote in the township where he resides, except such as shall be enlisted in the army of the United States or their allies."

Mr. SIMS moved to amend the section by striking out the word "township" where it occurs in the 9th line, and inserting the word "county."

Mr. GRAHAM. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Hamilton. I move to strike out the section and insert the following:

"In all elections not otherwise provided for by this Constitution, every white male citizen of the United States of the age of 21 years and upwards, who has resided in the State one year immediately preceding such election, shall be entitled to vote in the county where he resides, except such as are enlisted in the army of the United States or their allies."

Mr. READ of Clark. I move to amend the original section by adding after the word "township" the words "or precinct."

Mr. MILLER. There are several townships in my county that have precincts, and surely the gentleman does not mean to provide that each precinct shall be an independent place of voting?

Mr. READ. I will only remark that in our county, parts of two or three townships form a precinct; and certainly I think they ought to have the same privileges as townships.

Mr. HOVEY. I will not detain the Convention further than to say that I am satisfied a large majority of the people of the State are satisfied with the law as it is. At any rate I think there are details that may safely be left to the Legislature.

Mr. COOKERLY. I believe that if we put that provision in the Constitution it will lose a great many votes. I am in favor of every man voting in his own township.

Mr. WOLFE. I am entirely in favor of allowing the people to vote anywhere in their county, because the people in various counties of the State have been applying to the Legislature for years to have the law changed; and even now one-half of the counties have special laws on the subject. The people in this matter ought not to be trammelled. It appears that every kind of latitude is to be given to the Legislature, but the people themselves are to be bottled up and corked [laughter. and "consent"].

The question was then taken on the amendment proposing to add the words "or precinct," and it was rejected.

Mr. ——— moved to amend the section by adding the words, "and has paid a poll tax the preceding year of one dollar towards the support of the Government." He said that there were thirty-two thousand polls delinquent—those who paid no taxes, and it appeared to him that as taxation and representation went together, there was no other way of making those voters contribute to the support of the Government than by making them pay a poll tax. Precedents were not wanted for this. There were eleven States in the Union which had adopted a provision of this kind in their Constitutions. It was to be found in the Constitutions of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Vermont, North Carolina, South Carolina, Ohio, and Georgia. He thought there was no other way of getting a poll tax of thirty thousand dollars which was annually lost to the State.

Mr. KENT moved to lay the amendment on the table, which was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON. The substitute proposed by the gentleman from Hamilton (Mr. Clarke) strikes at the very root of the section, and I am really surprised at the source from which it has emanated. The gentleman and myself both belong to the same political party, and yet in that party there are constant quarrels in regard to foreigners. What does the proposed substitute say? Why that none but citizens of the United States shall exercise the elective franchise. We have already adopted a section saying that persons coming into the United States and declaring their intentions shall, after a residence of six months, enjoy the privilege of the elective franchise. Does the gentleman from Hamilton expect that the Convention will rescind what they have already acted upon? Sir, I regret exceedingly that I have to speak upon this subject. Delicacy, perhaps, would say I ought not. When this subject was up before I endeavored to provide that we should have nothing beyond the elective franchise until naturalized. This has ever been my opinion. We ask not to hold office until we are citizens in the fullest sense of the term. But, sir, there is a large class of intelligent men who come from the old world, who desire to be free and to get away from the land of the oppressed, although I own that many of them, too, are unworthy. I must say that I regret that this amendment has emanated from the source from which it has come; and I regret it as a still greater misfortune that the whig party should generally act in that way. I say here that this course of conduct has been the bane of that party. So far as I am concerned, I never will recognize a party which acts in any such way.

Mr. GORDON moved to amend the section by striking out the words "in the township where he resides" and inserting "at such place as may be provided by law." [Loud cries of "consent, consent, consent."]

Mr. MURRAY said, the township system had been introduced for the purpose of preventing corruptions. He believed that the people generally were well satisfied with the law—that it had produced peace and purity in the country. Complaints had often been made by electors on the score of being dragged away from home to attend to the public business. He was satisfied that they should vote in their townships rather than go elsewhere.

Mr. CLARK of Hamilton. The gentleman from Allen (Mr. Hamilton) has adverted in somewhat severe terms to the substitute I have offered for this section. In reply to his observations in regard to foreigners, I think it is quite proper that they should have some short time in which to become acquainted with the institutions of our country, and the habits of our people. I think that they come here ignorant of all that appertains to the nature and principles of our government, and that they are consequently not in a condition to vote knowingly. I do not however expect the Convention to pass this section as a whig measure. I have as much respect for foreigners as the gentleman from Allen has; but for their own sakes and for the sake of the country, when they do vote, I want them to vote with a knowledge of our institutions. When foreigners come here they have not, in a large majority of cases, either a knowledge of our institutions or our language; and I am satisfied that even now those who are duly naturalized hold the balance of power between the two great political parties. I would give them sufficient time to become thoroughly acquainted with our political institutions.

Mr. CLEMENTS said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: In justice to myself, I must explain the reasons I have for voting for the amendment. My constituents, sir, are opposed to being confined to their own townships for the purpose of voting. We have had such a law as that in force, and it was unpopular with us. I therefore hope the word "township" will be stricken out, and the word "county" substituted therefor.

If this amendment does not prevail, I shall feel bound to vote against the engrossment of the section as it now stands. Not on the ground of the liberal provisions contained in it, in extending the elective franchise to foreigners, but because it will restrict voters to their own townships, a principle I know my people do not want.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I have paid considerable attention to the operation of this township business. I am satisfied that much good grows out of the present law, restraining voters to their own townships. So far from its being the case, that the county seats desire to have the votes of the out townships cast there, my experience is directly the contrary. Previous to that time, it was the custom to invite them up by arrangement. A good deal of treating was done at the county seats. Arrangements were made to have certain drill officers to manage the voters when they came. In the county of Marion, one-half of the votes of the townships were given at the county seat. So far from desiring anything of the kind, we are satisfied that each township should regulate its own affairs, and have its own votes polled there. The consequence is that by this means we know the result by eight or nine o'clock. There is no rioting, no disturbance, no shoudering of men out. This thing only suits trickstering politicians. They get a large multitude together for the purpose of carrying out some scheme which they could not otherwise carry out. I hope that the amendment will not be adopted, and that the section will remain as it is. I now move to lay the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be taken first on laying the amendment offered by the gentleman from Howard on the table.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, they resulted as follows—yeas 72, nays 31:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—72.

NAYS.—Messrs. Blythe, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Dobson, Farrow, Frisbie, Gordon, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Lockhart, May, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Robinson, Schoonover, Sims, Todd, Wolfe, Yocum, and Mr. President—31.

So the amendment to the amendment was laid on the table.

Pending the question on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Hamilton on the table,

The Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, DEC. 24, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. FARROW, a Delegate. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HALL, from the select committee on that subject, reported a section, "providing that no man shall be held for the debt, default, or miscarriage of any other person, upon any contract entered into from and after the year 1860, except in cases where executors, administrators, guardians, trustees, and public officers are required to give bond and security, and where security is given by persons acting in a fiduciary capacity."

The section was read a first time, and passed to a second reading.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day.

The first thing in order being the section on its third reading, which prohibits the Legislature from passing special acts, authorizing suits against the State.

The question being, Shall the section pass? the yeas and nays were taken with the following result—yeas 91, nays 16:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Borden, Bourne, Bryant, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—91.

NAYS.—Messrs. Blythe, Hardin, Hovey, Kilgore, Moore, Prather, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Robinson, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, and Wolfe—16.

The section prohibiting lotteries, was read a third time, and the rule requiring the yeas and nays being suspended, it was passed by unanimous consent.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section defining the qualification of voters, fixing the place of voting, &c.

The pending question being on the motion of the gentleman from Hamilton, (Mr. Clark,) to strike out the section, and insert a substitute, to the effect that in all elections, not otherwise provided for by this Constitution, every white male citizen of the United States of twenty-one years of age and upwards, who has resided in the State one year immediately preceding such election, shall be entitled to vote in the county where he resides, except such as shall be enlisted in the armies of the United States or their allies.

Mr. NILES. I would inquire whether it would be in order now, to move an amendment to the original section?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. NILES. I move the following amendment:

"Strike out, in the fifth line, the words 'the United States,' and insert the words 'this State.' Also, strike out in the seventh and eighth lines, the words 'and having resided in this State six months immediately preceding such election.'"

The part of the section relating to persons of foreign birth, would then read as follows:

"And any white male of foreign birth of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, having resided in this State one year, and having declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, shall be entitled to vote in the township where he resides, except such as shall be enlisted in the army of the United States or their allies."

I will take the liberty of remarking, that my object in moving this amendment is, that while persons who settle among us in good faith, with a view to make this State their permanent home, may have the right to vote on declaring their intentions, according to law, to become naturalized; the section may not include those transient persons who are employed in large numbers on our public works, and who could sometimes be induced to vote at the instance of their employer. The effect of the section, as it now stands, might be to give a railroad contractor fifty votes instead of one. Such a man would occasionally be able to control our local elections. This would be an irregularity and an evil which all good citizens would regret, and by guarding against it we do no wrong to our substantial immigrant population. A residence of a year would generally exclude from voting, the companies of railroad hands who follow the progress of our public improvements from point to point, and who acquire little knowledge of our institutions and no fixed interest in the country; but it would require of a German of foreign birth, only the same actual residence in the State as has hitherto been required of native born citizens of Ohio or Virginia. I think this would be no more than a fair compromise on the part of those who advocate the section as it now stands. We certainly do no injury to the foreigner when we require a residence of one year to entitle him to all the political rights enjoyed by native born or naturalized citizens of the United States. I am by no means certain but that the section ought to require that the application for naturalization should be made, say six months, before the time of voting; but I am willing to compromise on the plan I have suggested.

It is undoubtedly the true interest of the State to invite emigration from Europe as well as from our sister States, and after some reflection upon the subject, I am well convinced that we shall suffer no essential injury by extending the right of suffrage to our entire permanent population. The only object in requiring a six months residence of a citizen of New York is, that we may have some substantial evidence of an actual change of domicile, and I can see no essential necessity of a five years residence in the United States to qualify a foreigner to give a judicious vote. I have not been able to satisfy myself that the Constitution and laws of the United States prohibit to unnaturalized foreigners, who are residents of the State, the right to vote.

It may be remembered by some members of the Convention, that I opposed with great earnestness, if not with too much warmth, the proposition to disfranchise men because of their particular occupation or calling. I also had the misfortune to differ with nearly all the gentlemen from the northern part of the State, with whom it affords me very great pleasure, generally, to act, upon the proposition to give to the smaller counties more than their due proportion, according to numbers, of representation. While I am disposed to make citizenship and manhood the only essential tests of qualification for office, and to base representation solely upon men without any reference to the territory over which they might be scattered, so in determining the right to vote I would look more at the fact of our common humanity than at the place where the voter happened to be born. I am willing to go as far as any prudent man, in recognizing by our laws the great fact of the brotherhood of the human race. The same principle governs me in determining the qualifications for office, the basis of representation, and the right to vote. Some evils may result from universal suffrage, but they are evils which will cure themselves. And if our institutions can be sustained at all, it will be upon the principle of equal rights.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. I cannot come to the conclusion that the gentleman who has just taken his seat has arrived at. In judging of the merits of a law, we have to look at its general action, and not its operation in an isolated case. We are not to bring up isolated cases to determine the policy of that law—we are to take the general principle and see how it acts upon the State of Indiana. The gentleman says that those who are employed upon public works, might be induced to act in this matter under the influence of their employers. That may be true; and if it be, I think it is the duty of this Convention to guard against the exercise of such influences. But, sir, while we are guarding the public against a mere fragment of the foreign population, we are doing an injustice to the mass. The great mass of the foreign population which has settled amongst us, is engaged for the most part, in agricultural pursuits; they are intelligent and moral in character, very industrious, and make most worthy and respectable citizens. And, sir, I have no doubt, bearing in mind the characteristics of the people of the country from whence they come, that when they once get into a land in which they can exercise the rights of freemen, they would be the last to surrender their rights at the dictation of any man. I will add further, that this is a subject which can be debated pro and con., at great length. When we talk of enfranchising the foreign population, we see that the field is boundless—inexhaustible; yet I hope the question will not be opened up for discussion. It is a question which has been thoroughly discussed in nearly every State in the Union, and I presume every member has made up his mind as to how he shall vote upon the subject now before the Convention. I would throw out the suggestion, as it is probable we shall adjourn over to-morrow, that we vote to-day, without any speech making. Let us try it and see how the experiment will work. [Loud cries of "consent."]

Mr. GREGG. I hope, Mr. President, that the motion made by the gentleman from Hamilton, (Mr. Clark,) to strike out the latter clause of this section, will not prevail. And especially do I hope that the few whigs who have the honor of a seat in this body, will not place themselves in a false position in regard to this matter, by voting against the section as it now stands, or by seeking to encumber it with unnecessary amendments. I know, sir, it had been the policy of political demagogues for the last twenty years, and I am sorry to say they have succeeded to some extent, to impress upon the minds of the foreign population among us, that the whigs, as a party, were opposed to their acquiring any political rights under our State or national governments, and that the democratic party were their particular and peculiar friends. And, sir, I was sorry to hear my worthy friend from Allegheny, on my left, (Mr. Hamilton,) giving color to this idea, in his remarks on yesterday afternoon.

Sir, I deny the truth of the proposition, that the whigs as a party, are or ever have been opposed to foreign immigration, or to the adoption of the most liberal policy for extending to them all the rights and privileges of American citizenship. It is true there may be exceptions to this rule among the whig party, as there are exceptions in all other parties. There may be those among us who are at heart Native Americans, and who honestly believe that the true policy of our government is to disfranchise our foreign population until they shall have resided here at least twenty-one years. But this sentiment is not peculiar to those who may affiliate with the whigs in other respects, but may be found with those also, who take rank with the democratic party, in matters of general politics. And indeed, sir, if I may be pardoned for alluding to Thomas Jefferson in this connection, I might say that he once entertained a sentiment very nearly akin to Native Americanism. He says "I hope we may find some means in future of shielding ourselves from foreign influence, political, commercial, or in whatever form it may be attempted. I can scarcely withhold myself (he adds) from joining in the wish of Silas Deane, that there was an ocean of fire between us and the old world."

There may be those in our day who entertain similar sentiments. But I am not one of them. There may be those among us who would distrust the patriotism and fidelity of our foreign population, should a difficulty arise between our government and that to which they were lately subject. But I for one have no fears of them. They have, it is true, their national prejudices, and early predilections in favor of their native land—but they are none the less good citizens, because of this feeling. And upon many a hard fought battle-field have they attested their devotion to the honor and interests of their adopted country, by pouring out their blood like water, and laying down their lives side by side with our native born citizens.

But, Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss this question. My position in regard to foreigners was clearly defined upon the consideration of another question some time ago. I then remarked, and I now repeat, that I would throw open wide the portals of our country, and bid the oppressed and down trodden of all the earth a hearty welcome. I would say to the honest German, and open hearted Irishman, come—and this, let me say to my friend on the left, would embrace all of his countrymen of the Emerald Isle, for, so far as I know, they are all open-hearted and generous to a fault. I would say to the oppressed of all Europe, come, and share with us freely all the blessings of civil, political, and religious liberty. This, sir, I regard as the true whig doctrine, pure and unadulterated—and I, for one, am willing to stand by it.

Mr. BORDEN. Mr. PRESIDENT: It will be remembered, perhaps, that, at an early period of the session, I presented a resolution which was sent to the committee upon the right of suffrage. It was to this effect, viz.:

"Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise inquire into the expediency of providing in the Constitution for the exercise of the right of suffrage, so that, in no instance shall the exercise of that right depend upon the naturalization laws of Congress; and, also, to inquire into the propriety of allowing persons of foreign birth, who shall have resided one year in this State, declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, (or denizens of this State,) and taken the oath of allegiance to our own, and abjuration of all foreign governments, the privilege of voters."

I desire now to endeavor to carry out the object which I had in view when I proposed that resolution. I desire, sir, as soon as it will be in order, to amend the section under consideration by striking out the words "United States," in the seventh line, and inserting the words "denizen of this State," immediately after the words "citizens of the United States," in the sixth line. The section, if thus amended, will read as follows: "Every white male of foreign birth, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, having resided in the State one year, and having declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, or a denizen of this State, conformable to the laws on the subject of naturalization, &c., &c., &c., shall be entitled to vote." My object in desiring to make this amendment is this: that the privilege of the right of suffrage shall never depend entirely upon the action of Congress. If we pass the section as it now stands, the matter would wholly depend upon the action of the General Government.

Sir, suppose Congress should entirely repeal all the laws admitting persons of foreign birth to citizenship, would it be the policy of Indiana not to have the power reserved in her Constitution to enable her to pass laws on this subject herself, and admit foreigners to the privilege of denization? The policy of the State, it seems to me, demands the retention of that power. I know that it is usually said there is no probability that Congress would wholly repeal the naturalization laws. But, sir, we cannot say what will be the future action of that body upon this subject. The time may and probably will come, when not only the British Possessions north of us, but the half-civilized Mexican Republic south of us, will be swallowed up by the spread of our dominion, and form a part of this country. Ours will in truth be an "ocean bound republic." What laws men representing such a vast continent may pass, no human foresight can now anticipate. Other States, in their amended Constitutions, have provided for such a contingency. I desire that we should follow their example; for, hereafter, if Congress should entirely repeal the naturalization laws, or extend the term of residence in the country to enable persons to avail themselves of the naturalization laws, to an unreasonable length, foreigners immigrating to this continent will be induced to settle in those States where they might be admitted as denizens, and thus capital and labor would be diverted from our State. This can be easily avoided by making the change in the language of the section, as I have suggested. It would place the matter where it now is as long as the acts of Congress now in force shall remain unrepealed. But, when such an event should occur, as the repeal of those laws, then the State could pass a law by which persons of foreign birth could apply to become denizens of this State.

It may be objected that the subject of naturalization is exclusively committed to Congress, and that the States can pass no laws on that subject. This I believe is a mistake. It will be recollected by gentlemen that, before the formation of the Constitution of the United States, while the States were acting under the old Articles of Confederation, every State exercised the uncontrolled power to make denizens or citizens at their pleasure. All the persons inhabiting the States were divided into two classes: citizens by birth, or those who were aliens born. These last were, in respect to their rights, divided again into what were called naturalized citizens or denizens. The rights of each of the two latter classes depended upon the Constitution of the several States, the acts of their State Legislatures, and the common law. The rights conferred by naturalization were much fuller and more plenary than those granted to the denizen. The fact of naturalization conferred in the mother country the full and unqualified privileges of the subject born within the dominions of Great Britain—except, perhaps, such political rights as being elected to Parliament and so forth—while the rights conferred upon the denizen were more limited in their operation. A naturalized citizen, by the common law, could not only take and hold real estate, and convey the same as a natural born citizen, but his children can inherit the same as a natural born subject. But when the privilege of denization was granted, it might be upon certain conditions; as for instance: it might only be for a term of years, or for life, or to the heirs of his body, or to his heirs generally, or for a particular purpose and intent. The denizen may purchase lands and transmit them to his heirs—that is, his issue born after, and not before his denization—and the person does not necessarily acquire the right of taking by inheritance.

I allude to this merely to show that there was a broad distinction between a citizen and a denizen, according to the British laws, and the laws of the several States, previous to the formation of the United States Constitution. Now it has been a question with some, whether the power of naturalization is not in its nature, one which must be exclusively exercised by the General Government, or whether it is one which can be exercised by the States in connection with the General Government.

At an early period in the history of our Government, it was decided by judges Wilson and Blair, of the Supreme Court of the United States, both of whom were in the Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States, that the States enjoyed a concurrent jurisdiction with Congress, upon the subject of naturalization. The correctness of this decision has since been questioned by Kent and several others, but some of the most learned jurists in the United States are still of the opinion of the judges who made the first decision. But, sir, whether the power be exclusively vested in Congress or not, when it is exercised by them, the question rises whether the rule laid down in the case of Sturgis vs. Crownshield, (4th Wheaton's Report,) will not apply to this subject. The power of Congress to pass laws on the subject of bankruptcy and naturalization, are conferred in the same section of the Constitution, and it would necessarily seem that the same rule should govern in both cases. It was decided in that case, that if Congress neglected to pass a bankrupt law, then the States could pass laws upon the subject of bankruptcy. Now sir, I infer that the same course of reasoning will confer upon the States the right to pass laws on the subject of naturalization in case Congress should repeal all the laws on the subject, and thus persons might apply to become citizens under the laws of the State. I ask then, would it not be prudent for us to alter the section under consideration, as I suggested, and not place words in it by which aliens cannot become citizens but by force of the acts of Congress. Sir, the time may come when we might desire to admit those persons by virtue of our own laws, but in case the section is adopted as it was reported, it would be out of our power to do so, except by an alteration of the Constitution.

But, sir, whatever may be the decision of the question, as to the power of the State to naturalize persons of foreign birth, either with or without any law of Congress on the subject, I am clearly of opinion that every State has the power to make what is termed a "denizen." As I stated before, not only the common law, but the laws of the several States made a broad distinction between a citizen and a denizen. And when the power was surrendered by the States, to the General Government, to pass laws on the subject of naturalization, they have always unquestionably retained to themselves the power of "denization." The Constitution of the United States declares that all power not given to Congress and not prohibited to the States, are retained to the States. Is the power of denization granted to Congress?—is the exercise of it prohibited to the States? These are the questions. I presume that no one will contend that either is the case. Then, sir, why not insert the words I propose, so that the person who has been by the laws of the State, admitted to the privilege of a denizen, may be allowed to vote and hold an office in the State, from the Governor down to the smallest county office in the gift of the people. Sir, I believe the States have wisely retained this power of "denization," and while it was very proper for them to give up to Congress the exclusive control of the subject of naturalization, yet they probably thought the time might come, especially in those States having large unsettled tracts of land, when they would desire to adopt a more liberal course towards foreigners, than the General Government would pursue. Gentlemen will recollect that towards the close of the last century, at the time the celebrated alien laws were passed during the administration of the elder Adams, the wisdom of the States in retaining this power was made most completely manifest. Sir, I think that every motive of sound policy demands of us to so form our Constitution as not to place this matter wholly under the control of Congress, and entirely beyond the reach of the policy which our own State may hereafter desire to pursue. If the change be made which I propose, then the alien will only be under the necessity of applying to become a citizen under the laws in force for the time being, no matter whether they were laws of the State, or laws of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman from Jefferson alludes to a remark I made on the subject of a motion of the delegate from Hamilton, (Mr. Clark,) expressing my regret that all the opposition to foreigners on this floor should come from members of the whig party, with whom I have long acted—that this was the second time it was made manifest by members of that party in this Convention—that many who, like myself, had emigrated from a foreign land to seek a home in this Republic, had long urged to me that the whigs, as a party, were much opposed to an early naturalization of foreigners, or to their right to vote until they became fully naturalized. If this was true, and that was to be ingrafted on the whig creed, I could not act with them. True it matters little to any party whether I act with them or not. This, Mr. President, was, I think, the substance of what I then hastily said last evening, so far as I recollect, for I kept no notes. It is perhaps due from me to say, that I may have spoken too generally of the whig party. To the liberality of several members of that party on the subject of foreigners exercising the elective franchise, I can bear my humble testimony. What I intended to say was, to express my regret that all attempts against them here was by whigs. I denounce no gentleman. They have a right to their opinions, and I to express my regret that such should be held by any member of the party with whom I have acted. I have no desire to make a charge against the whigs as a party. It is enough for me, as a member of this Convention, to express my disapprobation of these measures affecting a large class of inhabitants in the county I have the honor in part to represent. I have no desire to injure the feelings of any honorable member of this Convention.

It is enough for me to govern my own actions. This, Mr. President, is all I desire to say on this subject.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I feel almost compelled to occupy the attention of the Convention a few moments on this subject. I do not purpose to discuss the question; but, sir, as I am a whig and as I shall vote against the section under consideration, I feel it necessary to make a short explanation. It has been intimated that as whigs are charged with being opposed to foreigners, that, therefore, to counteract such a supposition, every whig should vote for this clause to be inserted in the new Constitution.

I am happy to be able to say that so little of party feeling have we had manifested in this Convention, that I had almost forgotten that I was a whig. And I cheerfully testify that the gentlemen who are in a party majority here, have carefully abstained from party discussions and allusions to parties. These topics have more frequently been referred to by those of my own political faith. But in voting now, as I trust I have hitherto voted, I shall have no reference to the influence which my vote may have on the political fortunes of my party.

I hope I shall, as I believe every gentleman in this body will, vote conscientiously, and only in reference to the propriety of the measure itself. I cannot admit, sir, that it is any part of the duty of a whig to give any electioneering vote in this body for the advancement of his party. With the gentleman from Allen, who intimated that if the whig party should oppose this section he would hardly act with it longer, I can almost say that if the whig party should, instead of seeking after what is true and right, set about auctioneering for votes, that I would be almost constrained to abandon it too. But then, sir, I do not say this by way of threatening it with any great harm, for, sir, I do not fancy that it would suffer any great loss.

Mr. HAMILTON [interposing] said: Will the gentleman repeat what he said; I did not hear.

Mr. CLARK. No great matter. I only said that if I should separate from the whigs they would suffer no great loss.

But, sir, in voting against this section I do it with no feelings of hostility to the foreigners, and with no disposition to exclude them from our State, or from the enjoyment of any essential right necessary to them. But independently of any other reason, I oppose this as an evasion and a violation of the Constitution of the United States. The States have delegated to the General Government the authority to naturalize foreigners; Congress has passed laws on the subject, and prescribed the conditions on which foreigners may become citizens and acquire the right to vote. If all the States evade these laws by prescribing other conditions and other modes of making citizens, this provision of the Constitution of the United States becomes a nullity. And thus one of those compromises of the Constitution, designed for the common security of all, the sacredness of which has been so eloquently described heretofore, is defeated and disregarded. Now, sir, I do not feel myself authorized to disregard, or in any manner to evade this Constitutional provision, or to assume authority to the State which has been expressly delegated to the General Government.

If it be thought that our naturalization laws are unreasonably burdensome toward foreigners, providing that they shall be residents for five years, and disavow all allegiance to other governments, before they are permitted to vote, the proper remedy appears to me would be found in a modification of the laws of Congress. If it be desirable that the moment a foreigner sets his foot on our shores, that he shall be invested with the privilege of voting, let that object be brought in the proper manner, and let it be accomplished through the intervention of the proper authority. Now although I am unwilling to dispute the truth of the principle of universal suffrage, yet I should think it could fairly embrace only the citizens of the nation over which the government, in which such a principle is recognized, extends. All mankind are not at present of one nation. And when any one is invested with this privilege, it by no means follows that no guarantee ought to be demanded of him, for the proper performance of so sacred a trust. It would not seem unreasonable that the voter shall in some manner identify himself with, or attach himself to the people over whom he is to exercise the right of government.

I profess, sir, to have as great sympathy and as fraternal a regard for all men as the gentleman can. But in all the affairs of government it is necessary to exercise discretion, and discretion is entirely necessary in the delegation of the sovereignty of the State which places in the hands of those to whom it is entrusted, the power of controlling the destiny of all others. We have appointed a probation for our native born citizens; we do not allow them to vote until they have attained the age of twenty-one years. We have provided that before they shall be eligible to some offices they shall have attained a still greater age. This is done, not because of hostility to them, but for their security as well as for the security of all others.

I felt it my duty to make this brief explanation, because we who are whigs have been admonished not to vote against this clause, lest foreigners should be prejudiced against the whig party, and because this measure would be carried at all events by a very large majority. I cannot allow any such reason to influence my vote. It is my duty to submit to the decision of the majority, but not to surrender my judgment merely for the sake of being on the stronger side. I think patriotism requires the contrary course. The minority ought, if they think their opinions to be founded in truth to maintain them, and endeavor to convince the majority of their error.

The lover of truth ought not to be venal, and barter honest opinions for power. Our government contemplates no such degradation as this. Obedience to the will of the majority, when expressed in the form of a law, is all that it demands. But it will not permit any law to restrain the freedom of speech or of thought.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I do not wish to occupy more than a moment of the time of this body. I feel it due to my constituents and myself, to say a very few words. The amendment of the gentleman from Hamilton, at first sight, appears to be equitable, but it is not so. The moment the foreigner lands here, you require from him all the support which taxation affords, the same as from any citizen; but when he comes to the ballot-box, you tell him to stand back for five years. This, I think, is not equitable. Now it is prima facie evidence, to me, that when a foreigner wends his way to this country, he must have some idea of the principles which govern us. It is clear, to me, that it must be a feeling of republicanism that leads him from the land of tyranny, to this land of liberty, for the purpose of becoming a citizen. Those are qualifications sufficient, I think, to entitle the poor foreigner, who loves liberty better than the land of his birth, to exercise the right of voting, after living in the State six months. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock will not be adopted.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. I must remark here, that I regret exceedingly, the names of the two great parties being called into question upon this occasion. I do hope that party considerations, and party predilections and party questions will be entirely kept out of view here. If gentlemen of any party have excuses to make for their conduct in reference to this question, let them make those excuses and apologies to their constituents, and not throw anything into the Convention that will act as a fire-brand, and excite party strife and contention amongst us. I will frankly declare my preference for the section as reported by the committee; I think I am duty bound to vote for it as it is. I would do so for the reason that I can conceive of no course by which we could more strongly attach to our government and institutions, the foreigners who are so constantly flocking into the country, than to give them a share in the privileges we enjoy—the privilege of choosing rulers for themselves, and of voting at our general and special elections. It certainly would attach them to our institutions quicker and more permanently than any other method. It is true we have here an asylum for the oppressed of all nations; we want them to flock here; we are heartily willing to receive them—in fact, they are coming in by thousands. I think then, it would be sound policy to adopt that course which would the sooner attach them to our Government, and national institutions. From what portion of the world do the most of them come? A very large proportion from Germany. The character of that people is one conspicuous for honesty, uprightness and integrity. Perhaps in no portion of the world is there to be found a more upright, honorable, and industrious people than in Germany, with the exception of our own people. There is a large German population in this State, which truly may be classed amongst our most valued citizen. Wherever they settle, though it were a desert, by dint of their earnest perseverance and industry, they soon make it blossom like a rose. In my own county we have a large German population—and they are flowing in continually—and I will say without any disparagement to others in that county, that the Germans are as upright, hard-working people, and have done as much for the improvement of the county, as any of the other inhabitants of it. And I will add, that they have nearly as good an idea of our laws and institutions, as have any other citizen of the county. Therefore, to attach them the more permanently, I would say that as soon as they are here six months, "You will walk up to the polls and record your vote like any other man." I would invite the down-trodden victims of all Europe to come in here; for here, sir, is emphatically "the home of the free." I would like that those who have been crushed down by the iron arm of despotism, should come here among us in this land of freedom, and share the blessings which have been secured for us by the blood and the treasure of our forefathers. I would say, come and share all the privileges which we enjoy, as soon as you declare your intention to become citizens of our Republic.

Mr. HOVEY. I would not detain the Convention a moment on this occasion, were it not for the constitutional objection raised by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark). He alleges that we have no right to permit foreigners to vote until they have complied with the acts of Congress in regard to naturalization. It will be remembered that HENRY CLAY used the same argument in the Senate of the United States in the debate on the pre-emption law, in 1841, in which he contended that "the exercise of the elective franchise implies citizenship," and that, consequently, no State has the power to confer the right of suffrage upon foreigners not naturalized.

The section now under discussion, if adopted, will permit foreigners who have taken the first oath of naturalization under the acts of Congress, and resided one year in the United States and six months in this State immediately preceding the election, the right to vote

There are two questions which present themselves to my mind in considering this section. The first is, does it conflict with the Constitution of the United States and the acts of Congress passed in conformity therewith?

And secondly, if constitutional would it be prudent and wise to adopt it?

To a correct understanding of the first question it is necessary to define the rights of the people, the rights of the States as political corporations, and the rights of the government of the United States under the Federal Constitution.

The true theory of government is, that all power is inherent in and emanates from the people who compose a State, and it is perfectly immaterial, so far as the laws of nature are concerned, whether that people is composed of native born citizens or aliens.

To make my meaning more comprehensible, I will suppose a territory not under any laws or government, filled with inhabitants, native born and aliens, in a sufficient number to make it necessary that some rules should be established for their protection and happiness; they meet in mass, every one being independent of each other, and equal as to their political rights and privileges; they agree upon certain rules, and consign to persons to be chosen the power to enforce them. In such rules, too, it is generally laid down who shall and who shall not exercise the rights and privileges of a citizen of the State, and who shall and who shall not be permitted to enter the body politic. Without restrictions, whoever might enter the territory would, by complying with the laws, be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the native born; hence laws prohibiting the exercise of the elective franchise until after a limited time—laws of naturalization, &c. A state thus formed, can exercise all the powers conferred, and no other; the residue is reserved to the people, in their sovereign capacity.

In the same manner, theoretically, the United States government was formed, the people of the States conceding, by the Federal Constitution, certain rights and privileges for the welfare of the whole; and the only powers that can be exercised under that instrument, are those which are plainly expressed, or which arise from the same by necessary implication. All other persons, of what kind soever, are retained by the States or the people, in their sovereign capacity. This being the case, the constitutionality of the question before the Convention is narrowed down to this: Did the States confer upon the General Government the power to prescribe for them rules or laws regulating the right of suffrage in the States? If so I would ask, in which part of the Constitution that grant is to be found? I am certain that no such grant can be found; and if not, that power is reserved to the States, and we can establish any rule in regard to suffrage that we may think proper. I will read the only section that I can find, that relates to suffrage, in the Federal Constitution. Section two, of article one, is as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen by the PEOPLE of the several States. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures."

In the first paragraph of this section it will be observed that the PEOPLE of the several States, not "the citizens of the United States," are to choose the Representatives in Congress. From this phraseology I think it is reasonable to infer that the framers of that Constitution contemplated the possibility of the States, in their several capacities, granting suffrage to those who might not be citizens of the United States. But should doubt exist, it seems to me that the succeeding part of the section will at once dispel it. Those who vote for Representatives to Congress, are to have the same qualifications as those who are authorized by the State laws to vote for Representatives in the State Legislatures; thus leaving the qualifications to be determined by the laws of the several States, which it is well known are very dissimilar. Now if it was not intended to leave to the States the power of determining who should and who should not vote, why did not the Delegates who formed the Federal Constitution specify the necessary qualifications? I think no reasonable answer can be given inconsistent with the construction which I have placed upon the section which I have read.

Again: the history of our territories and new States fully prove that this is the correct construction. The "free white inhabitants" of Michigan, a large number of whom were aliens, constituted the population under which that State was admitted into the Union. California, within the last year, with a population of at least one-third alien, has been admitted as a State without, I believe, any serious objection on that account. Illinois, even since her formation as a State, has permitted aliens to exercise the elective franchise before naturalization. They have elected Congressmen by such votes, and their Representatives thus elected have been admitted to their seats without objection.

It is contended that the power conferred on the General Government "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization" in section 8, article 1, Constitution United States, deprives the States of the right to admit to foreigners the privileges of citizenship without a compliance with the laws passed by Congress under that section. At least it is said that the States cannot confer upon them the right of suffrage. Now it seems to me, that this argument leads further than its friends desire. If the States cannot grant them the privilege of voting, they cannot permit them to purchase lands. One is as much of a natural right as the other, and as good reasons can be given for the prohibition in the one case as in the other.

It has sometimes been contended that if we allow foreigners to vote, they might use their influence to subvert our government. Might it not be just as reasonably said that we ought to prohibit them from purchasing lands, lest they should have the means within our country, in times of war, of "giving aid and comfort to our enemies?"

Experience has taught us that all such fears are groundless. They are generally patriotic and devoted to our institutions and are found with our native born citizens, standing shoulder to shoulder, in the battles of our country.

There is still another view which satisfies me that the position assumed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, is incorrect. If the effect is to be given to the clause in regard to naturalization which he contends for, Congress would virtually have power to check immediately, all immigration to the States. They could pass such laws as would for many years deprive aliens of the privileges of citizens and thus roll back the full tide of immigration to our State. Men worthy of becoming American citizens, would not settle in a State where they would be thus denied the ordinary privileges of freemen.

In my opinion, those who framed the Constitution of the United States, only intended to give to Congress, under the naturalization clause, the power to protect the general government—to prevent aliens filling federal offices without complying with the laws they might think proper to adopt, and to say under what conditions the government of the United States would receive and protect those born in foreign lands in the same manner that she guards and protects her native born freemen.

From these considerations, I am constrained to believe that there is no doubt of our constitutional authority to adopt the section. I have taken some trouble to investigate it, for I was confident the question would be raised. My friend from Vanderburgh (Mr. Blythe) for whose legal opinions I have much respect, has also examined the constitutional question, and I am happy to say that he has no doubt of our power to adopt the section.

A few words now in regard to the second question. "Would it be prudent and wise to adopt the section?"

I shall not attempt to eulogize our foreign population, but will merely say that by a compliance with the provisions of the section under debate, I am willing to hail them as freemen. Indiana has a population of scarcely a million, while her commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing resources are capable of sustaining in ease and affluence, at least ten millions of souls. I hold it sir, to be the duty of this Convention, and that it should be the policy of our legislators, to increase our numbers by every honorable means; and I regard the offer of equality to those who flee from the oppressions of other lands to be one of the surest means that can be used to bring about that desirable result. We need not fear them, they have left the yoke of the tyrant behind, and will be among the last who would willingly wear it here. I shall support the section as reported by the committee, and vote against all amendments.

Mr. TAYLOR said it was with deep regret that he found himself compelled to differ from his honorable colleague, in relation to this subject. The reasons which had been assigned had failed to satisfy his mind that the original section ought to be adopted.

It does seem to me, continued Mr. Taylor, that where a man comes to this country to seek a new home here, he ought not on an account of a mere technical reason, to be deprived of the right of suffrage. We have nothing to lose by granting it, but every thing to gain.

I have no desire sir, to make any political capital out of this question. I make no speeches for Buncombe. It has always been the pride of my life to succor by all practicable means, the oppressed of every country, who seek a home among us. I have always been in favor of granting all privileges that can properly be granted to those who come to reside in this State. And sir, because we may have a few persons coming among us who have no intention to become citizens, does that constitute a sufficient reason why we should exclude the honest man from the enjoyment of the rights of citizens who comes here and brings with him his family with the intention of becoming a permanent resident? Why should we say to him, you must be subjected to a certain probationary process, you must be a resident for twelve months, before you shall be permitted to exercise the elective franchise? Is this necessary, in order to exclude some two or three hundred foreigners who are mere temporary residents in the State? I think not. I think he should be entitled to exact at our hands the privileges to which a citizen is entitled. It is too great a burthen upon him, that he should be deprived of the right of suffrage, merely because a few votes may be cast which ought not to be given.

I do not mean to discuss the question, but merely to indicate my opposition to the proposition of the gentleman. I am in favor of opening the door to the admission of foreigners, when they come among us, and giving them political rights, which appertain to citizens of the State.

Mr. PETTIT. I am in favor of this resolution as it stands without alteration of any kind either in form or substance. Sir, one word as to the objection raised by my colleague, the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Clark) as to the power of the State to extend the elective franchise beyond the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, or the acts of Congress in relation to the subject of naturalization. Sir, naturalization is one thing, and voting, or the right to vote is another thing. The foreigners who comes to this country, is naturalized for two purposes, first, for the purpose of protection, and in the next place, to enable him to take part in the political affairs of the country. Although he may take this on himself, without naturalization; but the great boon that naturalization confers upon foreigners is this: It imposes on the Government the duty of protecting the naturalized citizen. If a man comes here, and becomes naturalized, and then goes abroad to England, or to Ireland, or South America, to Brazil, to Spain, or Portugal, or to any other foreign country, this Government is still bound to protect him.

If the Government of the country to which he goes, commits an act of oppression towards him, this Government is bound to redress the wrong. If such foreign Government should confiscate his property, it would become the duty of this Government, the Government which he has taken an oath to maintain—to protect his interests. All of us are under the obligation of an oath, to protect him in the enjoyment of his rights. It is as much the duty of the General Government to protect his rights and redress his wrongs in a foreign country, as to protect the rights of a natural born citizen. Not so with the alien; so long as he is an alien we are under no obligation to throw the protection of the law around him when he chooses to go abroad. If gentlemen will refer to the reports of committees of the House of Representatives, of the last session of the 29th Congress, they will find an elaborate report upon this subject that is directly conclusive. It originated in this way: numerous petitions were sent to Congress praying for the repeal of the present naturalization laws, for the extension of the time, or term of residence, in order to become naturalized, to twenty-one years, and the prohibition upon foreigners to exercise political rights; all these petitions were referred to the judiciary committee, of which I was a member, and of which Mr. Rathbone of New York, was chairman. We made a report in which the whole subject is reviewed, and which concludes with the declaration that the Government of the United States have nothing to do with the question, as to who shall have the right to vote in the several States. It only requires that members of Congress, and electors of President of the United States, shall be voted for by such persons as have the right to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The State Constitution confer that power upon whomsoever it is considered proper by the State, to confer it.

It will be recollected that negroes vote in some of the States. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, who was formerly Postmaster General, told me that the first time he went to Congress, he was elected by the votes of free negroes:

that but for their votes, he could not have been elected. Why, sir, in some of the States, the women, God bless their souls, are emphatic, ["consent,"] had the right to vote formerly. I do not know but that in some they may have the right still. Gentlemen, no doubt, recollect the time when they used to vote in New Jersey. Is there any restriction placed upon the States in this respect, in the Constitution of the United States? None at all. You may confer the right of suffrage upon women, or upon minors if you please. The report that I have referred to, was unanimously concurred in by the House of Representatives of the 29th Congress of the United States, as being an elucidation of the whole question.

Now, sir, in my view of the matter, it is entirely a question of policy. If I could be led to believe that it was likely to prove mischievous—to set the political cauldron boiling, until there would be danger of its overflowing and scalding us all, I should resist it, but I do not believe any such thing.

Sir, these foreigners vote just as we vote. It might as well be said that we would endeavor to overthrow the institutions of the country, as that they will. They vote either with the whigs or with the Democrats. If they vote with the Democrats, there is no danger ["consent," and "laughter."] And I will not say that if they vote with the whigs, there would be danger. The only effect is to swell the vote. But to treat the matter a little more seriously. Examine the policy of Governments from the earliest vestage of civil Government, and you will find that it has always been regarded as the most wholesome policy to increase their population. Sir, Moses, the wisest of secular law-givers—I will not speak of him in any other light—provided for an increase of population, and it has given energy, strength, and vigor, to all nations who have adopted this policy. It has been the policy of all nations that have prospered, more especially ours. What is the prospect now before us? We are not getting from Ireland, Germany and other nations of Europe, the same description of population that we got twenty-five years ago. I may be allowed to say we are getting a better class. Men of property are coming to this country with a view of becoming permanent settlers; and the next generation—their children—will love the soil as you do.

Sir, if you do not hold out these inducements to those people to settle here, they will go beyond you. This is not the only State where they may settle. They will go to the broad plains of Illinois and Wisconsin. They will not be willing to settle in your State, unless they can, at an early day, have a voice in the government, and in controlling the taxation of property. And it is but a liberal and statesmanlike view of the question, that they should have this right. If you give them a participation in the making of the laws, they will be willing to come here. I take it that our State is not so fully populated, that we need reject them. The true policy of the State is, to increase her population—to fill up her borders with a “hardy population.” As a matter of justice to them, and of policy to ourselves, we ought to adopt the section.

MR. RITCHEY. I am not going to detain the Convention by making a speech, but to give every member an opportunity to vote, by demanding the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

MR. COOKERLY. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. “Too late!” “too late!”

THE PRESIDENT. The gentleman’s motion cannot now be entertained. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Hamilton, (Mr. Clark,) to strike out the section, and insert the substitute moved by him.

The substitute is as follows:

“In all elections, not otherwise provided for by this Constitution, every white male citizen of the United States, of twenty-one years of age and upwards, who has resided within the State for one year previous to the election, shall be entitled to vote in the county where he resides, except such as have been enlisted in the army of the United States; and none else.”

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 14, nays 90—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bourne, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Crawford, Farrow, Frisbie, Helmer, Kelso, Kilgore, Morgan, Robinson, Steele, Thomas, and Todd—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Murray, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, and Mr. President—90.

So the substitute was not adopted.

The question then being, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

MR. WOLFE desired to make a statement, explanatory of his vote.

THE PRESIDENT remarked that the vote upon the engrossment was under the operation of the previous question.

MR. KELSO. As the previous question has been ordered, I shall decline voting upon this section.

THE PRESIDENT. The gentleman is aware of the rule, which requires the Secretary, in case a member declines voting, to make an entry thereof, in the journal.

MR. KELSO. I am perfectly willing that that should be done. Being prevented, by the operation of the previous question, from assigning my reasons, I desire that it shall be stated that I decline voting.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 87, nays 15—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Murray, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—87.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bourne, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Crawford, Farrow, Frisbie, Helmer, Hitt, Huff, Kilgore, Kinley, Morgan, Robinson, Thomas, and Wolfe—15.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MR. KILGORE’S name being called, he said: He would not, like the gentleman behind him, (Mr. Kelso,) decline voting. He would vote “No,” because he loved his country better than he loved himself. [A laugh.]

MR. WOLFE. I now move to re-consider the vote, in order that I may give my reasons. It does appear to me that this matter is going a little too far.

THE PRESIDENT. The matter is still subject to the previous question.

MR. WOLFE. I understand that the previous question is exhausted when the vote is taken on the engrossment of the section.

The PRESIDENT. But if the Convention re-consider that vote, it is as if it had not been taken, and the previous question is in force.

Mr. WOLFE. Do I understand that I have no right to give my reasons?

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order for the gentleman to assign his reasons.

Mr. WOLFE. I moved the re-consideration for the express purpose of saying that it was not on account of any objection which I have to extending the elective franchise, but on account of the limitation—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. WOLFE. Well, sir, I withdraw the motion to re-consider, and ask leave to change my vote. Having voted "yea" for the purpose of moving a re-consideration, I now vote "no."

The section which declares that all other elections not herein-before provided for shall be by ballot, was read a second time.

Mr. FARROW moved to amend, so that the ballots shall be numbered to agree with the numbers opposite the names of voters.

Mr. FARROW. The amendment that I have proposed is intended to obviate a difficulty that connects itself with the section in relation to confining voters in giving their votes to the township in which they reside. I believe that a law has been in force for a number of years in this State, which directs that the right of suffrage shall be exercised only in that portion of the county in which the voter resides, yet we find that the Legislature have not yet been able to close up all the avenues to fraud.

I believe, sir, that there is not any species of offence that the citizens of this State may commit against the laws of the country for which there is not a competent remedy provided, except in this particular case.

When a vote is given fraudulently, you are without remedy, because you are unable to ascertain where the vote comes from. The result is, that when a contested election takes place, you are at a loss to ascertain the justice of the case. It is true you have the voter's name on the poll-book, but you cannot tell where the vote is. If you can extract it from the voter himself it is all very well, but if not, you have to guess for whom it was given. But, sir, I insist upon it, that there may be a remedy provided; each ballot may be numbered agreeing with the number opposite the name of the voter, and still all the secrecy you wish may be observed and the ballot never need be examined. All you have to do is to find the voter's name on the poll-book, and to ascertain the number opposite the name you have only to refer to the ballot, and there is no necessity for examining all the ballots, and there is no necessity while counting the ballots that the poll-book should be opened. Therefore, I insist that if this arrangement be adopted, the strictest secrecy may be observed.

I wish to bring this matter to the consideration of the Convention, and ask them if they cannot devise a means whereby all the necessary protection shall be afforded to voters, and at the same time establish a rule by which frauds may be detected. If this object can be accomplished it is certainly desirable, and if the Convention will bestow on the subject that consideration which its importance demands, I believe they will not lightly pass over the suggestions that I have made.

Mr. KELSO. It seems to me that the gentleman can just as well or even better accomplish all he wants by changing the mode of voting. Now it is very certain that in this mode of voting by ballot, secrecy exists not only in fact in regard to the voter, but you do not know for whom he casts his vote; but if you number his vote and let that supply the place of his name, where is the secrecy? All you have to do is to take his number and go to the poll-book, to ascertain for whom he voted. And I presume the gentleman will not deny this right to examine the poll-book. It is kept open and accessible for six months for that purpose by law.

I am willing to go for a change in the mode of voting, and for this reason: You expose the voter to every inconvenience he would be subjected to were the vote given viva voce. And there are great advantages in changing to the mode that the gentleman proposes, and the advantage is this: When a voter comes up to give a vote, you put down his name and the name of the candidate voted for; all this is done at once, and you are able at a glance to see for whom he voted; and in order to prove upon him the fact of illegal voting, you have only to turn to the record. It can all be done within a trifle of the same length of time that you can receive the ballot and record the name of the voter. And then you have all the trouble of looking into another record. That will all be saved; and it will be infinitely better to change the mode at once. If the gentleman's doctrine is good, the same thing may be accomplished by changing the mode of voting.

Mr. FARROW. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KELSO. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. FARROW. According to the mode I propose it will never be necessary to examine the number of the ballots, except in the case of a contested election. After having ascertained who has cast an illegal vote, then his vote may be examined by referring to the number.

Mr. KELSO. If that is the case the gentleman is radically wrong; it will be making a private matter of the poll-book; whereas every citizen should have the right to go to the poll-book and examine it. I am against withholding from them that privilege. Therefore I maintain that the better mode of arriving at the object which the gentleman has in view is to change the mode of voting. I shall vote against the amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam, and was not agreed to.

The question then being, shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. MOORE moved to strike out the word "ballot" and insert "viva voce."

Mr. PRATHER. As gentlemen seem to be greatly adverse to technicalities, I think it would be as well to use the words "living voice." [Consent.]

Mr. KENT moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. MATHER,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention took up the third section of Report No. 13, providing that electors shall be free from arrest on days of election, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace; and it was ordered to be engrossed.

Section fourth of the same article, providing that the Legislature shall have the power to exclude from electing or being elected, any person convicted of any infamous crime, was also ordered to be engrossed.

Section fifth of the same article, providing that no person shall be deemed to have lost his residence in this State by reason of his absence on business of the United States or of this State, was also ordered to be engrossed.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. WOLFE proposed an additional section, providing that all contested elections for Senators and Representatives, and for all county and township officers shall be sent back to the people for their decision in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Mr. W. said, that he hoped the Convention would give this subject due consideration. Such a provision he thought was necessary to be ingrafted in the Constitution, as it would prevent much difficulty in cases of contested elections. They had all seen in the case of the delegation from Union, that notwithstanding due investigation had been made of the manner and result of the election, yet the question had to go back to the people for final settlement. He thought the matter should be entertained by the Convention.

Mr. PETTIT said he hoped the section would not be adopted. He had a great respect for the mover of this proposition, but he was inclined to think that he (Mr. W.) was going out of the beaten track in offering it. By the section as it now stood, every man who saw fit to contest an election, although he may have been beaten ever so fairly, enjoyed the privilege of having a new election. If he did it once, he might run it over and over again.

Mr. WOLFE. I said that the difficulty referred to could easily be obviated by the Legislature's enacting some provision in regard to it. He should like to see the section pass.

Mr. KENT moved to lay the section upon the table.

On this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 67, nays 17:

AYES.—Messrs Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crawford, Edmonston, Elliott Fisher, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Jones, Kent, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—67.

NAYS.—Messrs. Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Gregg, Hitt, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, McClelland, Smiley, Wolfe, and Yocum—17.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE.

Mr. McCLELLAND offered an additional section, providing that the Legislature may have the power to extend the right of suffrage to persons other than those included in the Constitution, should a law giving the privilege receive a majority of the votes of the people.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to lay the section on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS OF NATURALIZED FOREIGNERS.

Mr. MURRAY offered an additional section, providing that no person shall be debarred from voting on account of having lost or mislaid a certificate of qualification as a voter.

Mr. M. hoped his amendment would be adopted. He had seen great injustice done for the want of a law of this character, defining the right of persons to vote who had not and could not have their naturalization papers in their possession on the day of election. He would allude to an instance in his own district which occurred some two years since.

A man, of lawful age, who had resided in Huntington county more than eighteen months, an industrious and peaceable citizen, offered to vote at the August election, stating that he had received his full naturalization papers, but had left them where he formerly resided in Pennsylvanian. To this he was willing to swear. The judges of election suffered him to be sworn, but even then refused his vote. They listened to a member of the bar, who told them that the law in all cases required the best evidence, and although they were informed that this was not the practice of the State, nor consistent with the statute on the subject, yet, through darkness of perception or party bias, they persisted in refusing the man his vote. To illustrate the case still farther, he would add, that an hour afterwards, a miserable immoral creature, that hailed from the Rocky Mountains, offered his vote, offering to swear that he had lost his naturalization papers. His oath was received, and his vote also. It was scarcely necessary to say these men belonged to different political parties. His object was to make the law read so plainly, that judges of elections could not find a shelter to save them from merited punishment, when they disobeyed it. He wished to clear the mist from the eyes of party prejudice, and compel the dullest apprehension to see its duty.

Mr. PETTIT said, that he had no doubt that the gentleman from Huntington had stated the facts correctly in regard to the man in his district who was debarred from voting; and he had only to say that the inspectors who refused to swear the man and under the circumstances not allow him to vote, were guilty of an offence under the law, and ought to have been indicted and prosecuted civilly.

He had never heard before that under any law in the State, a man who has once taken out his papers of naturalization and who may have lost them, was not entitled to a vote if he swore that he was a citizen. He had never heard before that it was necessary for a man every time he voted, to show his papers. Talk about producing papers! Were the inspectors of election qualified to judge of the genuineness of papers? Suppose a man should present a paper drawn up in some county court in the State of New York or the State of Louisiana, sealed and certified, how were the judges to know that they were genuine? They must trust to the oath of the holder of the papers; and his oath might as well be taken without as with the papers. All that was necessary to do with a voter was to swear him and ascertain if upon oath, he would declare that he was entitled to a vote.

Mr. MURRAY would merely remark that he had given the reasons urged by the gentleman from Tippecanoe to the board of election, but still they refused to receive the vote. He (Mr. M.) had an unspeakable desire to see this question settled by the adoption of the amendment. The incident alluded to was a painful one. He fervently hoped he might never witness the like again.

The question was put upon the passage of the section, and it was rejected.

BRIBERY IN ELECTIONS.

Section six, providing that every person shall be disqualified from holding office for the term for which he shall have been elected, who shall have been convicted of having given or offered any bribe, threat, or reward, to procure his election, was then taken up and read a second time.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I know, sir, that it was the object of the committee who reported this section, to punish all these corruptions in elections; and, as I do not think the section, as it stands, goes as far as it was intended to go on the subject, I move to amend by adding after the word "or," first occurring in the 23d line, the words "caused to be given, or."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend by striking out, in the 21st and 22d lines, the words "been convicted of." I do not suppose, sir, that it is for the conviction of the act that a man is to be disqualified, but for the act itself.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. KINLEY moved to amend by striking out, in the 21st and 22d lines, the words "for the term for which he shall have been elected."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I move to strike out the word "threat," in the 23d line, and insert the word "treat;" inasmuch as I cannot see what sort of a threat it would be.

Mr. MATHER (in his seat). A threat to give a man whisky. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUNN of Perry moved to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Marion upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

Sec. 1 of report No. 14, providing for the election of all officers by the qualified electors of the State, except as was otherwise provided in the Constitution, was taken up and read a second time.

Mr. MATHER moved to amend by striking out the words "of this State."

Mr. PETTIT said he could see no earthly necessity for the section; he would, therefore, move to lay the section and pending amendment upon the table.

Mr. DOBSON (in his seat). It was reported in accordance with certain instructions adopted by the Convention.

The motion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe was agreed to.

HOLDING OF OFFICES.

Sec. 1 of report No. 15, providing that no person shall hold more than one lucrative office at the same time, except as in the Constitution is expressly permitted, was then taken up and read a second time.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to amend by adding the following additional section:

"Every person elected to an office of profit, shall be ineligible to any other lucrative office during the continuance of the term for which he may have been elected, provided that this section shall not apply to justices of the peace or to any township, town, or municipal office."

Mr. H. said that he thought the principle involved in the section was a very important one. He would not now occupy the time of the Convention further with reference to it, as he desired simply to have a direct vote upon its adoption.

Mr. WOLFE moved to amend by adding the words "nor shall anything in this Constitution be so construed as to prevent any clerk of a circuit court from performing the duties of county auditor or recorder."

Mr. W. said, that, unless the offices of clerk, auditor, or recorder, in the smaller counties, were combined and given to one person, they could not get competent persons to fulfil the duties appertaining to them. He trusted gentlemen from the larger counties would remember that the weaker counties were equally desirous with the larger ones of having competent officers, and would, therefore, grant them the privilege asked for in this amendment.

Mr. PETTIT moved to lay the section and the pending amendment upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN asked for a division of the question.

The question being first upon laying the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Sullivan, (Mr. Wolfe,) upon the table, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then recurring upon laying the additional section, submitted by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) on the table, the yeas and nays were demanded, and having been ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 42, nays 61:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Butler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Farrow, Fisher, Hall, Harbott, Hardin, Helmer, Hogin, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Pettit, Robinson, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Wiley, and Yocum—42.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Beeson, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kinley, March, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Taylor, Watts, Wolfe, Work, and Wunderlich—61.

So the additional section was not laid upon the table.

Mr. WOLFE moved to amend the additional section, by adding the words "and no postmaster, whose office is not worth a hundred dollars per annum."

Mr. MOORE moved to lay the amendment upon the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and having been ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 50, nays 49:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Bracken, Bryant, Carter, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Duzan, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Jones, March, Mather, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Pettit, Prather, Robinson, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Todd, Walpole, and Wunderlich—50.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beach, Borden, Bourne, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Harbott, Hardin, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, and Yocum—49.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. McCLELLAND, I move, Mr. President, that the proviso of this additional section be stricken out.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I think, sir, we had better settle this matter at once. I, therefore, call for the previous question.

The call was not seconded by the Convention.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Randolph upon the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and having been ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 62, nays 35:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Beach, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, March, Mather, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, and Wunderlich—62.

YAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Farrow, Frisbie, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Huff, Maguire, May, McClelland, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave; Read of Clark, Robinson, Schoonover, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Thornton, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, and Yocum—35.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. HARBOLT moved to amend by adding a proviso that counties casting less than one thousand votes may elect the same person clerk, recorder, and auditor, or to any two of said offices.

Mr. H. said, as he had consumed but very little of the time of the Convention, he felt it to be his duty to make a few remarks in favor of this proviso. As this proviso was not imperative in its character, and as it did not affect any county casting more than one thousand votes, he could not see why there should be any opposition to it. As he had stated, the proviso was not an imperative one; for it set forth that the counties might elect one person to fill two or three of the offices, or not, as they might think best. One thing I am satisfied of, and that is, if they could get a person qualified to accept each one of these offices, they would hardly give one man two offices; for he was satisfied that the people had an aversion to one man holding more than one office.

I have the honor, continued Mr. H., to represent four counties. The county of White is the largest of the four. I spent some time in these offices, as deputy, (in White county,) and was to receive one-half the emoluments of said offices; but I came to the conclusion that I would sooner push the jack-plane for a living, than trust to the paltry emoluments of office which are granted in the new counties. I do not expect, sir, that my own county will be benefited very much by this provision. White county has now at least nine hundred polls, so that this provision cannot affect her much. Benton county, by the late returns, has two hundred and six polls, and in that county, the three offices combined cannot give more than a decent support to a family. I do not think that the recorder's office can be worth much over one hundred dollars a year in Benton county; so, therefore, it is evident that it is almost impracticable to obtain a person qualified to fill the office, who would be likely to accept of it, or of any office, the emoluments of which would not more than pay for his board. Besides, it will put the county to extra expense to provide the different rooms for these offices and furnish them with the necessary stationery. I desire, therefore, that this proviso should be adopted, so that these new counties may have the privilege to do as they think best in regard to this subject.

If I thought there was anything unjust or unreasonable in this proviso, I would not offer it, or trouble this Convention with it; but I am satisfied, in my own mind, that there is nothing unfair in it, and that it will be for the benefit of the new counties. I am not in favor of tying the people's hands in such small matters. I think the people are able to judge for themselves and decide aright in regard to them. I therefore hope the proviso will be adopted.

Mr. COOKERLY remarked that he was in favor of adopting the amendment. There was not a county in the State, having less than one thousand votes, that could support the offices of clerk, recorder, and auditor; for it was not to be expected that men, competent to perform the duties of those offices, could do it for the petty salary of a hundred or a hundred and fifty dollars. Unless these three offices were bestowed upon one individual in the smaller counties, they would be filled by persons totally incompetent to fill them.

While up, he would say, in regard to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) that he could not see why the gentleman should wish to make any reservation in favor of justices of the peace, and township, town, and municipal officers.

Why not, he would ask, with equal propriety, apply the rule to councilmen and township trustees? His opinion was, when the section was perfected by the amendment of the gentleman from White, (Mr. Harbolt,) the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) should not prevail. [Here there were cries of "Question! question!"]

Mr. C. continued to say that gentlemen might as well hold their breath; for he had the floor, and he intended to keep it until he had got through with what he had to say.

He could not forbear remarking, now that he had been so impertinently interrupted, that, as representatives of the people—as members of a State Constitutional Convention—he did think gentlemen should remember where they were, and what was decorous and statesmanlike occasionally. A member could hardly rise to the floor without being interrupted with cries of "question," and "consent," and "no consent." He had seen old men—men of great legislative experience—who, after a member had been speaking some few minutes, would bow their heads to their desks, and sneakingly and impolitely cry out "question! question!" He thought members should have more respect for each other, and for themselves, than to act in this manner. It was this indecorous action that aided in retarding the business of the Convention; and the people would most assuredly hold members who acted in this manner—if their conduct was publicly exposed—responsible for such action. He hoped that the amendment of the gentleman from White would be adopted, and the section thus be perfected; and that the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn would be voted down.

Mr. HOLMAN said that he wished to make a suggestion to the Convention, and especially to his friend from White (Mr. Harbolt).

The section originally reported and contained in the article now under consideration reads thus:

"SEC. —. No person shall hold more than one lucrative office at the same time, except as in this Constitution is expressly permitted."

The gentleman's proviso is, therefore, much more appropriate, as an amendment to that section, than the one which I have offered. I would ask this gentleman to withdraw his amendment for the present, and offer it as a proviso to the section I have read, when that section comes up for amendment. I think there is much force in the reasons urged by the gentleman from White in favor of his proviso, and I doubt not that, at the proper time, it will receive the careful consideration of the Convention.

I have not discussed the merits of the section I have offered, for the reason that the main arguments in its favor have already been presented in the consideration of other sections limiting eligibility to office. Offices are not created for the benefit of the office-seeker or politician, but for the good of the people—for the purpose of carrying into effect the great purposes of government. No one man, or set of men, have an exclusive claim on the people for the offices within their gift; and no citizen should be permitted to wield the influences of station in advancing his prospects for political rewards; for the public trust should be the free-will offering of the people to those of their number most suited to discharge that trust, and not the "spoils" to be contended for by political trickery and management.

If, sir, you permit one citizen to wield his influence, the patronage, and the very profits of one office, into which he may have been placed by the confidence of the people, to advance what he may deem to be his claim upon the people, or upon his party, for another, you virtually annul the force of a section already adopted, "that all elections shall be free and equal." Sir, what equality is there in a contest where the one candidate, in addition to the rights and influences possessed by his opponent, wields the patronage, influences, and appliances connected with an office already in his possession?

Sir, the evils resulting to the country from permitting one citizen to make use of a public trust as a mere stepping stone—as a mere source of influence in obtaining office—and the corrupt and corrupting tendencies of such a practice on the purity of the elective franchise, and the sanctity of public trust, can never, in my humble opinion, be compensated for by the advantage we may sometimes enjoy of placing a citizen in one station, which he is peculiarly adapted to fill, during the term for which he was elected to another; for, fortunately, the general intelligence and capacity of our people renders it almost impossible that there should be an office to fill, and no citizen, disconnected with another public trust, could be found of sufficient intelligence, capacity, and integrity to fill it.

When the people have conferred an office on one of their number, and he has accepted the trust, he owes it as a debt commensurate with the confidence reposed in him, that, unless rendered incapable by circumstances beyond his control, he should faithfully and honestly discharge every duty pertaining to it during the continuance of his term.

I cannot believe that any, except aspirants for office and the political wire-workers of the country, can object to the restriction.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from White, (Mr. Harbolt,) to the additional section offered by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

Mr. HARBOLT here withdrew his amendment, stating that, after the question was taken upon the additional section offered by the gentleman from Dearborn, he would offer it as an amendment, to perfect the original section.

The PRESIDENT. The question then is upon the adoption of the additional section offered by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

Upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and having been ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 42, nays 58.

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Bascom, Beeson, Blythe, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Crawford, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Eliott, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of War-rick, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kinley, March, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Nave, Nofsinger, Ritchey, Sims, Taylor, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, and You-cum—42.

NAYS.—Messrs. Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Dick, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Hall, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele.

Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Wiley, and Wolfe—58.

So the additional section was not adopted.

The consideration of the original section was then resumed.

Mr. HARBOLT again offered his amendment, as a proviso to the original section, as follows: "Provided, that counties casting less than one thousand votes, may confer the offices of clerk, recorder, and auditor, or any two of said offices, upon one person."

Mr. NAVE said he hoped that the Convention would not adopt in the organic law of the land, a feature that had been repudiated in every other portion of the provisions they had framed for the government of Indiana. If they were to adopt a provision in the Constitution, whereby a man should be allowed the privilege of holding more than one office, it would be acting directly in opposition to the course they had hitherto pursued. It was for the reason that they had hitherto adhered to the principle, that he did not desire, for the sake of favoring a few small counties in the State, to violate and set aside that principle. He desired that the principle should be adhered to, notwithstanding it might produce some inconvenience in the smaller counties.

Mr. BASCOM moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the words "casting less than one thousand votes," and insert "containing less than one thousand free white male inhabitants."

The amendment was rejected.

The question then being on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from White, (Mr. Harbolt,) to the original section,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 66, nays 30:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Beach, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bordon, Bourne, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, and Yocum—66.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Bascom, Bracken, Butler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Hendricks, Kelso, Kent, March, McClelland, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Prather, Robinson, Schoonover, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Watts, Wiley, and Wunderlich—30.

So the amendment was adopted.

The section, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. READ of Clark moved to adjourn until Thursday morning, 9 o'clock.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 47, nays 49:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bryant, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Foster, Frisbie, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Harbolt, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Lockhart, Maguire, May, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Robinson, Snook, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Walpole, and Wiley—47.

NAYS.—Messrs. Balingall, Beeson, Bicknell, Blythe, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Cookerly, Crawford, Dick, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, March, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—49.

So the Convention refused to adjourn until Thursday morning.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the Convention adjourned until 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 25, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. FARROW, a Delegate from the county of Putnam.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the roll be called, and the names of the absentees entered upon the journal of the Convention."

The object, said Mr. GRAHAM, is this: Yesterday, there was a feeling manifested by many gentlemen, in favor of proceeding with business; to-day, I want to see how many of those gentlemen are here, and how many are absent.

The resolution was adopted, and

The roll having been called by the Secretary.

Further proceedings under the call were suspended, and,

On motion,

The Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, DEC. 26, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment, in the Masonic Hall.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRESSY.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from Mr. Brough, the President of the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad Company, tendering to the members of the Convention a free passage over the road on Wednesday next, or such time thereafter as will suit their convenience.

On motion by Mr. MAGUIRE,

The communication was referred to a select committee of five.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT announced the first thing in order to be sections from one to six inclusive, of the report from the committee on the elective franchise and the apportionment of representation, the same being on their final passage.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.

The first section provides that in all elections not otherwise provided for by this Constitution, every white male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has resided in the State six months immediately preceding such election, and every white male of foreign birth of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, having resided in the United States one year, and having declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, and having resided in this State six months immediately preceding such election, shall be entitled to vote in the township where he resides, except such as shall be enlisted in the army of the United States, or their allies.

The question being, Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were taken, with the following result—yeas 89, nays 10—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Bascom, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of

Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—88.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bourne, Clark of Tippecanoe, Frisbie, Helmer, Kelso, Morgan, Robinson, Thomas, Todd, and Wolfe—10.

So the section was passed, and referred to the committee on revision.

On motion by Mr. RARIDEN, it was Ordered, That the vote be taken on the remaining sections collectively.

The sections were then read, as follows:

"SEC. —. All elections, not otherwise provided for in this Constitution, shall be by ballot.

"SEC. —. Electors shall, in all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be free from arrest in going to, during their attendance at, and in returning home from, elections.

"SEC. —. The General Assembly shall have power to exclude from electing or being elected, any person convicted of any infamous crime.

"SEC. —. No person shall be deemed to have lost his residence in the State by reason of his absence on business of the United States or of this State.

"SEC. —. Every person shall be disqualified from holding office for the term for which he shall have been elected, who shall have been convicted of having given or offered any bribe, threat, or reward, to procure his election."

On motion by Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe,

The vote which requires the yeas and nays to be taken was suspended.

The sections were then passed, by unanimous consent, and referred to the committee on revision and phraseology.

PLURALITY OF OFFICES.

The section which provides that no person shall hold more than one lucrative office at the same time, was read a third time.

Mr. WOLFE moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to insert a proviso exempting post-masters whose compensation does not exceed ninety dollars a year, &c.

Mr. KELSO. Will a motion to lay the instructions on the table take with it the section?

The PRESIDENT replied in the affirmative.

Mr. KELSO. I will move, then, that the instructions be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT. That will carry with it the section also.

Mr. KELSO. Well, sir, I believe if we cannot get rid of the instructions in any other way, it will be as well to let the section go.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. As I understand the instructions, they provide that a person who holds the office of post-master where the annual income of the office does not exceed ninety dollars, will be eligible to, and entitled to hold, any other office under the State government. Now it appears to me that that is right. I call the attention of gentlemen to it, because I fear that it is not clearly understood, and I wish the Convention to come to a vote upon the question understandingly.

It has been truly stated, that in various parts of the State it is difficult to get a man to act as post-master; the emoluments of the office are no inducement, and I do not think there is any necessity for rendering him ineligible to hold any other office that his neighbors or the public choose to confer upon him.

Mr. KELSO. I will withdraw the motion to postpone indefinitely, and let the question be taken directly on the re-commitment. But I wish to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Jefferson. I ask him if a post-master has any more right to hold a seat in the Legislature than a justice of the peace, or a notary public, or a sheriff, or any other officer whose income does not exceed ninety dollars? And if he may be eligible when his income is ninety dollars, why may he not with equal propriety be eligible if his income were nine hundred dollars? What good reason can be given for drawing the line of distinction at that particular amount? If ninety dollars will leave him an honest man, why will not nine hundred and ninety, or any other amount? I say, if we are going upon the principle of single offices, let us do so; let the rule apply to all offices.

Mr. READ of Clark. I really do not think that there can be any new light thrown on the subject. I have heard the same argument over and over several times. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. WOLFE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment?

Mr. READ. Certainly, if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. WOLFE. I will do so. The gentleman from Switzerland says he can see no difference between the office of postmaster and that of justice of the peace. Sir, there is a manifest difference in one particular, at all events. A justice of the peace, if he goes into the Legislature, will have the power to act in reference to his own fees as such justice of the peace. Not so with the postmaster. And again: it is well known that a postmaster may have a deputy to discharge his duty at home, but a justice of the peace cannot employ a deputy to perform the duties of his office. I think that postmasters, where their compensation is so small, should not be rendered ineligible. I hope the Convention will act upon this matter consistently.

Mr. COOKERLY. I move to strike out "ninety" and insert "fifty."

Mr. OWEN. I concur in the observations of the gentleman from Jefferson. I do not think the argument of the gentleman from Switzerland a good one. In my part of the State a large portion of the postmasters accept the office, not from any advantage they derive from it, but purely for the sake of rendering a service to the neighborhood; whereas, justices of the peace accept the office for their own gratification, and from a desire to serve as justices. They hold the office for their own convenience, but the postmaster takes the office for the convenience of his neighbors. I can see no good reason, then, why he should be prohibited from holding a seat in the General Assembly.

Mr. BASCOM moved to amend the instructions so that counties containing less than seven hundred votes, may elect the same person clerk, auditor, and recorder.

Mr. WOLFE. I forgot to redeem my pledge to the gentleman from Clark. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being first on the amendment to the instructions, it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then being on the motion of the gentleman from Sullivan to re-commit with instructions,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 54, nays 49—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Bourne, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, May, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Taylor, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, and Mr. President—54.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beeson, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Carter, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Duzan, Graham of Miami, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, March, McClelland, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Pettit, Prather, Robinson, Sins, Snook, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—49.

So the section was re-committed.

Mr. KELSO. I suppose it will now be in order to move further instructions.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman may offer additional instructions.

Mr. KELSO. I then move that the committee be instructed to strike out "one thousand," where it applies to the number of votes in the county to be given upon the election of clerk, auditor, and recorder, and insert "five hundred."

The object of moving this instruction is this: There are but very few counties, perhaps not exceeding twelve in the State, that have now below a thousand votes, and it seems to me that if we are going to authorize them to confer two or three offices upon the same person, five hundred votes would be a large number, and out of those ten or twelve counties there are not over two or three that will not, in all probability, within a short time, have beyond that number.

Mr. HARBOLT. By the provision contained in the original instructions, the people are not compelled to give more than one office to one individual. They are only permitted to do so in case they desire it. I am satisfied that where they can get a sufficient number of officers to fill all the offices, they are not going to give more than one to one man. It is only where the people think it is absolutely necessary that they will confer more than one office on one individual. There is nothing imperative in it. I think that members of the Convention must have their minds made up on the subject.

Mr. EDMONSTON said he hoped the amendment would not be adopted. If it were adopted there would not be more than two or three counties benefited. He was of the opinion that it would be better to leave it discretionary with the people whether they would confer more than one office upon one individual or not.

Mr. RARIDEN said he was opposed to the restriction contained in the section, and he would be glad to have it stricken out. He thought the proper way was to leave all these things to the people. There was no disposition on their part to accumulate offices in the same hands. He could not see the propriety of taking extreme ground.

A great many delicate questions might grow out of the section as at present worded, as to whether the powers of different offices may be exercised by different individuals. &c. He was opposed to it entirely, and if in order, he would move a re-commitment of the section, with instructions to strike out the whole section without inserting anything in lieu of it.

The PRESIDENT remarked that such instructions would not be in order, inasmuch as the Convention had already acted upon the section, and by direct vote had adopted an additional provision. The rule prohibited the striking out of what had been thus inserted.

Mr. RARIDEN. I will make one other remark. There is so much confusion prevailing in this Hall in consequence of the imperfect preparations that have been made, that we can scarcely hear what is said by each other. A different arrangement must be made before we can get along with business. I propose therefore that we adjourn until to-morrow, in order that something may be done under the direction of the President, to render the Hall more suitable for the purpose of our deliberations. [Cries of "no, no," "go on with the section."]

Mr. MATHER moved to amend the instructions by striking out "one thousand voters," and inserting "not exceeding one thousand white male inhabitants over twenty-one years of age."

Mr. BORDEN. Let me say that I am willing to go for this section because it makes the matter definite, but if you insert the number of voters, you will create a difficulty, because there will be sometimes one number, and sometimes another within the county. I would like to have it read thus: "free white male persons over twenty-one years of age." And it seems to me that every county not having five hundred free white male persons, over twenty-one years of age should be allowed to elect one person to fill the office of clerk, auditor, and recorder, otherwise it will be taxing the small counties tremendously. If you are going to confer the offices of clerk, auditor, and recorder all on one man, why not let the clause provide generally, that the people, if they please, may give these several offices to one man? Why not leave it open? I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Elkhart will prevail.

Mr. GORDON. The section as it now stands is as definite, I think, as if we should say, "a thousand white male inhabitants." It may happen at some election, that not more than one-half of the votes in the county may be given. I move that the instructions be laid on the table.

The motion was, upon a division, agreed to—ayes 40, noes 24.

So the instruction were laid upon the table.

Mr. RARIDEN renewed his motion that the Convention adjourn until to-morrow for the purpose of enabling the officers of the Convention under the direction of the President, to prepare the Hall in a more suitable manner, for the accommodation of the Convention.

After some discussion as to what was necessary to be done, the motion to adjourn until to-morrow morning was withdrawn, and

The Convention took a recess until two o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the orders of the day,

The first thing in order being the section on its second reading, which provides "that no work of public improvement shall be made without a vote of the people."

On motion, by Mr. BASCOM, the section was laid on the table.

The section which provides that the executive power shall be vested in a Governor, who shall hold his office for — years; and that a Lieutenant Governor shall be elected and hold his office for the same length of time, was then taken up and read a second time.

Mr. PRATHER moved to fill the blank with the word "two."

Mr. COOKERLY moved that the blank be filled with "four."

Mr. PETTIT. I hope that "four" will be inserted.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be put on the largest number first.

The question being on filling the blank with the word "four," the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. BASCOM moved that there be a call of the Convention.

The motion was not agreed to.

The yeas and nays were then taken with the following result—yeas 52, nays 41—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Blythe, Bourne, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Hall, Harbolt, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, McFarland, Milroy, Morgan, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Robinson Schoonover, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Trimby, Watts, Yocum, and Mr. President—52.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Chapman, Colfax, Crumbacker, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hogin, Kent, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Tannehill, Thornton, Todd, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, and Wunderlich—41.

So the blank was filled with the word "four."

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to amend the section by striking out all that part of it relating to the Lieutenant Governor. He said he supposed every gentleman's mind was made up upon the subject. If a majority of the Convention were disposed to continue the office of Lieutenant Governor, they would, of course, vote against his motion. For his own part, he was for abolishing the office.

The question being on the motion to strike out, the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 17, nays 86—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Beeson, Bryant, Crumbacker, Duzan, Edmonston, Frisbie, Huff, Kinley, McFarland, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Sherrod, Walpole, and Mr. President—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nofsinger, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—86.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved to amend by providing that the Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall not be eligible for more than four years in any term of eight years.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said, it appeared to him that this would be too great an innovation. It would be taking away one of the greatest incentives to a faithful discharge of the duties of the office. There was no stimulant to the proper discharge of duty so potent as the desire of the approbation of the people. He could see no good reason why a man who had discharged the duties of his office properly should be made ineligible.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, that his own inclination would be to make the term of office two years; and then he would have no objection to making the same individual eligible for a second term. He thought that four years was long enough for any man to hold an office.

The question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley, the yeas and nays were ordered and, being taken, were—yeas 69, nays 35—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Carter, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Foster, Frisbie, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, McClelland, Milligan, Moore, Nave, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Trimby, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—69.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Gordon, Harbolt, Helmer, Hovey, Kinley, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Pettit, Rariden, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Thomas, Todd, Watts, and Wiley—35.

So the amendment was adopted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which makes it necessary to be a citizen of the United States five years, and a resident of Indiana for five next preceding an election, and thirty years of age, to be eligible for Governor or Lieutenant Governor, was then read a second time.

Mr. KINLEY moved to amend the section by striking out the words "who has not been five years a citizen of the United States and a resident of the State of Indiana five years next preceding his election," and to insert the words "who is not a citizen of the United States and an elector of the State of Indiana."

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which provides that the Governor shall be ineligible to any other office during the term for which he was elected, was read a second time.

Mr. BORDEN moved to insert after the word "Governor," the words "and Lieutenant Governor."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALPOLE moved to amend the section so as to require the Governor to take an oath that during the time for which he is elected he will not accept any other office.

Mr. BORDEN said, he could see no necessity for the amendment. The section provided that he should be ineligible to any other office. That, he thought, was sufficient.

Mr. DOBSON was in favor of the amendment. His doctrine was that no man should hold more than one office at one time; and that he should continue to discharge the duties of that office for the term for which he was appointed. He did not want to place it in the power of the General Government to tamper with those in authority in the State Government. He did not wish that the President of the United States should form his Cabinet or select foreign ministers, from State officers. He should select them from the ranks of the people.

Mr. KELSO took the opposite view. He thought there should be no prohibition against the appointment of a State officer to a more important office. He thought it was altogether wrong to require a man by oath to disfranchise himself. It was going beyond what any other State had done. The fact that a man was elected to office by the people was the best recommendation that he could have of being qualified for office.

Mr. RARIDEN said he was well satisfied that the only way to prohibit (if it were desiable to prohibit State officers from being sent to the Senate of the United States was to adopt a provision of this kind. But he had always been opposed to such restrictions, and he conscientiously believed that if members of the General Assembly and State officers were prevented from aspiring to higher offices, it would tend to lower the character of State officers. The privilege of being promoted to higher office was a great incentive to a faithful discharge of the duties of office. If the prospect of promotion was cut off it would do as much harm to the community as to the officer. But if members of the Legislature were to be disfranchised in this respect, he was in favor of extending the disability to State officers.

He had never yet seen a Legislature that did not contain men of superior ability to the Governor. He was for giving to the Legislature the whole State from which to make their selection of United States Senators. It was a matter of importance that men should be sent who would do credit to the State. He would say, let there be no restriction, but if there was to be restriction, let it tend to the executive officers. He would go for the proposition of the gentleman from Hancock.

The question was taken upon the amendment and it was rejected.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section prescribing the manner of electing the Governor and Lieut. Governor was read a second time.

Mr. KELSO moved to strike out the latter part of the section and insert a provision to the effect that if it should become necessary to fill a vacancy in the offices of Governor and Lieut. Governor, at a time when no general election was held, it might be done.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said he could see no reason for a change in this respect. The offices would all be filled at the next general election. Beside, such a provision would not be consistent with another part of the same article.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER moved to amend, by providing that in case of a tie vote for Governor, or Lieut. Governor, they shall be chosen by a joint viva voce vote of the two Houses of the General Assembly.

The amendment was adopted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following sections were then read a second time, viz.:

The section defining the manner of making returns of election for Governor and Lieutenant Governor; the section which declares that the Governor shall be commander-in-chief of the military forces of the State, &c.; that he shall transact all necessary business with officers of Government, requiring information in writing from them, &c.; take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed; convene the General Assembly on extraordinary occasions; give information to the Legislature by messages; convene the General Assembly at another place, should the seat of Government become dangerous from disease or a common enemy; and issue writs of election to fill vacancies in the Senate and House of Representatives.

The above sections having been read, were ordered to be engrossed.

The section giving the Governor power to grant reprieves, commutations, and pardons, except in cases of treason and impeachment, upon conditions to be provided by law, and declaring that he shall communicate to the General Assembly, at each session, information of each case of reprieve, commutation, and pardon granted, and the reasons therefor; and that he shall have the power to remit fines and forfeitures, to be also reported to the Legislature, was read a second time.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved to amend by striking out all that part of the section relating to the remission of fines and forfeitures.

He remarked that there could not be a more responsible duty imposed on the executive, than that of granting pardons and remitting fines and forfeitures. He thought that it was imposing upon the Governor, a burden that he would gladly be relieved from. It appeared to him that it would be better to assign the performance of this duty to the circuit court. It was a very easy thing to get up a petition for the remission of a fine, and it was no easy matter for the Governor to resist applications of this kind in many instances where they ought not to be complied with.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will send up his amendment in writing.

Mr. SMITH. There is no difficulty about it: it is merely to strike out.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. Before the motion is made to strike out, I wish to move to insert after the word "forfeitures," the words "without the concurrence of a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court."

I propose, said Mr. CLARK, to make the judges of the Supreme Court the advisers of the Governor in the remission of fines and forfeitures. I agree with the gentleman that this is a duty that the Governor ought not to be subjected to, without affording him some aid and counsel, because when an appeal is made to his sympathies, it is placing him in a very unpleasant position.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion remarked, that this matter had been considered by the committee. They were aware that the duties devolving upon the executive in reference to the granting pardons, and the remission of fines and forfeitures was always a delicate one, but the committee considered that by adding the checks that were provided in the section, by making it obligatory upon him to report to the Legislature, there could not be any danger of an abuse of the power.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe said he would withdrawn his amendment and offer it in another place.

The question being on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ripley,

Mr. NAVE said he wished to say a single word before the question was taken on the amendment. It had hitherto, under the old Constitution, been customary for the executive of the State, in many cases, after individuals accused of offenses, had been tried by the court and convicted, to pardon the convict, or to remit the fine imposed by the court. This had universally been done by the executive, without having the evidence before him upon which the party was convicted. And more injury had arisen from this practice than from the exercise of any other power that had been conferred upon the executive. He was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley. If the power to remit fines and forfeitures had to be vested anywhere, it ought to be given to the courts and not to the executive, who could hardly be supposed to be acquainted with the facts of the case as given in evidence before the court. Why then should they clothe the Governor with such a power as this? The power had often been abused and might be abused again.

Mr. DOBSON said that rather a strange idea seemed to have taken possession of the gentleman from Hendricks and the gentleman from Ripley. It was a new idea to him at least. He had always supposed that it was the business of the Legislature to make laws, and the business of the courts to decide cases arising under them, and to do nothing else. And he had always supposed if the pardoning power should be lodged anywhere, it should be lodged in the hands of the Governor, and not in the tribunal which had passed sentence in the case. There was an inconsistency in it which he thought the gentleman would find it difficult to reconcile. The law-making power might create a law, but it was not their business to decide what the law is. It was the business of the judiciary to decide what the law is, and the business of the executive to enforce the execution of the law. Would it not be an absurdity for the court to say to an individual accused of some offense—assault and battery for instance—we fine you ten dollars, but we will not cause it to be collected—we remit the fine. Would not this be a singular kind of punishment? It would bring your courts, in a short time, into a ridiculous position like that of the parent who says to his child, "I am going to chastise you," and after raising the rod, says to him, "there that will do, you are sufficiently punished."

It was in the hands of the executive of the State that the pardoning power should be vested. It was so in the Constitution of the United States; in fact it could be properly lodged nowhere else. He hoped the amendment would not be adopted.

Mr. LOCKHART said he hoped the amendment would not prevail. There was no duty that was so responsible and so onerous as that of granting pardons and remitting fines and forfeitures. Every possible means were resorted to by the friends and relatives of those who were convicted of offenses, to have their fines remitted, and it was often a difficult matter for the Governor to resist their importunities.

The question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. LOCKHART moved to amend by inserting after the word "forfeitures," these words: "Under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by law."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. READ of Clark moved to amend by adding the following: "By and with the advice and consent of a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court."

This, said Mr. READ, will refer to the higher crimes, and I trust the Convention will see the necessity of inserting a provision of this kind. We all know that great abuses have been practiced in Indiana, in relation to executive pardons. There is no power granted in the Constitution, that has been so much abused. Those who have filled the office of Governor acknowledge this, and they ask to be relieved from its exercise.

We have been at considerable expense to get a report from the Penitentiary, and gentlemen will be astonished upon reading that report, to see how many convicts have been turned loose by means of executive pardons. Nearly one-fourth of all those who have been sentenced to the penitentiary, have been released by pardon of the Governor. I call upon the Convention then, to adopt some provision of this kind in order to relieve the Governor from the exercise of this power, or else to give aid in its exercise, by requiring the concurrence of the courts. The country calls loudly for a change in this respect.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. It appears to me that this is one of the most important sections that we shall have occasion to act upon. We hear the opinion expressed by gentlemen from all parts of the State, that the pardoning power has been greatly abused. I can testify that in every part of the State, it has had a tendency to encourage breaches of the law. Persons have come to understand that they have not only a chance of escape by the failure of the Grand Jury to find a bill of indictment, but the best of all chances, by an appeal to the Governor for pardon. I could, if necessary, adduce many witnesses to show that this power has been abused, and that it has encouraged a violation of the law. I think, myself, that the Governor ought to have some counsel, associates, or advisers in regard to the exercise of this power. Many influences can be brought to bear upon the Governor, which it is difficult to resist. He holds in his hands the issues of life and death. It is too much responsibility to be imposed upon one man.

I am not prepared at this moment, to propose a substitute for the section; but for the purpose of giving time to consider of it, I will move that the section, together with the pending amendment, be referred to a select committee of five.

The motion was agreed to.

The section which renders ineligible to the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor, members of Congress, and persons holding office under the United States government, was read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GOVERNOR'S SALARY.

The section which provides for the compensation of the Governor was read a second time.

Mr. CHAPMAN moved to amend the section so that the compensation of the Governor shall not exceed twenty-five hundred dollars per annum nor be less than fifteen hundred.

Mr. BASCOM moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion was, upon a division—ayes 55, noes not counted—agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to insert the words, "to be fixed by law."

The motion was not agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which relates to the right of the Lieutenant Governor, by virtue of his office as President of the Senate, to debate and vote upon all subjects in committee of the whole, and when the Senate was equally divided to give the casting vote, was read a second time and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section empowering the Lieutenant Governor in case of the impeachment of the Governor, his removal from office, death, refusal to qualify, resignation, or absence from the State, to exercise all the power and authority appertaining to the office of Governor, &c., was read a second time.

Mr. MAGUIRE moved to amend by striking out the words, "until another be duly qualified," and insert, "during the residue of the term."

The object of the amendment, he said, was simply to render the meaning of the section clear and explicit. He was induced to offer the amendment from the fact that in a neighboring State of which he was formerly a resident, with a section in the Constitution precisely like the section reported by the executive committee, an angry, bitter, and long-continued controversy took place, on the death of the Governor, as to whether the Lieutenant Governor should serve out the full term of the Governor, or an election for a successor should take place immediately; and a large majority of the popular branch of the Legislature was actually elected by the people with instructions to call an immediate election of Governor. The popular current however was checked by the Senate, and the Lieutenant Governor, as was obviously intended by the Constitution, served out the whole term. His amendment would clearly define what he doubted not was the intention of the committee, and prevent the possibility of such a controversy as that to which he had alluded in the State of Kentucky.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. KELSO. I have an amendment to offer, and perhaps I had better explain it before reading it. There are other disqualifications than those enumerated here, and important ones, which may render it necessary that somebody should supply the place of the Governor; and while we are making a Constitution we ought not to be prevented by false delicacy from making it as it ought to be. It is a thing by no means impossible that the Governor may become insane, and in that case there is no one authorized to take his place. I move, therefore, to add the words "other disability." [Cries of "that's right,"]

Mr. RITCHEY. I hear gentlemen say that is right. I am not sure, myself, that it is right. I fear that if we insert the words "other disability," they may have too extended an application. Suppose the Governor should become palsied, although his judgment, his intellect, might remain as good as ever, would he not necessarily be superseded under the operation of this provision. I agree with the gentleman from Switzerland that in case of the Governor's insanity he should be deprived of office; but I should prefer to insert the word "insanity," and there is nothing indecorous in it, because the Governor is just as liable to become insane as any other man. [A voice—"he is more so."] I move to amend by inserting the word "insanity."

Mr. DOBSON said that it seemed to him that the word "disability" was the proper word to be used in this instance. There might be other disabilities besides insanity that would disqualify the Governor from discharging the duties of the office.

The question being taken, the amendment of the gentleman from Johnson was not agreed to.

The question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland to insert the words "other disability," and it was adopted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which provides that whenever the government shall be administered by the Lieutenant Governor or he shall be unable to attend as President of the Senate, the Senate shall elect one of their own members as President for that occasion, &c., was read a second time.

On motion by Mr. KELSO, the words "or other disability" were inserted in the proper place.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to strike out the word "pro tem.," where it occurred in the section, and insert the words "for the time being."

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and were ordered, and, being taken were—yeas 73, nays 34—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Bascom, Beeson, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, March, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, and Mr. President—73.

NAYS.—Messrs. Beach, Blythe, Bourne, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Dunn of Jefferson, Frisbie, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, Nave, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Robinson, Sims, Stevenson, Thomas, Todd, and Wunderlich—34.

So the amendment was adopted.

The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which provides for the compensation of the President pro tempore of the Senate was read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which provides that in case the Lieutenant Governor shall be called upon to administer the government, and shall while in such administration resign, die, or be absent from the State during the recess of the General Assembly, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State for the time being, to convene the Senate for the purpose of selecting a President pro tempore, were read a second time.

On motion by Mr. KILGORE,

The words "for the time being," were stricken out.

On motion by Mr. MORRISON of Marion, the words "become insane or otherwise disabled," were inserted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which gives the Governor power to fill vacancies in office, the appointment of which is vested in the Governor or in the General Assembly, during the recess of the General Assembly, was read a second time, and

On motion by Mr. DUNN of Jefferson,

It was re-committed to the committee on the Executive department.

The section which provides that every bill which shall have passed both Houses of the General Assembly shall be presented to the Governor; if he approve he shall sign it, if not he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journals, and proceed to re-consider it. If, after such re-consideration, a majority of all the members elected to that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be re-considered, and if approved by a majority of all the members elected to that House it shall be a law; but in such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill, shall be entered on the journals of each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor within five days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, unless the general adjournment prevents its return, in which case it shall not be a law—was read a second time.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I move to strike out all after the word "law," in the hundred and fourth line, including the word "respectively" in the hundred and sixth line.

It will be recollected that the Convention has passed a section in the legislative department, requiring the yeas and nays to be recorded on the final passage of every bill and joint resolution, which, I think, will extend to that portion of the section now under consideration. If so, it amounts to nothing more than surplusage in this section, and should be stricken out.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said that the reason why that phraseology was retained in the section, was because it was the phraseology commonly employed, and it was thought necessary to retain it, in order to make the provision explicit.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RARIDEN moved to amend, by striking out the word "not," in the last line of the section.

Mr. R. said that he wanted that word stricken out, so that the bill might still be a law if the Governor were prevented from returning the bill by the adjournment of the Legislature. He took it for granted that the affirmative action of the representatives of the people was more to be relied on than an omission on the part of the Governor to return the bill.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said that the intention of the committee was to prevent members of the General Assembly from holding back bills until the last day of the session, by rendering the bills liable to be lost if so withheld.

Pending the question on the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne,

On motion by Mr. EDMONSTON,

The Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, DEC. 27, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. FARROW, a delegate from the county of Putnam.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. DUNN of Perry presented a petition from citizens of the counties of Spencer and Perry, in relation to the formation of new counties by a division of the old; which was, without reading, upon his motion, referred to the committee upon the legislative department.

Mr. SMILEY, from the committee on the legislative department, reported back the section which provides that Senatorial and Representative districts—where more than one county shall constitute a district—shall be composed of contiguous counties. The committee having stricken out the provision which prohibits the division of counties for representative purposes,

The report was concurred in, and the section was passed, and referred to the committee on revision.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the committee on education, reported against the expediency of inserting a provision in the Constitution allowing other than the English language to be taught in common schools.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. DOBSON, from the select committee on the subject of the communication from the President of the Railroad Company tendering to the members and officers of the Convention a free passage to Madison, reported resolutions to the following effect:

That in view of the time already occupied by the Convention in its deliberations they respectfully decline the invitation of the Railroad Company to visit Madison; and that the thanks of the Convention be tendered to the Company for their kind offer.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. DUNN of Perry, from the committee to which was referred a resolution on the subject of a geological survey of the State, made a report on that subject—setting forth that it would bring capital to a considerable amount, into the State, and thus repay all expenditures, as well as aid in creating a sinking fund to pay off our public debt;—accompanied by a section making it the duty of the General Assembly to provide for a thorough geological survey of the State in five years.

The section was read a first time, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. COLFAX. I now make the motion of which I gave notice on Tuesday last, which sets apart Saturday for the consideration of resolutions. The purport of the amendment is, that on Saturday, resolutions shall be in order until ten o'clock, at which time the orders of the day shall be taken up, and speeches upon resolutions shall be limited to five minutes each. I think that the adoption of this amendment will save us at least a week's time before the end of the session.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. WATTS suggested to the mover to insert eleven o'clock instead of ten.

Mr. MAY moved to strike out "ten," and insert "eleven."

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day; the first thing in order being several sections of the report from the committee on the Executive Department.

Mr. COLFAX moved that the question be taken upon these sections collectively, with the exception of the first section.

Mr. READ of Clark moved to amend the motion so as to take the question on the sections without exception.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion of the gentleman from St. Joseph, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The first section was then read by the Secretary.

It provides that the executive power shall be vested in a Governor, who shall hold his office for four years; a Lieutenant Governor shall be elected and hold his office for the same length of time.

Mr. KILGORE moved to re-commit the section with instructions to strike out the word "four" and insert "two," and to provide that the Governor be eligible only four years out of every six years.

The question being on the motion to re-commit with instructions, the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. BORDEN said, it appeared to him somewhat strange that the Convention had consented to insert "four" in the section, making the term of office of the Governor, four years. It seemed to him very much like reforming backwards. He had supposed that the term of office of public officers was to be shortened, and not increased. Upon looking at the action that had been taken in other States in reference to that subject, it would be seen that the most approved policy was to shorten the term of office of public officers.

Mr. COOKERLY said, it would be strange if the Convention should decide to elect a Governor every two years, while at the same time Senators were to be elected for four. He cared not what policy other States had adopted, we had a right to elect our Governor for any length of time we chose. In Illinois and Kentucky, the Governor was elected every four years. There was no reason why it should not be so in Indiana. The Convention had decided yesterday, by a large majority, that the Governor should hold his office for four years. He trusted that that decision would be adhered to.

Mr. DOBSON moved to amend by adding to the instructions, that the Governor shall be eligible six years out of eight.

Mr. MARCH accepted the amendment.

The question being on the motion of the gentleman from Delaware to re-commit with instructions, the yeas and nays were taken with the following result—yeas 53, nays 55:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Chandler, Chapman, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Hogin, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nofsinger, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tannehill, Thornton, Todd, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, and Wunderlich—53.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Blythe, Bourne, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Harbolt, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Robinson, Schoonover, Sims, Snook, Spann, Steele, Stevensdn, Taylor, Thomas, Trimby, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—55.

So the section was not re-committed.

The question then being, Shall the section pass? the yeas and nays were taken under the rule, and the Secretary reported—yeas 63, nays 44—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Harbolt, Helmer, Hitt, Huff, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Robinson, Schoonover, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, Trimby, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—63.

YAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Chapman, Colfax, Dobson, Duzan, Edmonston, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Hugin, Howe, Johnson, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Smiley, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, and Wunderlich—44.

The sections from 2 to 20, inclusive, were read, with the exception of section 13, which had been referred to a select committee yesterday.

MR. KILGORE moved to re-commit the sections with instructions to amend the sixteenth, by adding at the close of that section, the following words:

“Except in the case of a resolution or motion to go into the election of any officer or officers, and if on any such resolution or motion, the Senate be equally divided, they shall proceed to the election in the same manner as they would be required to do, if a majority had voted in favor of the same.

MR. RARIDEN. Does the gentleman's motion to re-commit embrace all the sections?

THE PRESIDENT. It embraces all that are now pending on their third reading.

The question being taken on the motion of the gentleman from Delaware, to re-commit with instructions, it was decided in the negative.

MR. HOWE moved to re-commit with instructions to strike out the 6th section, and insert the following:

“The Governor shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the State, and of the militia, except when called into the service of the United States; but shall not command personally in the field,” &c.

The section, said Mr. H., which I have offered in lieu of the one reported by the committee, is the section contained in the old Constitution, and I think it is better than the one reported. The section that has been reported by the committee may be well enough, but it strikes me that it is conferring too much power upon the Governor.

MR. MORRISON of Marion said he did not know that he had any particular tenacity about the terms of the section; but it certainly seemed to him that the Executive ought to be clothed with power to suppress insurrection or repel invasion. He could see no danger that could possibly arise from conferring this power upon the Governor. It did not compel him to go to the field, but merely empowered him to call out the militia, in case the necessity for doing so should arise.

MR. READ of Clark. It appears to me, sir, that, after we have deliberated for weeks upon a section, we ought to be able to decide upon it without re-commitment, unless some cogent reason can be shown why it should be re-committed. I therefore move the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being first on re-committing the sections, with instructions as proposed by the gentleman from Lagrange, it was decided in the negative.

The question then being, Shall the sections pass?

The yeas and nays were taken, in accordance with the order, and resulted—yeas 98, nays 9—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hugin, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimby, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—97.

NAYS.—Messrs. Carter, Chapman, Duzan, Howe, Kilgore, Kinley, Murray, Todd, and Walpole—9.

So the sections were passed, and referred to the committee on revision and phraseology.

SECTIONS ON THEIR SECOND READING.

The Convention then resumed the consideration of the section relating to the veto power of the Governor, on its second reading. The pending question being on the motion of the gentleman from Wayne to strike out the word “not,” in the last line, so that if the Governor were prevented, by the adjournment of the General Assembly, from sanctioning a bill which was sent to him for his signature, it should nevertheless be a law.

Mr. RARIDEN. I wish to add to my motion.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman may withdraw the first motion and move another.

Mr. RARIDEN. I will state to the Convention the purport of the amendment that I propose to make. It is to strike out the words, "within five days after it shall have been presented to him," &c., to the end of the section, and insert "unless he return it in time for each branch of the General Assembly to act upon it, it shall still be a law."

A VOICE. "No, sir; that will not do."

Mr. RARIDEN. Some gentlemen say "No, sir;" I say yes, sir. I desire to have this Convention understand what they are doing. I aver that this section, as it stands, enlarges the veto power four-fold. Let me direct the attention of gentlemen for a moment to what will be the condition of the Legislature hereafter. A section has been reported to us which provides that there shall be but one session in every two years, and we have adopted a section which provides that no law shall pass unless it have the sanction of a majority of all the members elected. Well, sir, this section provides that, if the Governor does not think proper to sanction a bill which has been sent to him for his signature, it shall not be a law. The object of my amendment is, to say that it shall be a law, and the question is: Which is the better guarantee to the public: a majority of all the members elected to the Legislature, or the Governor putting the bill in his pocket and avoiding the responsibility of giving an opinion or reason for his conduct, leaving the world to see that it was not his will to act?

It is proper enough that the Governor should have the power to call upon the Legislature to re-consider a measure that they had passed. It would be but a salutary check upon hasty legislation to require them to reflect upon what they had done. But the provision contained in this section puts it in the power of the Governor to thwart and check the action of the legislative body altogether. Now, I have not, for the last ten years, seen an executive that had the manliness, when two or three influential members of his body shake their locks at him, to give his sanction to a law against their wish. It is seldom that the interest of the country is thought as much of as the popularity of the man. It is giving to the Executive the power, practically to defeat the action of the Legislature, and to avoid responsibility. He may keep a bill in his pocket, and he may say "Oh I have been debating and reflecting upon it, and I cannot make up my mind," and make out of his very delay an appearance of great regard for the public interest. He was so fearful that his country might be injured by it that he could not think of retaining it without deliberating upon it for a great length of time. Well, sir, this is anti-republican. I never saw the time when there was not older and better men in the Legislature than the Executive before the elevation of the greater of them in this State. I and others have met them in courts of justice, and upon the floor of the Legislature, and by no means the most prominent men on those theatres, and yet here you place upon the Legislature the responsibility of acting and having their acts placed upon the permanent record, and put it in the power of the Executive to defeat that action without being in the least degree responsible.

It is argued in favor of the section that it is intended to prevent the fraudulent action of members in holding back their measures until too late for the Executive to examine them and return them previous to the adjournment. Sir, if we suppose that the representatives hereafter are to be knaves, and the executive's business is to watch and restrain them; they should be dispensed with, and their functions vested in the Executive; they can be of no other use than to make trouble. Measures so withheld, and from such men, are unworthy of the sanction of the Executive as we may suppose, and must intend some wrong to the public. The hurry and confusion which prevails at the close of the Legislature has been heretofore a subject of complaint, and an excuse for Governors exercising the pocket veto; but it grew out of local legislation, a great mass of which was thrown upon the last days of the session.

I confess myself hostile to the veto power as heretofore exercised for party purposes, but that the Executive may act wisely upon some occasions, but that in a wrong spirit prevails. The fixed opinion that exists with me that the representatives of the people when they act under those forms that are prescribed by the Constitution itself. And with that kind of deliberation which it is necessary for them to observe in the enactment of laws. I would rather trust to their wisdom and discretion than to the discretion and wisdom of the Executive. This is the question: Are you safe with the enactment thus put forth by the representatives of the people—are you as safe with this as if you had this check upon the exercise of the legislative power? Sir, I am opposed to it. When you consider the restraints that you put upon legislation it is an important enlargement of the veto power? It will be in the power of the Executive at any time to defeat legislative action by merely keeping a bill in his pocket for more than five days.

Mr. BIDDLE. I am in favor of this amendment, or, at least, in favor of a provision similar to this in substance, and I desire to make a few remarks upon the question. The precise shape of the amendment does not suit me as well as if it were in other words, but I think the phraseology can be corrected by the committee on revision. Unfortunately the veto power has been a question between the political parties of this government; I therefore wish to say in the beginning, that I speak for no political party, and for no man. None are bound by what I say but myself. Gentlemen may know my party predilections, but they have not learned them on this floor. They will not learn them on this floor.

The great fundamental idea in all the American Constitutions is, that the powers of government shall forever be kept apart, and exercised separately. This is the basis of the Constitution of the United States, and of every separate State. No gentleman on this floor will deny this proposition. And I have often thought that we are indebted to that one principle more than to any other, or perhaps to all others, for the freedom we enjoy as Americans.

We set out in our bill of rights by declaring that the powers of the government of Indiana shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confided to a separate magistracy. Those which are legislative to one; those which are judicial to another; and those which are executive to a third. And no person being of one of these departments, shall exercise any power which properly belongs to another.

Now, Mr. President, I desire briefly to examine these powers separately, and then their true relation to each other. We settled in the beginning that the legislative authority of this State shall be vested in the General Assembly, which shall consist in a Senate and House of Representatives. Let me remark in passing, that the Governor finds no place in this provision—the duties and powers of the Executive are in no manner connected with it. Nor is there here any trace of judicial power. What is the legislative power? It is that power by and through which a State makes its laws. In a free country like our own, law is but the formal expression of the opinions, wants, desires, and wishes of the people. The people send up their representatives to make their laws in accordance with the will of their constituency.

The Legislature is the mouth-piece of the State, by which it expresses its voice. The better to regulate this power, it is divided into two Houses, each representing different divisions of a common constituency, and holding their offices by a different tenure as to time. This insures the true expression of the general voice, without regard to any particular time or locality. It also gives order and consistency to legislation. Each House is a check upon the other. The General Assembly has no other duty nor power, than to make laws. After a law has been enacted this department has no further power over the subject. It can neither adjudge the law, nor execute it, but must leave it upon the statute books, and for any function still remaining in the legislative power, there it would forever remain. All the power of this department here ends.

The judicial department is established in the following words: "The judicial power of this State, shall be vested in a Supreme Court, in circuit courts, and in such other inferior courts as the General Assembly may establish."

It will be observed that this confers no legislative nor executive power. The vast majority of laws are obeyed without calling upon any other department, but if a law is disobeyed, or is questioned as between citizen and citizen, it is brought before the judiciary for decision. The judicial department is that separate power through and by which a State expresses its judgments. It represents its moral sense, and sense of justice. It takes the law which is the general rule, to which it adjusts the individual case. When this department has rendered its judgment upon a law, its power ceases. The judiciary stands between the other two departments, and is perfectly harmless towards the rights of the people. It must take its rule from the Legislature, and leave to the executive the power to carry into effect its own judgments. It has no patronage to dispense, and no power, and no motive to abuse its trust. There is not one instance in the history of the past, wherein the liberties of the people were overthrown, or materially injured, by this department. I would not be understood as saying there never was a corrupt judge, but I will say that for one corrupt judge, there have been one thousand corrupt kings and ministers; or those who wield the executive power; and I lay it down as a proposition which none will controvert, that as our judiciary in the United States and in the separate States is organized, there is no danger of the integrity of the State, or the liberty of the citizen.

It is provided that the executive power shall be vested in a Governor. And in this we find no legislative nor judicial power. It is simply the power to execute the laws—not to make them—not to adjudge them. As before remarked, almost all the laws are carried into effect without calling upon either of the other departments. A large number are executed by the Governor, without their having been questioned before the judiciary, and when they are thus questioned, the executive carries into effect the judgment rendered. Most judgments are executed, however, without calling upon executive aid. This power is the hand of the State, and dispenses its favors and its patronage, and executes its sovereign will. The other two departments act always upon general rules; the Legislature cannot make a law to favor one man and oppress another, nor can the judiciary lay down a rule that does not operate on all alike. Not so with the Executive. It chooses its favorite agents, and refuses patronage to its opponents. It sits and works in secret, its opinions are disclosed to none, whilst the other two powers act and pronounce their opinions and judgments before the world. Unlike the others, there is no power beyond it to give it check. Of all the powers in a free government, the Executive should be the best defined, and the most restricted. Al history shows us that the Executive continually encroaches upon the other departments, and destroys the true balance of government. It is the serpent of free governments. All these powers have their common standard—the Constitution. By this they are guided and kept within their respective bounds. We have thus examined these separate powers—their relation to each other—and the relation of all to the Constitution—the manner in which they check and correct each other—and they lead us forcibly to this conclusion, that that is the best government whose Legislature makes the laws, and nothing more—whose Judiciary decides the laws, and nothing more—and whose Executive enforces those laws—as thus made, and thus decided—and nothing more. We have thus examined all the powers of Government, which, together, represent its entire sovereignty, and where do we find a legitimate place for the veto? Nowhere, Mr. President, nowhere. It is an unnatural plant to free soil. It was transplanted to America from a crown, and far better does it become a monarchy; but even there it has died out. It is not indigenous to American soil, and I trust its last root may be extirpated.

Let us now, Mr. President, examine the veto power. What is it? Whence came it? Sir, it is a part of the old curse which God in his displeasure, laid upon the Israelites, when he granted them a king. From that day until comparatively modern times, there is scarcely a trace of the true division of the powers of government. The earlier governments were all despotic. They contained but one power, and that was the executive, or rather the executive contained all the other powers. The power which made the law, decided it and executed it, and that law was the mere arbitrary caprice of a despot. From time to time, and often by the sword, the other powers were gradually won from this department, until in some of the American States, we have approached to something like a true balance. And I wish to say now, that I speak of the veto only as applied to States. There may be reasons to support the veto power in a confederated government like our Union—that question is not now before us—but I deny that it has any legitimate place in a State government. It is a part of the legislative power still left in the executive—for it is a legislative power, let gentlemen deny it as they will. It is claimed to be a legislative power by the eminent writers and politicians who support the veto. That which prevents or delays legislation, is a legislative power; it would be illogical to call it otherwise. The veto is a power for freemen yet to overcome before they perfect the work of liberty.

In all those governments where the three fundamental powers are divided, well defined, and exercised by distinct functionaries, there is a high degree of liberty though a monarch may sit upon the throne. England is a fit example. And in a government where these departments are confused or confounded, and exercised by a single functionary—be it composed of one or many—there is no security for freedom. The Grecian democracies here offer us an example. The Greeks were a people fit for liberty, but they could not secure it. It was theirs to-day and gone to-morrow. If they had had a well organized judiciary, they would never have banished their benefactors. Aristides then need not have written the ticket of his own ostracism upon the shell, merely because the people were wearied by hearing him called "THE JUST." The nations of the East, were despotisms—they knew nothing of the divisions of political power. It was all executive—all despotic. The Assyrian Empire shows us no trace of the just balance of power, and we find scarcely any in the history of the Medes and Persians. In some periods of Rome, we see something of it, but not well defined. Tarquin destroyed nearly all the Senators, and made his own laws. He never consulted the judges in making his decisions. At length he usurped the entire power of the people, and made laws directly against their will, adjudged and executed them till, in the forcible language of Montesquieu, "the people recollected they were the proper legislators, and there was an end of Tarquin." The power next fell into the hands of the Decemvirs, and they neither assembled the Senate nor people. Ten men wielded the legislative, executive, and judicial power of Rome. Trajan was a noble prince, and respected the just forms of government. It is true that he punished the primitive christians, but he did it against his own will, and in obedience to a law which the Senate had decreed and the people confirmed. The turmoils and revolutions of France have been mainly owing, in my humble judgment, to the unbalanced and irregular action of political power, and not to the unfitness of the French people for freedom. But our most instructive lesson is drawn from England. The Heptarchy was united under Egbert. It was ruled a long time merely by the king. In process of time, the princes and nobles gained power in the State, and laid the foundation of what is now the House of Lords. This power at length became too strong for the pleasure of the crown, then it was that Edward First, summoned the Knights and Esquires of the principal towns to consult upon the interests of the realm. This grace finally grew into matter of right, and from it we now see the House of Commons—the great bulwark of English liberty. The kings became wearied of dispensing justice in person, and granted the power to the judges, till they gradually became independent of the crown. Now we see in England the powers of government well balanced, and a high security for freedom. And this veto power, which some gentlemen think so necessary to the government of freemen, has there become a mere obsolete prerogative of that bauble—the crown. It has not been exercised since the revolution of 1688, and the use of it at this day, would cost the ministry its place in twenty-four hours. Yet what the British subjects will not bear, gentlemen on this floor think good enough for the free citizens of Indiana.

The veto is an anomaly in a free government, and ought not to find a place in an American State. Take for example the two-thirds veto, as reported by the committee on the legislative department. It gives the Governor a negative on one-third of the legislative power. It disfranchises 330,000 people in the State of Indiana. But gentlemen will say, this is only a majority veto. If it had been only that in effect, I should not have troubled the Convention with any remarks. For the last five days of the session—those important days, when all the labor of the Legislature has become matured for action—during which nearly all the important laws pass—it is an absolute veto. This is worse, sir, than the two-thirds veto. If the Governor chooses, he may stop the wheels of Government. Sir, I would give no man such a power. Now what are the arguments that have been offered in support of the veto?

1. That it is a conservative power. So is a monarchy or despotism, conservative. That is answer enough to that argument. The people, sir, are conservative. They abide the law, and will even bear much wrong, for a time, from their favorites. But they want no veto—they will not support it. Themselves are the only true basis of government.

2. That it will prevent hasty and unconstitutional legislation. Sir, it will prevent all legislation. And shall the Governor say that certain legislation is hasty? No, sir. He ought to be no part of the legislative power, as I have shown. That duty belongs to the people's representatives. Shall the Governor say that a law is unconstitutional? No, sir. That is a judicial question, and we have a department expressly to decide it. No one will contend that the Executive has any judicial power. Then there is no argument in the position.

3. That the Governor is the only representative of the whole people. This is untrue in point of fact. The Governor is no more the representative of the whole people, than the General Assembly, or the Supreme Court. The Governor, it is true, represents the whole people in the executive department, so does the General Assembly, in the legislative department, and so does the Supreme Court in the judicial department. Neither one of these powers, separately, represent the entire sovereignty; but the three, combined and balanced, truly represent the whole sovereign power. The Governor should have no more right to interfere with the Legislature, than he has to dictate decisions to the Supreme Court—or, than the Legislature has to execute a law—or, than the Supreme Court has to veto the Legislature. The one is no more erroneous, nor inconsistent than the other. These powers, in the language of that Constitution which we are handling so roughly, must forever be kept separate, and exercised independently of each other.

4. But it is said that the veto only defers or delays legislation. It would be sufficiently bad for that alone, if it had no other objection. But it does not defer a question upon equal terms.

The people may vote up a law as often as they like, the Governor is still there to veto it down. The terms are unequal. In the two-thirds veto it requires two to overcome one; in the one before us there is no remedy whatever, during the last five—the most important—days of the session. This argument is mere mockery. Let us examine it. Shall a representative return to his constituents and say, "I knew your will, but I did it not. You cannot feel the wants of your own hearts, nor the shackles on your free limbs; I must feel these things for you. Wait two years and perhaps then I will obey you."

When an injured citizen comes into court and demands justice—the common right of all men, even our enemies—shall the Judge say to him, "Sir, you are hasty; true you are entitled to your suit, you have been injured, but it is not my pleasure now to grant you justice. Wait two years, then come again, and if you are not wholly crushed by the delay and wrong, it may be that out of my grace, I may listen to your complaint!" Would a free people endure this? Never! never! Now I desire gentlemen to point out the difference in principle between such conduct in a Judge, and in a representative, and the same conduct in a Governor. By every veto he says to a free people "you are mistaken, your representatives know not your interests, your wishes and your needs. You are incapable of self government. It is only your Governor who can think for your heads and feel for your hearts. Wait two years, and perhaps I may not then veto the same laws, and perhaps I may; I still have the power." Sir, shall a free people practically—if not in words, yet in deeds—be told these things? Yet honorable gentleman are seeking to incorporate this provision in the fundamental law which is to bind millions of people. Pause. Pass this section and you will lay your Legislature at the feet of your Executive. Your Governor will be the great power of the State. Committees must wait upon him. He will condescendingly listen, and then dictate the laws of the people. Add to this kingly prerogative the pardoning power, and you complete the work. He will then have a negative on both of the other powers of the State, and will wield the government at his pleasure. Are gentlemen prepared for this step?

Mr. PETTIT. I had not designed to take part in the debate on the executive department of the State Government. I find myself reluctantly drawn into it, however, by the remarks of the gentleman last up, to whom it always gives me great pleasure to listen. He has taken a well-known ground in reference to this subject. The gentleman told us that he would not announce to us what his political affinities or tendencies were. Sir, there was no necessity that he should. Actions always speak louder than words. The gentleman could not have addressed the Convention for five minutes, without announcing to us, in very intelligible language, towards which side of the political questions of the day, he leans. There was no necessity that he should have done with his speech what an unskillful painter has to do with his painting, that it may be understood; that is, to write the name of the object depicted underneath it. There was no necessity for pointing out that which developed itself so plainly in the whole tenor of his remarks. His arguments as plainly demonstrate what the character of his animal is, as if the name were written. Sir, we have all heard this long argument, over and over again, in reference to the dangerous tendency of the veto power. To the proposition that there is danger to be apprehended from it, I have never yielded my assent, nor, with all the examination that I have given to the subject, have I been able to find, in the veto power, any such dangerous tendency.

A VOICE. "You happen to be on the side of the veto."

Mr. PETTIT. But, sir, you are to look at its practical effects. You are to look at it practically, and not theoretically. What has been the practical result of its exercise in Indiana, or under the General Government? The gentleman says, if you would have liberty, you must not have a controlling power in the Executive. Let me say to the Convention, that its exercise never was dangerous to liberty, but, in my opinion, always preservative of it.

But where has the veto power been found practically useful? It has been in relation to questions of finance, both in the General Government, and in the State Government. It has been found useful in guarding against waste and partiality, alike injurious to both.

Sir, I will not detain the Convention with a long homily on the principle of the veto—of its action in the State or General Governments. I will venture to say, however, that neither the gentleman from Cass, nor any other, can point to any instance of its exercise, since the first veto of Washington, that has operated injuriously. On the contrary, they have been productive of good. Who is there now, who does not agree, that the vetoes of John Tyler were correct? [A voice—"I do not."] Ah, I heard the gentleman going it, in 1840, loud and long, for "Tippecanoe and Tyler too." [A voice—"You bought him up."] I only reply, that he was purchasable stuff, as might be expected, elected as he was.

Now I repeat, that in all the vetoes that have been given, in the General Government, their operation has been wholesome. They have been the salvation of the Government. Where would be the safety, in this mighty Confederacy, against the combinations of the larger States, to swallow up the smaller—to roll the wheels of the car of Juggernaut over the smaller States? But when or where has there been an exercise of the veto power, that failed to meet the approbation of the people of this Union? None, from first to last. But to come down to where we are acting, in our own small sphere. Shall we prohibit, to the Executive of Indiana, this little control over ill-advised legislation? It is not an absolute control. It is not a veto that requires more votes to pass the measure after the veto, than it did at first. It requires but a majority. But why is it that the Governor, when asked to sign a bill, should not have this power? The Governor, having in view the interest of all the people of Indiana, should have the power to say: "You must have my reasoning, before you pass the bill. Not that it shall take one more of your body to pass the law." Shall he not have the poor privilege of saying: "You shall listen to my reasoning before you proceed to pass the law?" That is all that it is proposed to enable the Governor to do. Do gentlemen recollect cases that have occurred within this State, where the exercise of the veto power would have been highly beneficial? I have no hesitation in saying, that if it had been enforced oftener, and more effectually, the State would have been better off by thousands of dollars. Has there been a veto that has been complained of by the people? Not one. The Governor feels the responsibility which rests upon him, when he vetoes a bill. He is no more likely to abuse the power entrusted to him, than the Legislature. I should be glad if, on every important question, the Governor's reasoning could be spread before the Legislature.

The gentleman from Cass institutes a comparison between the exercise of the veto power, as it exists in this country, with the veto of ancient times, in the Roman republic. Why, sir, there is no similarity. To be sure, for a series of years, the tribunes of the people vetoed the act of the Senate. But could the Senate, by a bare majority, pass those acts again? No, sir. The veto, or forbid, of the tribunes, prohibited the passage of the law.

It can do no harm to require a second consideration of a measure, to which the Governor finds reason to object. It is said that the business of the last hours of the session, thrown upon the hands of the Governor, en masse, should become void, if he does not send it back. I think it should not. I think that the Legislature should not allow themselves, by any means, whether proper or improper, to delay the business until within five days of the end of the session, for the express purpose of burdening the Governor unnecessarily. They ought to get through, and send all bills to the Governor, as fast as they can.

In all instances, then, I say I would prefer that the advice and counsel of the Governor should be heard upon the passage of all bills. You do require of him to communicate to the Legislature, information of the state of the Commonwealth, and information as to those matters which interest the people of the State; in other words, the reasons that exist for pursuing a certain course of conduct, or for adopting certain measures; and when he vetoes a bill, it is no more than a repetition of that which it is his duty to do at the commencement of the session. But the Legislature brings up a new subject, which had not entered his mind, and I say he ought to have the power to lay before the Legislature his reasons, and to require that they shall re-consider what is done. I should be glad if the veto power were made stronger than in the section before us; but in this qualified and limited form, I am not willing to part with it.

Sir, this section will need a trifling amendment, and I think by inserting "or joint resolution," after the word "bill," where it occurs in the section, we will dispense with the necessity of engrossing the succeeding section. The first section provides for bills, the next for joint resolutions. It appears to me that there is no necessity for two sections, but that both may be incorporated in one.

Mr. OWEN. I differ radically and in principle from the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) and the gentleman from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) in regard to this matter. I believe the veto to be (in the true sense of the term, not in the fashionable sense,) a conservative power. I believe it to be a power that is, and has proved itself, highly beneficial to the people.

The gentleman from Cass has said that it is a remnant of kingly power. Sir, in what land, in what age had it birth? In Rome, during her republican days. The Plebeian tribune sat outside the door of the Roman Senate, revised the edicts of that body; and when he found anything which he deemed unjust or oppressive, then, speaking in the name of the people and in their behalf, he pronounced the word Veto!—I forbid it! The origin of the veto power, then, instead of being properly traceable back to a kingly source, is democratic.

Mr. BIDDLE. I did not assert that it was a kingly power, as springing from kings. My idea was this: that in despotic governments the entire power resides with the king—with the despot—who embodies all the authority of the State—swallows up not only the executive power, but the legislative and judicial—and that governments have become more popularized by taking power from the executive, and giving a proper balance to the judicial and legislative power. Edward First, being restrained by the nobility, summoned the knights and esquires of the principal boroughs, which was the beginning of the House of Commons—now the bulwark of British liberty. And until quite recently the judges were dependant upon the crown. The first step toward judicial freedom was to put the judges beyond the reach of the king. But while the judges were dependant upon the crown they were an essential part of the kingly power.

Now what I stated was, that in a despotic government all power is in the executive. The phrase originated in Rome when it was a republic, if you please, but it was, nevertheless, an attribute of kingly power.

Mr. OWEN. The gentleman is quite right in saying that in a despotic government the power is in the hands of an individual. But there is an essential difference between a creative and a restrictive power. The power of which we are now speaking, is restrictive only. It is a provision of which the effect is, to hold back, to prevent action. The gentleman has spoken of it as a legislative power. There is no legislative feature about it. It cannot create a law; it cannot create any part of a law; not a section; not a word. When the Legislature—as they sometimes do—hastily pass laws, it declares that the Governor shall have a right to say: "Gentlemen, I ask you to re-consider the matter. I think you have passed the law hastily. I think you did not well consider this argument or that." He has a right to lay the reasons for his dissent before them, and if the Legislature, after having heard what he has to say, still determine to adhere to their original decision, they have the power to re-enact the law, and put it in operation over the veto of the Governor.

The gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) has referred to England; and he has told you that the sovereign now on the throne of Great Britain dare not veto a law passed by Parliament; for if she did so, a revolution would ensue. He reminds us that though in theory the veto is her prerogative, in practice it is not. That is true. It has degenerated into an empty form. Sir, I recollect an anecdote told of some Spanish monarch who had been spending a fatiguing levee, receiving his courtiers and others, and who, in the evening, quite wearied out, exclaimed to his favorite minister: "How tiresome these ceremonies are!" The minister was more plain-spoken than favorites commonly are. "Sire," was his reply, "your Majesty forgets that you are yourself but a ceremony." So in regard to this veto power in England. Queen Victoria is only a ceremony. The Parliament of England is omnipotent. There is neither Constitution nor veto to restrict its legislative power.

Mr. RARIDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. RARIDEN. It strikes me that the gentleman from Tippecanoe and the gentleman from Posey, take a wrong view of the matter. If the Governor returns a bill with his objections, it is all right enough. But it is to the non-action of the Executive that I object.

Mr. OWEN. The gentleman will recollect that my friend from Cass (Mr. Biddle) took the broadest ground against the veto power, in principle, and to him I am now replying.

The republican plant withers and dies in a monarchical soil. There, where the National Legislature is omnipotent, the veto has become a dead letter. In the English form of government, it is not the theory that Parliament should be restrained. But it is our theory, that a National Legislature or a State Legislature shall be. The business this Convention is engaged in, is the restricting of a State Legislature. They never undertake such a business in England.

Sir, when the Governor takes the responsibility of interposing an objection to the passage of a law, he assumes a grave responsibility; such an one, I venture to say, as no man, filling the office, will ever incur, except under a stern sense of duty.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe has well said, that we should not look to theory, but to practice. As we advance in life, we feel, more and more, how much safer a guide practice is, than theory. He has truly reminded us, that the effect of the veto has ever been salutary. He might have added, that the action of the veto has always been endorsed by the people. Measures have been put down by vetoes; Presidents never. No important measure, vetoed by a President of the United States, has ever afterwards received the approval of the people, or been resuscitated by them. On the contrary, the people have, in every case, endorsed the action of the President. Is it possible that you can have a stronger argument than this, in favor of the wholesome influence of this Constitutional check?

A word as to the argument of the gentleman from Wayne. I am ready to vote for a clause in the Constitution, that no new bill shall be introduced during the last three days of the session. I believe this will be a salutary provision. I believe, that more harm is done during the last few days of a session, than in all the preceding weeks. Perhaps this may go far to remove the objections of the gentleman from Wayne.

I rose, however, not so much to speak of minor details, as to express my unwavering conviction, that there is not, in our political system, an element of greater safety, one more truly conservative, than this veto power. I should be sorry to see any thing that has worked so well, erased from the Constitution; nor do I believe, for a moment, that a majority of this Convention will strike it out.

Mr. RARIDEN. If no one else desires to speak upon the subject, I wish to reply briefly to the remarks of the gentleman from Posey, and the gentleman from Tippecanoe.

It does strike me that these gentlemen have avoided debating the question that is immediately before us. It is not the veto power, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, that I object to. What I oppose is the pocket veto. I do not wish to deprive the Executive of the right to assign his reasons for being opposed to the passage of a bill, or to prevent him from calling on the legislative body to exercise a sober second thought. I am not opposed to that. I rather like it, because it compromises the Executive. But when gentlemen tell me that this is a conservative power, and that benefits have resulted to the people from the exercise of that power, such an argument against popular government to say that as the people have been saved from the acts of their representatives in various ways, through the exercise of the veto power by the Executive, you might as well dispense with the popular branch of the government, and get clear of the danger forever.

Gentlemen say that the veto power has always been a conservative power, for the people always saved them from their own folly. Well, he may be right; I will not contend the matter now, but I must confess it contrary to my notions of popular freedom. But I will call the attention of the Convention to the manner in which the gentleman avoids the question. I do not propose to prevent the Governor from reaching his veto and saying it shall not be a law until the Legislature goes over it again, re-thinks upon it, and again acts. But it is the pocket veto that I am at war with. A measure may be fully matured, it may pass from House to House, and have the sanction of every member, still when it comes within a few days of the adjournment the Executive can put the bill in his pocket, and there it may remain for two years, beyond the power of legislation. And they call this conservative power! That is what I am opposed to, and what I trust no free people will ever submit to again.

The effect of my amendment, is to let the responsibility stare the Executive in the face. When a measure has been matured, and passed through all the forms of legislation, and sent to him for approval, let him understand that the measures, however fatal to the interests of the country, shall be a law, unless he acts upon it. His non-action shall confirm the action of the members. Let him act and approve, or assign his reasons against it; it shall be a law. What I object to, is the provision which makes the non-action of the Executive destroy the action of the Legislature. If he have such a power, nine times out of ten it will be exercised in that form, not as a conservative power but for the purpose of promoting party ends. Why do the gentlemen not discuss this point? Why do they not tell us what beneficial results the community experienced from the exercise of the pocket veto? Let them tell us, then, on the subject, and no longer cant about what it has saved to the country.

My proposition is, that if the Governor does not return the bill, with his objections to it, in time for the two Houses of the General Assembly to act upon it, it shall be a law notwithstanding the veto. That is what I am aiming at. I am not hostile, nor am I friendly to the veto power. I do not believe that safety consists in the exercise of that power by the Executive, in this form, who is never selected by the people on account of the confidence they have in him, but because he happens to be a prominent party man. I do not say this in reference to our present Executive. I regretted to hear the gentleman from Tippecanoe say that the gentleman from Cass was right. Now is he willing to make that issue? Is he willing to put it upon party grounds? To maintain that it is an element, a principle of the party to which he belongs, that he has no confidence in the people?

The Constitution requires that bills shall be read three times, and the vote shall be recorded on the journal; yet gentlemen say there must still be a supervisory power lodged in the Executive, to say whether it shall be a law or not. In regard to the principle of calling the attention of the Legislature to the same subject, I have no kind of objection; none at all. And if he can induce a majority to abandon the measure let it be so, but let him not put a bill in his pocket and cause the people to be deprived of its benefits for two years, merely to avoid the responsibility of acting. That is the principle I am contending against, and gentlemen avoid the question. They tell me what the veto has been in past times, but they do not tell me the effect of putting it out of the power of the Legislature to re-pass a bill that has been vetoed by the pocket power. It is a power that is calculated to thwart legislation, always when consummated late in the session.

My amendment does not strike out or limit the veto power proper. It is to abolish the improper and cowardly exercise of it. Why did not the gentlemen come out and tell us the benefit of that? They, unquestionably, avoided it. When they tell me that it is a conservative power, they tell me that they have more confidence in the Executive than they have in the popular branch of the government. Sir, I do not believe a word of it, and I certainly shall resist it. The popular branch may do wrong by mistake, but not by design; but our Executive may act upon calculation, and advice of interested friends.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Ripley,
The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section in relation to the veto power of the Governor.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. Is it in order to amend the section?

The PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. I wish to amend by striking out the word "majority" and inserting "three-fifths," so that it will require a vote of three-fifths of the members to pass a law over the veto of the Governor, instead of a majority of all the members elected.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I believe that I am entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDENT. That is true. The gentleman from Ripley moved the adjournment; he is therefore entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Scott said he hoped the gentleman would yield him the floor for a moment, for a brief explanation.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I will give way to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Scott then proceeded to make some remarks in support of his amendment. He remarked that it seemed not only extraordinary, but absurd, to see gentlemen contending for the veto power of the old Constitution, which was by no means adapted to the power to pass laws, as now amended. Under the old Constitution, two-thirds of all the members elected constituted a quorum to do business, and a majority of the quorum was sufficient to pass a law. When a bill under the old Constitution was vetoed, it required a majority of all the members elected to pass it over the veto, which, in nearly every instance, would be an increase of the number first passing it. But, continued Mr. S., we have provided that a majority of all the members elected to both Houses shall be required to vote for a bill in order to pass it. Where, then, is the propriety of having any veto at all, if the same power may pass the bill a second time? Why subject the Governor to the trouble of writing out his objections and returning the bill, if the same number of members can pass it? And although it is true that, under the new Constitution, all corporations will be formed under general laws, yet is it not certain that combinations of interests will take place, for the purpose of framing such general laws so as to secure to the corporations the greatest possible privileges and immunities? The veto power has done much good heretofore, and should be continued; and if we have increased the number necessary to pass a law, in the same proportion should we extend the force and power of the veto; and this, by my amendment, is proposed to be done, not to the extent of the Constitution of the General Government, or of many of the States, but only to three-fifths of all the members elected.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I moved the adjournment, sir, with the view of claiming the floor and saying something upon this question; but I believe the patience of the Convention is pretty well exhausted, and I feel no disposition to occupy the time further. I will move, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Scott, be laid upon the table.

A division of the question was called for, and the question being first on laying on the table the amendment, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then being on laying the amendment on the table,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 71, nays 28—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, March, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Trimble, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—71.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Biddle, Bourne, Clements, Colfax, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Frisbie, Gregg, Hawkins, Hitt, Howe, Kelso, Kilgore, Maguire, May, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Thomas, Todd, and Watts—28.

Mr. PETTIT. It appears to me that this section, and the one immediately following it, should be incorporated together. I move to insert the words "joint resolution" after the word "bill," wherever it occurs in this section.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. A single word of explanation, sir, which, perhaps, is due from me as chairman of the committee; and I hope it will not be supposed that I am desirous of engrossing the time of the Convention with explanations. There is a distinction to be made between a resolution and a law.

[Mr. MORRISON proceeded to explain the difference between a joint resolution and a bill, and the consequent necessity, according to his view of the matter, for a separate section in relation to each.]

Mr. PETTIT. The gentleman certainly need make no apology for addressing the Convention. It is his especial province, or duty, I think, to explain and enforce the views of the committee. Nor have I any desire to embarrass the gentleman. In looking at the two sections it occurred to me that they might be incorporated into one.

One word as to the difference between a joint resolution and a law. I have heard a great many undertake to define the difference, but never heard it satisfactorily explained. I recollect that I heard John Quincy Adams say once, in the Congress of the United States, that money could not be appropriated by a joint resolution, and that it was wanting, therefore, in one of the requisites of a law. It did not cover so much ground as a law. But I say, so far as relates to the ground that a joint resolution may cover, it is a law of the land to all intents and purposes. Whatever is passed by the General Assembly and approved by the Governor is a law. The term law is, therefore, as applicable to a joint resolution as it is to a bill. If they have power to pass a joint resolution, they have power to give it the force and effect of law. I think the section could be made more harmonious, shorter, and better, by uniting them. But if the Convention think differently, I will not insist upon it.

The question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. KILGORE moved to amend the section by providing that it shall be the duty of the Governor to sign bills and return the same immediately to the House in which they originated.

Mr. BASCOM moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 99, nays 12—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—99.

YAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Ballingall, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Colfax, Frisbie, Hawkins, Kilgore, McClelland, Prather, and Rariden—12.

MR. RARIDEN renewed his motion to amend by striking out the word "not."

He remarked that he was not going to inflict another speech on the Convention. He simply desired to state the effect of the amendment. It was, that, if the Governor did not return a bill that had been sent to him for his signature, before the adjournment of the Legislature, it should then become a law.

He demanded the yeas and nays upon the adoption of his amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

MR. HARDIN moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne,

The amendment was, without a division, rejected.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section in relation to joint resolutions, concerning which the same provision is made as in respect to bills, having been read a second time, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section in relation to the seal of the State, was read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed.

MR. SMILEY moved an additional section providing that contested elections for Governor and Lieut. Governor shall be determined by the two Houses of the General Assembly as may be directed by law.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was adopted, and the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MR. CRUMBACKER offered an additional section, providing that no bill shall be introduced into either House of the General Assembly within five days of the final adjournment &c.

MR. GRAHAM of Warrick moved to strike out "five" and insert "three."

MR. RARIDEN. I fear, sir, that some difficulty may grow out of such a provision. We have adopted a provision to be inserted in the Constitution, and a very proper one it is, that the titles of all laws shall indicate the substance of such laws. This prohibition upon the introduction of bills will prevent the possibility of either House taking up any thing that may have been forgotten or overlooked, and acting upon it at a late period of the session. I never yet seen a legislative body that did not, in the last days of the session, collect up a great many things which had been overlooked, not through any design to keep them back, but in consequence of members being otherwise occupied during the whole session.

If we insert such a prohibition as this, it will occasion many important matters to be omitted. I am for keeping the matter open. I would rather see such a provision as this adopted, viz.: "that no matter shall be finally acted upon;" that is, that a final vote shall not be taken within a certain time of the final adjournment, than to say that no new matter shall be introduced.

MR. KELSO moved to amend the amendment so as to provide that the Legislature may, by a majority of two-thirds, pass any law within the last three days of the session.

MR. EDMONSTON. It seems to me, sir, that such a provision will not accomplish the object which the gentleman from Switzerland has in view. The amendment he proposes is, that the General Assembly may pass any law by a majority of two-thirds, on the last days of the session. This does not remedy the evil.

MR. KELSO. I will change the amendment so as to make it read "introduce and pass."

MR. DUNN of Jefferson. I am afraid we are carrying our restrictions upon the action of the Legislature too far. It may be proper to prescribe some such rule as that proposed by the gentleman from Lake.

"That the General Assembly should refrain from introducing any new matter within the last few days of the session; but they should have power to act upon that which may have been previously introduced. It might become necessary to remedy some defect in a bill that had been passed in a previous part of the session. It seems to me that we can as well trust this whole matter to the wisdom of the Legislature without any Constitutional provision. I therefore, move to lay the whole subject on the table.

The motion was agreed to, and the section and amendments were laid upon the table.

MR. MORRISON of Marion from the committee on the executive department reported the section in relation to empowering the Governor to fill vacancies.

The section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which provides that all commissions shall be in the name and by the authority of the State of Indiana, was read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MR. NEWMAN in pursuance of notice previously given, proposed to amend the standing rules by providing that additional sections may be moved, but that the same shall not be considered until the sections contained in the report of the committee shall have been gone through with.

Mr. READ of Monroe moved to amend by striking out the latter part of the proposed amendment. It seemed to him, he said, that great inconvenience might arise from not being allowed to offer an additional section, and have the same considered in connection with that portion of the report to which it referred, while the sections reported were still before the Convention.

Mr. NEWMAN. The object that I have in view is this: Hitherto, when reports from standing committees have been under consideration, we have got along with a great deal of harmony and rapidity so long as we have confined ourselves to the sections reported. But when considering one section, if a gentleman proposes an additional section, introducing new matter, it almost invariably gives rise to animated and extended debate, and has the appearance, at least, if it be not so in reality, of creating some degree of confusion. Debate will necessarily spring up when new matter is introduced, and I propose that such new matters shall lie upon the table until the Convention shall have gone through with the report of the committee, and that such sections as any gentleman may propose shall then be taken up and considered. If such additional section have no immediate connection with the last section reported by the committee, or, if they would more appropriately come in at another place, the committee on revision can easily arrange that matter.

I admit that sometimes sections should be altered, but the mischief to be remedied is, that the introduction of new matter while considering the report of the committee, tends to distract the attention of members, and occasions a great deal of unnecessary debate.

Mr. READ of Monroe. Let us consider this matter practically. The report of the committee being under consideration, a gentleman wishes to introduce an amendment by adding a section, while the attention of members is directed to that particular part of the report to which the additional section is applicable, rather than wait until the whole report is gone through with. It seems to me that every member ought to have the power to offer an additional section at the place where it properly belongs, otherwise I am satisfied great inconvenience will result.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was decided in the negative.

The question being on the amendment to the rules, proposed by the gentleman from Wayne,

Mr. WALPOLE moved that it be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WALPOLE. One word before the question is put upon the adoption of this amendment. Gentlemen who represent committees may be well enough satisfied with what they themselves propose, but I am not willing that their reports shall be conclusive against all the other members of the Convention. There are twenty-one gentlemen here who are chairmen of committees; they may report what they choose, but here are one hundred and twenty-nine other gentlemen, all of whom should have the privilege of proposing additional provisions. I hope the matter will remain open, that gentlemen will have an opportunity of presenting their propositions, and of having them acted on by the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that the proposition to amend the rules does not preclude gentlemen from proposing amendments to sections.

Mr. WALPOLE. I am aware of that, but the gentleman's object is to prevent new sections from being considered until the report of the committee shall have been gone through with. What is the effect of this? Those who are satisfied with the sections as reported, call the previous question, and cut off all amendments. For these reasons I object to the proposed amendment of the rules.

Mr. BORDEN. It appears now to be quite evident, that, in consequence of our departure from the usual course of proceeding, which is to refer the reports of the committees to the committee of the whole, and to consider them there, we have involved ourselves in some degree of embarrassment. Now, if any member desires to add an additional section in a particular part of the report of a committee, how is he to accomplish his object? Must he wait until the whole report is gone through—until the House should have become impatient, and refuse to listen to any new proposition? There are many things that have been overlooked by your committees. This has resulted from the improper distribution of the Constitution among the committees. I trust the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne will be rejected.

Mr. DOBSON. I think we have got along very well under the rule as it is. A member may now offer amendments to any section; but it will tend to embarrass us and retard our progress, if it be provided that propositions to amend shall be postponed until we reach the end of the article. There will then be nothing to amend. I think it is much better that we should have the privilege of amending as we go along; while the subject is fresh in the minds of gentlemen. That, in my judgment, is the proper time for making amendments. Much more confusion and delay will be produced if amendments are offered at an inappropriate time.

Mr. KELSO said, he was satisfied that an amendment to the existing rule was necessary, but he was not satisfied that the amendment now proposed was the right one. He thought it would be better to lay this proposition on the table, with a view of calling it up after the subject had been a little more maturely reflected upon.

Mr. NEWMAN said, that gentlemen who opposed the amendment which he had offered, might be better parliamentarians than he was, but it did seem to him that the objections that had been urged against its adoption—viz: that the previous question would be called if amendments were deferred until the report had been gone through with, and that they would thus be cut off, was altogether fallacious. Because, unless an additional section were to be proposed, there would be nothing upon which the previous question could operate.

It appears to me, continued Mr. N., that it is vastly preferable to go on concurring in the printed report until it is gone through with, and then gentlemen who have propositions to offer may bring them forward when the attention of the Convention is not directed to any other point.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley proposed to amend by providing that new sections may be proposed to an article after it has been gone through with.

He had but a single remark to make. It would be recollected by all gentlemen, he said, that they had repeatedly voted down propositions when the question was upon their engrossment, and had, on the following day, reconsidered the vote, and the same ground had been gone over a second time. It was for the purpose of avoiding this delay that he had offered the amendment.

Mr. NAVE said, he was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne, for the following reason: As the rule had heretofore existed the gentleman had had an opportunity of proposing different sections to articles as the Convention was considering them; and he had frequently seen additional sections proposed that were absolutely necessary to be incorporated in the organic law of the State, and they were propositions that had been for more than two months before some one or other of the standing committees, and had not been reported on by them.

That had been the case, he said, with a proposition that was acted upon to-day; and perhaps because gentlemen had not the capacity to comprehend it—he could conceive of no other reason—it went to the table without deliberation. If the chairmen of committees had the power to treat important propositions in this way, the rules ought to be changed. The motion to lay upon the table appears to be the first motion in order here, without giving the mover of the proposition an opportunity to explain its object. As this seemed to be the prevailing practice, he was in favor of making it uniform by adopting the proposed amendment, so that all propositions to amend should be postponed until the report of the committee had been gone through with.

Mr. READ of Monroe said, he thought the Convention ought well to consider before they adopted the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne. If such a rule were adopted, they would have just such a farce enacted after the article had been gone through with as they always had on resolution day, and gentlemen would not have the privilege of introducing sections at the proper time. It would be an unfortunate decision, he thought, if the Convention were to decide on adopting such a rule.

Mr. COOKERLY moved that the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to, and the proposed amendment was accordingly laid upon the table.

The section which provides that all elections shall be held biennially on the first Tuesday in October, was read a second time.

Mr. PRATHER moved to strike out the word "biennially," and insert the word "annually."

Mr. KELSO moved to amend the amendment by striking out the word "first," and inserting the word "second," so as to make the time of holding elections the second Tuesday in October instead of the first.

The question was taken on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Switzerland, and it was, upon a division—ayes 50, noes 36—adopted.

The question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Jennings (Mr. Prather) as amended,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. PETTIT said, he could not well see how annual elections could be made consistent with the determination that the Convention had arrived at, in regard to the sessions of the Legislature, which were directed to be held in future biennially. It was also provided in another section which had been adopted by the Convention, that the Governor should hold his office for four years, and the Lieutenant Governor for the same length of time. They had also determined that State Senators should be elected for four years. He could not very well see how elections could be held annually, when the term of office of no officers was less than two years, and when most of them were to be elected for four years. He could not see how it was that their elections could recur annually. He could not see what necessity or propriety there was in inserting such a provision as this, inasmuch as there were no officers to be annually elected.

Mr. WOLFE said, it appeared to him that the gentleman from Tippecanoe was mistaken in regard to this matter. The county officers—clerk, auditor, recorder, &c., were to hold their offices for two years it was true, but the arrangement was to be this, that they should go out of office in alternate years. It would be necessary, therefore, that there should be an election every year, in order to supply the places of those whose term of office expired within the year. Again, when a vacancy occurred by death or resignation, were they going to leave the office unfilled for two years? It appeared to him that elections ought to be held annually.

Mr. KELSO coincided in opinion with the gentleman from Sullivan. In case of a vacancy by death or resignation, there should be a power somewhere to fill such vacancy. But it was not anticipated that the appointment to fill the vacancy should extend beyond the original term. The people should have an opportunity annually to fill all vacancies that might occur.

Mr. PETTIT said, he thought it would be better to compromise this matter, and it might very easily be done by merely striking out the word "biennially," and allowing the election to take place whenever there might be a necessity for it.

Mr. READ of Monroe. It is an old saying—as old, I believe, as English freedom—that where annual elections end, there liberty is at an end. I want an annual expression of the sentiments of the people in reference to political subjects, and I think that in regard to the term of office of public officers and consequently the recurrence of elections, the joints ought to be so broken—to borrow a phrase that will be understood by all—that the term of office of all officers shall not end at the same time. I hope that the amendment will prevail, and that there will be annual elections for officers whose term of office may expire with the year, so that there may be a frequent expression of public sentiment.

Mr. COOKERLY. I would like to know how the gentleman is going to carry out his design, since it is provided that the county officers shall hold their offices for two years.

Mr. READ of Monroe. It may be done in this way. The clerk of a county may be elected one year, the auditor the next, and so on alternately.

Mr. COOKERLY. How can that possibly be, when we have already provided that they shall be elected at a specified time, and be elected for two years? What offices would there be for the people to elect in the alternate years? The members of the General Assembly are to be elected biennially; and the county officers are to be elected at the same time, and for the same period. Does the gentleman propose to reverse what we have already done? I have seen indications of a disposition, on the part of some gentlemen, to infringe upon the determination that the Convention has arrived at. If they want to reverse the action of the Convention, and have annual elections, let them say so.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The Convention has already determined that county officers, now in office shall not be removed when the new Constitution goes into effect, but shall continue in office until the expiration of the term for which they were elected. This being the case, one will go out of office one year, another the next so that there must necessarily be elections held every year, to fill the offices that become vacant during the year. You will never have all your county officers elected at one particular time. This was the argument used by the gentleman from Hancock—and it was a forcible argument—in favor of turning out those officers.

In one year there will be an election for county auditor and recorder, perhaps, and in another year an election for clerk, sheriff, and other officers. This, it seems to me, is a sufficient answer to the argument of the gentleman from Tippecanoe.

Mr. BORDEN said that, in his view of the matter, it would not be material when the term of office expired. The officers might be elected with a view to the time when the offices should become vacant. [A voice—"That is the idea."] It seemed to him that, having provided that those officers should hold their offices for two and four years, there was no necessity for annual elections.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. It had been argued by some gentlemen, that all officers should serve an equal number of years, so as to have uniformity. If this were the determination, he could see no necessity for opening the polls throughout the whole State, when it was only requisite to fill a vacancy in one county. According to the manner in which they had regulated the tenure of office, it would be quite sufficient that an election should be held once in two years.

Mr. BASCOM said he could not exactly understand the process of reasoning, by which some gentlemen arrived at their conclusions. In the county that he represented, unless annual elections were provided for, they would be under the necessity of electing officers to fill some of the county offices, one year ahead. He was in favor of having annual elections provided for, and of having the term of office of the different officers expire at different times. There would thus be occasion for annual elections, and he thought it was proper that elections should be held annually.

Mr. PRATHER said he would accept the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, if it were in order for him to do so.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention has acted upon the amendment of the gentleman from Jennings. It is not within his power now to modify it.

Mr. RITCHEY said he had taken ground last summer against the change that was proposed to be made in regard to the holding of elections. He was opposed to the provision in the new Constitution, for having biennial sessions of the Legislature, and the strongest objection to it in his mind was the fact, that it would necessarily carry with it the provision that elections should be held only once in two years. He believed that the body politic would lose that interest in its own affairs, that they ought to have, by holding the elections at remote periods. He believed that the term of office ought to be so arranged as to keep up the system of annual elections. He did not like the idea of electing a man one or two years before his term of office commenced. He hoped the amendment of the gentleman from Jennings would prevail, and that we should still have annual elections. He was convinced that no difficulty could grow out of it, if they arranged the time of election of the different officers at the commencement, so as to have the term of service of each commence at a different period from the other. And as to the officers of state, he would much prefer that their term of office should not terminate at the same period, so that there should not be at any time an entirely new set of either state or county officers placed in office, as would be the case if they adhered to the terms of the original section, and provided merely that the elections should be held biennially. It would be much better to have their terms of service to commence at different periods.

Mr. DOBSON said that he foresaw the difficulty there would be in arranging this matter, when it was first proposed that there should be biennial instead of annual sessions of the Legislature. What was it that they had already provided? It was that there should be elected, in each county, a clerk, auditor, sheriff, &c., at the time and place of holding the election for members of the General Assembly. And a little further on, it was provided, that a Governor shall be elected at the time and place of holding the election for members of the General Assembly, and if two or more candidates should have an equal number of votes, the General Assembly was to decide who should fill the office, &c. In undertaking to break joints, gentlemen were very likely to break things all to pieces. A little further on, it was provided that, in the case of the election of Governor, the votes shall be returned to the General Assembly. But under the new arrangement, they would have to wait two years, before a single step could be taken. If they were to determine, as had been proposed, that the Governor should hold his office four years, members of the General Assembly two years, sheriffs, coroners, and other county officers two years, he would ask what officers they were going to elect at their annual elections? It certainly appeared to him to be quite unnecessary to put the people to the expense of meeting once a year, and holding an election, to elect nobody. There might be special elections in particular counties, but there was no necessity for a general election every year. It would not work well. If they are to elect a Governor at any other time than when the members of the General Assembly were elected, how was he to be sworn in? He would have to wait until the Legislature came together. He was opposed to the whole thing. If he were permitted to have his way, however, he would have elections every year, and have the Legislature meet every year. There were about 180,000 voters in the State, and if gentlemen would take the trouble to estimate the expense of holding a general election, they would find that it amounted to a very considerable sum. Fifty cents a day, cash, for the loss of time, besides a great many other losses—wear and tear of conscience, &c.—would be but a moderate computation. When vacancies occurred, it was right to hold elections to fill them; but there was certainly no necessity for the people of the whole State to be drawn from their occupations, and to come up to the polls to fire blank cartridges, when there was no game to be shot at.

Mr. KELSO said he would try to put the proposition in a shape that he thought would be acceptable to the Convention. The amendment of the gentleman from Jennings was to strike out the word "biennial" and insert the word "annual." He would move to amend the gentleman's amendment, by striking out that part of it which required the insertion of the word "annual," so as to leave it in general terms. Now, sir, said Mr. K., one word in reference to this matter. The gentleman from Owen has drawn an unfortunate comparison. He has taken the Governor and traveled through with him; he likes to be in company with great men. Sir, we have provided that when the office of Governor becomes vacant the Lieutenant Governor shall step in and fill the office, so that provision is made that the office shall continue filled, up to the time of the general election. There is no difficulty, then, about that. But suppose a Secretary of State should be elected and within the first six months should leave the State, resign his office, or die; there must be a power somewhere, to fill the vacancy. It is provided that the Governor, or the person filling the office of Governor, shall fill vacancies during the recess of the General Assembly; but it is not contemplated that there shall be such appointment to fill a vacancy for a year and a half. Now by striking out the word "annual" and leaving it to the Legislature to authorize elections when necessary, they will make provision for the filling of vacancies without going to the Governor for a special writ of election.

Mr. TAYLOR said he desired to throw out a few suggestions for the consideration of the Convention in regard to this matter. He had lived for twenty years, he said, in a neighboring State where they had biennial elections and biennial sessions of the Legislature, and he had never seen any confusion growing out of this system. He thought the section was a good one, and that any amendment would only produce confusion. Now it is known to every politician, continued Mr. T., if not to the whole people, that at all general elections, when your Governor is to be elected, and members of the Legislature, and justices of the peace, and other officers, you get a fair and full vote of the people; but when you divide up the elections, electing half your officers at one time and half at another, you destroy half of the zeal and alacrity with which voters come forward, and you divide the political power of the country. A man will say, "My friends are in office, I feel no interest in the election that is about to take place, I will not give myself the trouble to attend." It is much better, in my opinion, that the people once in two years should assemble and choose their officers; and so long as you have only biennial sessions of the Legislature there can be no necessity for annual elections. I have seen the system in operation, as I have said, for twenty years. It is true the Governor is at all times authorized to order special elections, but no man ever sees a full vote given under such circumstances.

Whenever a full vote is given at an election, the best men will be elected; and in addition to all this, it will be putting the people to a good deal of trouble if elections are to be held in this manner. The people will not know who are to be elected. They will come up to election supposing that the same men whom they had elected twelve months before, are to be re-elected. I think it will be better to leave the section as it stands.

Mr. LOCKHART. Is it in order to move to amend the original section?

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order.

Mr. NEWMAN. Is it not in order to move to strike out and insert?

The PRESIDENT. That motion cannot be entertained until the motion that is now pending is disposed of.

Mr. NEWMAN. My purpose is to amend the section so that the general election shall be held on the first Tuesday in September, and my object is to leave the question open, so that the Legislature may act as their sense of duty may prompt them. The reason why I fix the first Tuesday in September is this: it is about the division between harvest and seed time, and will consequently interfere less with the industrial pursuits of the country.

Mr. MILLER of Fulton moved the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being on the amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The question then being on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Jennings, to strike out the word "biennial" and insert the word "annual,"

It was, by yeas 62, noes not counted, decided in the affirmative.

Mr. NEWMAN then moved his amendment, to strike out a portion of the section and insert "the elections shall be held on the first Tuesday in September."

The question being taken upon the amendment, it was rejected.

The section was then engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PETTIT. As the next subject that will come up is the malicious [militia] question, and as we are now all in very good humor, I think we had better defer that subject. [A laugh.] I therefore move that the Convention adjourn.

The Convention refused to adjourn.

The article reported from the committee on the militia was then taken up, for a second reading.

The PRESIDENT. Will the Convention consider the sections separately or collectively?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "Collectively."

The question being put, the Convention decided that the question should be taken on the sections collectively.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved to strike out all of the article except the following: "That the militia of the State shall consist of all free and able bodied male persons, negroes excepted, between the age of eighteen and forty-five, to be organized under provisions of law."

It seems to me, said Mr. D., that this is all that need be said on the subject of the militia. It is altogether unnecessary for us to designate here, how colonels shall be elected—how we shall obtain our arms; and all the other minor arrangements. It is only necessary that we should establish general principles by declaring of whom the militia shall consist.

Mr. BASCOM. I have an amendment to offer.

The PRESIDENT. What does the gentleman propose to amend?

Mr. BASCOM. I propose to add the following:

The PRESIDENT. To what does the gentleman propose to add it?

Mr. BASCOM. To what is left of the section.

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be on the motion of the gentleman from Jefferson.

Mr. MARCH moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson, by adding, that persons conscientiously opposed to bearing arms, shall be exempt from serving in the militia, on such conditions as shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. BORDEN. It occurs to me that some provision of the kind ought to be inserted.

Mr. MARCH. The old Constitution contains a provision of this kind, and I think it ought to be inserted in the new. The class of persons referred to is a very numerous class, and if a provision of this kind be not introduced in the Constitution, it will be very distasteful to them. Inasmuch as they have been accustomed to the exemption, they expect to be still permitted to enjoy it.

The amendment was adopted.

The question being on the amendment as amended,

Mr. MILROY said he hoped that the motion to strike out would not prevail. The article had been prepared with some care. It proposed a system that was somewhat new, but wherever it had been tried, it had been found to work well. It proposed to abolish the system of forcing men to muster, and to substitute the volunteer system in lieu of it. Under the provisions contained in this article, continued Mr. M., no person is forced to drill; but it provides for the organization of volunteer companies for the purpose of perfecting themselves in military discipline. I believe that such a system is in conformity with the wishes of the people of the State. Every gentleman is aware that in the war with Mexico, the volunteer principle worked better than any other that could be adopted. There is no better system in the world. Under that system the country can raise at any time a million of troops, whereas if you leave the matter to the Legislature, you will have no militia at all.

The article also provides that the militia shall be enumerated for the purpose of procuring the quota of arms to which the State is entitled. There is nothing compulsory about it. I hope the Convention will give the matter that deliberation to which its importance entitles it.

Mr. COOKERLY. As this is an important question, in order that we may have an opportunity to consider it, I move that the Convention adjourn.

The Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. PETTIT. I am free to admit, that I know little or nothing about military affairs. My friend on my left (Mr. Milroy) is well versed in its theory and practice; and I shall be inclined to defer greatly to his opinions. But it appears to me that we need not put a long article in the Constitution in reference to this subject. There certainly can be no great necessity for it. I am for giving it a fair and full consideration however, and in order that it may be further examined and discussed at the proper time, I move that for the present the article and pending amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being upon the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson,

Mr. MURRAY. I should be sorry to see the article stricken out. The old militia system has been nearly abandoned everywhere, and it appears to me that there can be no better system adopted in its place than the one here proposed. It compels no one to serve against his will, and provides that a few volunteer companies may be formed, thus securing to the country a class of troops that may be serviceable in case of an emergency. It will also induce the instructing of the officers of those companies in military duty, thus laying the foundation of a system to be hereafter built upon and improved. I hope the section will not be stricken out.

Mr. FARROW said he had bestowed a good deal of attention upon this subject. He had examined the militia laws of several of the States, as well as their Constitutional provisions upon the subject of the militia, and he had failed to discover a system in operation anywhere that was, in his judgment, so objectionable as the system here proposed. These provisions were altogether of a novel character, and he was of the opinion that it would not be found to work well.

There was one very great absurdity to which he would direct the attention of the Convention for a moment. It was here proposed that there should be three companies formed to be denominated active militia, the officers of which companies were to be commissioned for three years. This was the first time that he had ever known, in the organization of the militia of any State, the number of years prescribed for the continuance of the commissions of the officers.

Now, sir, continued Mr. F., I give it as my decided judgment, that under this provision, if you place it in the Constitution, you will not be able to create one solitary volunteer company in the State. I apprehend, sir, there are few men in the State who would accept a commission and prepare himself to fulfill the duties appertaining to an officer for the sake of holding a commission for the short space of three years.

I think all that is necessary to be done in regard to this matter, is that which has been suggested by the gentleman from Jefferson. It is notoriously true, that it must always remain a subject of legislation. It belongs more appropriately to the Legislature than to the Constitution, as we all know. At present there is no necessity for any active operations on the part of the militia of the State, and past experience has demonstrated that it makes but little difference whether the militia have any previous training or not. All that they may have learned in that way has to be unlearned when they are called into service. I hope that we shall not encumber the Constitution that we are about forming with any provision on the subject beyond a mere recognition of the militia.

Mr. SPANN said, that as one of the members of the committee from which this article had been reported, it might be proper for him to say, that while he had no desire to place before the Convention a lengthy article, he, nevertheless, desired that it should correspond somewhat with the article in the old Constitution, and at the same time introduce such an improvement as would make it more acceptable to the Convention and to the people of the State. If it were true, as gentlemen had asserted, that the chivalry of the country was always reliable when an emergency arose, without any previous preparation, it would be well enough to pass the subject by. But gentlemen seemed to rely upon future legislation for almost every thing.

I shall not, continued Mr. S., oppose any change in either the language or substance of the report that gentlemen may desire to make, so that they will allow it to contain something as a basis for future legislation; and by means of which we may draw from the General Government the arms to which the militia of the State are entitled, and provide for the preservation of those arms, &c. It appears to me that the system here proposed would have a salutary effect in encouraging the young men of the State to form volunteer companies, and to prepare themselves by training for military duty.

But that certain religious denominations—persons professing to have conscientious scruples against bearing arms shall be exempt—is a thing that I see no occasion for. I am opposed to any special exemptions. I am for placing all upon an equality. If we exempt one person we may be called upon to exempt another. Every person should be held liable to perform military duty when the exigencies of the State require such service, or else to pay an equivalent. I care very little about the wording of the article, but I hope it will not be stricken out altogether.

On motion by Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe, The Convention adjourned.

~~~~~
SATURDAY, DEC. 28, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MILLS.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I rise to call the attention of the Convention and of the Reporter to a material error which occurs in the published report of the proceedings of Friday morning, December 13. It is stated by the Reporter that Mr. Kelso moved to re-commit the 18th section of the article on the Legislative Department, with instructions to strike out that part of the section which requires two-thirds of each House of the General Assembly to pass a bill over the veto of the Governor, and insert a majority of both Houses, and I am represented as voting against the motion. The motion made by Mr. Kelso on that morning, against which I voted, had reference to another and a different section. The report represents me as voting on the veto question directly against my own sentiments. There are many questions about which I have doubts, but this is not one of them, for there is no question presented to this Convention in relation to which my mind is more fully settled than this one concerning the veto power of the Governor. I am in favor of the qualified veto as provided in the old Constitution, and as it was settled yesterday by a majority of this Convention, and I am opposed to any increase of the power of the Executive on that subject. If I had obtained the opportunity which I desired yesterday to give my views on this subject, I should not have troubled the Convention with this explanation, but inasmuch as I was denied that opportunity by the call of the previous question at the instance of the gentleman from Johnson, (Mr. Hardin,) there was no mode left by which I could place myself right on the record but to make the explanation here; for the permission to do so I return my thanks to the Convention.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BORDEN. I hold in my hand a resolution which I desire to present, but I have understood from a previous decision of the Chair that a resolution proposing to adjourn on the 15th of January, has been already indefinitely postponed, and the Convention cannot again entertain a resolution upon the subject of a final adjournment, until the vote upon the question of indefinite postponement of the resolution already offered on the subject, be re-considered. I therefore hope that some one who voted in the majority will now move a re-consideration of the vote indefinitely postponing the resolution which proposed to adjourn, so that I may be enabled to present a proposition upon the subject.

Mr. BASCOM rising, Mr. BORDEN gave way, when,

Mr. BASCOM moved to re-consider the vote.

Mr. BORDEN. The resolution I desire to submit sir, in case the motion to re-consider, made by the gentleman from Wells, (Mr. Bascom,) shall prevail, provides that the Convention shall adjourn finally, upon the 1st day of February next.

I am fully satisfied, sir, that if we will meet at 8 o'clock in the morning of each day, and instead of taking up the time by motion after motion to adjourn before it is necessary, and adopt a standing rule to take a recess at noon, without a motion to adjourn, and then after that noon recess, work steadily until it is dark, we can easily get through with our business by the 1st of February. It appears to me we should endeavor to economize our time and avoid making motions to adjourn before the proper time arrives.

During the last two or three weeks, gentlemen must surely have remembered that we have adjourned sometimes a-half or three quarters of an hour, and in one or two instances, an hour before dark; or at any rate, we have adjourned so early that I have had considerable time to sit in my room and read before dark. We have hired this room at the public expense; it can be splendidly lighted up at night, and in my opinion, we could spend the time between seven and nine o'clock at night, in transacting the business of the people, and I see no reason why we should not do it.

I trust, therefore, that the motion of the gentleman from Wells will prevail, and that we will now determine upon the day on which we will finally adjourn. If we will find that day of adjournment, then every member will put forth an exertion to work up to the time, and in my opinion, it will have a tendency to shorten our sessions some two or three weeks.

Mr. KELSO. It is a direct slander upon this body, even to insinuate that it has not worked ardently, especially during the last four or five days. At the very time, sir, when we have really got into the work, we are pestered with motions to adjourn at a given period. As regards the statement of the gentleman that we adjourn before dark, I have only to say that I have sat in this body when it did not adjourn until it was so dark where I sat, that I could not see to read, so that the gentleman from Allen must have gone out of doors to see to read on those occasions. I do not believe sir, that this Convention is disposed to trammel itself with any resolution of this kind.

I maintain that we have always been industrious in the way we have thought best. We have assembled here to transact important business. We have convened to reason together and discuss the propriety of certain amendments to the Constitution; and it is not to be expected that we will hurry over our important business in order to get through with it by a certain day, thereby jeopardizing the interests of the people in presenting them with an immature and injudicious form of government. I trust that the Convention will refuse to re-consider this vote, and then if there comes a time when we fail to perform our duty and become lax in our mode of transacting business, such a motion can be brought forward to admonish us of our duty.

Mr. BORDEN. I desire to say a few words before the question is put, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso). I am not, sir, in the habit of speaking disrespectfully to any man or body of men, as the gentleman intimates I have done, in the position I have taken upon this question of adjournment. I do not know but that all of us are more or less to blame for protracting the sessions of this Convention, and therefore it was the farthest from my intention to throw blame upon any one in particular, nor did I design to speak disrespectfully of the body itself; consequently I think it very wrong to charge me with any such intention. My action upon this subject has not been the result of a deliberate purpose to injure the Convention in public estimation, or the work which may be the result of its labors, in the good opinion of the people; on the contrary, it is based wholly on the wishes expressed or implied of those I represent on this floor. There is, sir, a general complaint not only in my own district, but if I may be allowed to infer from what I have seen in the papers, and upon what has been stated by gentlemen who have been home recently to their constituents and returned, there is much dissatisfaction throughout the State, at the tardiness of our proceedings. They believe this Convention is extending its sessions to too great a length in consequence of the introduction of subjects wholly foreign to the object for which it was convened.

I do think, sir, that we ought to proceed with the business before us, and with much greater dispatch, but I have no hope of seeing this object accomplished, unless we now fix upon an early day for final adjournment.

Mr. BASCOM. I did not make this motion for the purpose of exciting debate, and thereby taking up the time of the Convention. I will therefore withdraw the motion to re-consider.

The discussion here ended.

SUPPORT OF ORPHANS.

Mr. FOSTER offered a resolution of inquiry, as to the expediency of inserting a provision in the Constitution, in aid of the support of destitute orphan children.

Mr. F. said. I do not pretend to the pater-nity of this resolution; it was suggested to me by a benevolent gentleman this morning, who occupies a high position in society. I think, sir, that a provision of this kind should be included among those that are enacted with reference to other benevolent institutions. We can easily decide as to the mode of educating these children and the propriety of giving them some mechanical employment hereafter. I think it is a subject worthy of the consideration of the Convention.

The resolution was adopted.

LICENSE.

Mr. ROBINSON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee, to consist of seven members, be appointed by the president, whose duty it shall be to report a section for the new Constitution in substance as follows:

SECTION 8.—The General Assembly shall not pass or continue in force any law authorizing the grant of any license or permit for the sale of any ardent spirits or intoxicating liquor.

Mr. R. said: Under the five minute rule I can but barely allude to the subject embraced in this resolution. I have offered it for the purpose at the proper time of bringing the Convention to a direct vote upon it. It would, perhaps, be out of place for me here to talk about the evils of intemperance; but I think I may be permitted to say that I do not think any delegate on this floor can offer any reasonable objection to the section contemplated by the resolution being incorporated in the Constitution. This section, sir, leaves the question, of vending ardent spirits an open question to be governed in future by whatever may be the public feeling and sentiment of the community. I would remark further here that there is an enterprize now going on in the country, and admired I believe by every gentleman on this floor—an enterprize that promises at no very distant day to effect a wholesome reform in the business growing out of the sale of ardent spirits. These individuals who are engaged in this reformation are anxious, and the people generally are anxious—and petition after petition has been presented to this body to that effect—that we should erase such provisions from the Constitution as will give license to the traffic in ardent spirits so that that question may be left open to be settled by the voice of public sentiment in the future. I desire then a direct vote upon the passage of the resolution, and upon the question of the passage of the resolution. If I can get friends enough to second the call I shall demand the yeas and nays.

The resolution lies over under the rule.

TIPPECANOE BATTLE GROUND.

Mr. GREGG offered the following resolution, to-wit:

Resolved, That the committee on "public institutions of the State" inquire into the expediency of inserting in the new Constitution a section providing for the erection of a suitable monument on the Tippecanoe battle-ground, to commemorate the valor of those who fought, and perpetuate the memory of those who fell upon that bloody battle-field.

Mr. G. said: I do not know, Mr. President, that this is a question which comes properly within the purview of our duties, powers, and responsibilities as a constitutional convention. Indeed, sir, I am apt to believe that it is one which belongs more especially to the legislative department of our government. But, however this may be, I am well satisfied that it is one of those great and peculiar questions of the day, which overleaps all mere conventional rules, and addresses itself at once to the patriotic emotions and sympathies of every American heart, and especially of every citizen of Indiana, whether by birth or adoption.

It will be recollected, sir, that on last Saturday a resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) and which was unanimously adopted by this Convention, directing the committee on the public institutions of the State to inquire into the expediency of providing in the Constitution for the permanent inclosure of the Tippecanoe battle-ground, donated to the State by Gen. John Tipton.

Now, sir, while I concur most fully in the object and design of that resolution—while I would afford the most ample protection, from rude disturbance, to those sacred relics of the dead that slumber there—while I would preserve from waste the shrubbery and forest trees that cast their cooling shadows o'er their graves—I would desire to go one step farther towards carrying out the laudable design of Gen. Tipton in making the grant, as well as the avowed object of the Legislature in accepting it, by providing also for the erection of a suitable monument to perpetuate the memory of those sainted heroes who laid down their lives for their country on that ever memorable battle-field.

Sir, I subscribe most cordially to the sentiment, "that, wherever a drop of blood has fallen for freedom, that spot should remain forever sacred." Let us not then forget to cherish the hallowed places we hold in our midst—places that are yet covered with the fresh laurels that immortalize them. Let us keep them forever green, by planting them with the undying verdure of a grateful remembrance, and bedewed with the tears of a nation's gratitude. To this end I desire to see the most efficient measures adopted for the preservation of all that pertains to the Tippecanoe battle-ground. To this end I desire to see a monument erected upon that consecrated spot, that shall be alike honorable to the dead, and creditable to the living. Sincerely do I hope that we may all cheerfully join in the accomplishment of so desirable an object.

And here, Mr. President, I hope I may be pardoned for alluding in this connection to an article which I find in a late number of the Madison Courier, and which was written by a gentleman who, by the courtesy of this body, holds a seat upon this floor as a regular reporter of our proceedings. I mean the gentleman who sits there (pointing to Mr. Bolton). And I assure the Convention, in all sincerity, that, although I felt indignant at first at the unjust imputation, I refer to it now more in sorrow than in anger—sorrow, that any gentleman who loves his country, and reveres the memory of the honored dead, should so far forget himself as to endeavor to draw political capital from such a source as this. Why, I would as soon think of desecrating the grave of my grandmother, to despoil her of her winding sheet, as to cause the dust of those slaughtered heroes to minister to such an unholy purpose.

Mr. HOVEY. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether it is in order for the gentleman to refer to an article in a newspaper, or to read the same in debate.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Jefferson cannot proceed to read the article without leave of the Convention.

Mr. GREGG. Then I ask leave of the Convention to read the following extract from the article alluded to for the better understanding of this subject.

Leave was granted, and Mr. GREGG proceeded to read the following:

"Mr. Pettit offered a resolution, as to the expediency of a provision in the Constitution, providing for an inclosure around the Tippecanoe battle-ground; which was adopted.

I hope this measure will prevail. I passed over this battle-field a few months since, and found the fence broken down and the cattle and other animals passing over the graves of the heroes who now sleep their last sleep on that consecrated spot. Several of the old forest trees have recently been cut down; and, as there is no one to look after it, others will be destroyed. Gen. Tipton would not sell, but donated the ground to the State, on the condition that it should be inclosed, which was complied with by the erection of a temporary board fence, which has now gone to decay, and the graves and ground are open to the commons. The whigs have no more political objects to accomplish, and have left it a deserted waste. There was democratic blood shed on that battle-field, and I hope the democratic majority in the Convention will not fail to back Mr. Pettit in his laudable efforts to comply, at least, with the agreement entered into with Gen. Tipton, who is no longer living to enforce it."

Before the reading was entirely through the Chair announced that the gentleman's time was up.

Mr. GREGG. I regret that this inexorable rule prevents me from concluding the few remarks I had intended to make on this subject. I take my seat.

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 16, nays 95:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Bascom, Bracken, Butler, Chandler, Davis of Vermillion, Fisher, Gordon, Hardin, Hitt, Hovey, McClelland, Milligan, Moore, Smith of Scott, and Wiley—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Sneok, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—95.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio moved to amend the resolution by inserting the following words: "by inviting donations."

Mr. GREGG. I will accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman cannot accept the amendment. The resolution is no longer under his control.

The question being put, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOCKHART moved to amend the resolution by adding the following: "and also to inquire into the expediency of erecting a monument at the capital of the State, to the memory of the gallant volunteers who fell in Mexico."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being on the adoption of the resolutions, as amended,

Mr. OWEN. I have not risen for the purpose of saying a word in regard to the expediency or non-expediency of incorporating this matter into the Constitution; but I think, sir, that when a personal attack is made by a member of this Convention upon an individual who has not the privilege of replying, it may not be improper that some one who has that privilege should say a word in reference to it.

If there is an individual on this floor, who has realized the fable of the mountain in labor bringing forth a mouse, it is the gentleman from Jefferson. I submit to every member of this body if the whole course of that gentleman, except so far as the single question of the admission of negroes is concerned, has not consisted in a series of attacks, first upon our Stenographer, and now upon the correspondent of a newspaper.

Sir, I believe this Convention will do me the justice to say that no man is less disposed to make political capital out of such a subject as that which is now before us, than I am. Yet it will not suffer denial that there was a time when it was considered almost like a pilgrimage to Mecca to visit the battle-ground where so many of our fellow-citizens yielded up their lives in defense of their country.

The battle-ground was naturally better cared for then. Yet that spot belongs to no party; it is the battle-ground where men stood up as Americans, not as partisans; and its protection and inclosure ought to be cared for by the State.

The gentleman has seized upon this occasion to make one of his customary assaults upon the democratic party. This ebullition of feeling was elicited, it seems, by a communication which appeared in one of the newspapers. A strange matter to introduce here! Are we to spend our time in deciding the accuracy of every report of our proceedings which every days mail carries east or west, north or south, to the remotest corners of the State? We shall have a pretty task upon our hands; and may sit here till mid-summer, ere we complete it.

Let us suffer the correspondents of the press to relate matters in their own way; if for no other reason, because they have no voice here. I was early taught to believe, and have never forgot the lesson, that it is unmanly and derogatory to the character of a gentleman, to attack, under any circumstances, a defenseless man.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. This is all very irrelevant to the question before the Convention, and, sir, in my view of the matter, it is very much out of place, at a time when we are considering of the propriety of erecting, upon the battle-field of Tippecanoe, a monument to the memory of those who fell on that field. Sir, it requires no monument of marble, to perpetuate the memory of those who fought at Tippecanoe. Their monument exists in the hearts of their countrymen. You need erect no monument to the soldiers who fell upon the battle-fields of Mexico. You need rear no huge column of granite or marble. Such things perish; but the memory of brave deeds never perishes. Go to the city of Washington, and look at the monument that has been there erected to the memory of those who fell at Tripoli. See the mouldering condition in which it now is, whilst the memory of their deeds is fresh in the minds of Americans. Who is there that would fail to be convinced that they need no monument erected by human hands. Their deeds have erected for them a monument more durable than brass. Erexerunt monumentum aere perennius.

Sir, Buncombe enough has been made out of this matter. It was introduced in that spirit originally, I have no doubt, and the proposition has been renewed this morning, in the same spirit. The gentleman says we fought upon the battle-field of Tippecanoe, for freedom. That is partially true, but it would be nearer to the exact truth to say, that we fought in defense of our homes and in defense of our property. The foe that we had to contend against was the savage of the forest. Why should you erect a monument there? There are many other battle-fields besides that of Tippecanoe. The State is dotted all over with them. If we undertake to erect monuments upon fields that have been made glorious by the blood of heroes, we must look to other fields, as well as the field of Tippecanoe.

Mr. President, the suggestion that has been made is a good one, that we should call upon the people of the State of Indiana to inclose this battle-field, and to build a monument there. And, sir, they will contribute liberally for a purpose like this, whether it be in reference to the battle-field of Tippecanoe, or to any other.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I can appeal with confidence to the members of this Convention to sustain me in the assertion, that I have never, in this Convention, either directly or indirectly, referred to any subject, or made any remarks calculated to excite party feelings. Nor should I depart from my course, on this occasion, but for the remarks made by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) in censure of my friend and colleague from Jefferson (Mr. Gregg). I do not feel disposed to leave my friend under the imputation of having made a cowardly attack upon a gentleman who has not the privilege of reply. I do not arise to apologize for the remarks of Mr. Gregg; but to justify them. When a man, by the courtesy of this body, occupies a seat in this Hall, as a reporter, he is bound, as a gentleman, to pay a decent respect to the feelings of every member of this Convention; and when he can so far forget himself as to violate propriety in this respect, he deserves to be publicly rebuked for his misconduct. The member feeling himself aggrieved by the communications of a privileged reporter, is not to be driven to the necessity of redressing his grievances through the columns of the newspapers, but the custom is, publicly to notice the offensive statements, in the body of which he is a member, as has been done on this occasion. And if the offense is an aggravated one, the usual custom is to deprive the offender of the privilege of a seat as a reporter. This has been repeatedly done in Congress, and in other deliberative bodies. My colleague has not thought proper to give so much consequence to the offending reporter, in this instance, as to move his expulsion, but has contented himself with a public denunciation, on this floor, of the offensive article. Let me direct the attention of the Convention to that part of the reporter's article, to which my colleague has taken exception. It is as follows: "The whigs have no more political objects to accomplish, and have left it (the Tippecanoe battle-ground) a deserted waste. There was democratic blood shed on that battle-field, and I hope the democratic majority in this Convention will not fail to back Mr. Pettit in his laudable efforts to comply, at least, with the agreement entered into with General Tipton, who is no longer living to enforce it." The imputation is, that whatever interest the whigs may have heretofore manifested in having that battle-ground properly inclosed, was merely to make political capital out of a pretended respect for the resting-place of the heroic dead who lie buried there, and having failed to accomplish that object, they have left the battle-ground a deserted waste. Who does not know that this charge is without foundation? It has never occurred to me to inquire whether the whigs or the democrats first caused that ground to be inclosed. I doubt not it was by the united votes of both parties, and from the most patriotic motives. But I know one thing, that is, that all the branches of our State Government, for the last several years, have been in the possession of the democratic party, and that if any party is responsible for this neglect, it cannot be the whig party. The reporter calls upon the democratic majority in this body to come to the aid of Mr. Pettit; as though any person, either whig or democrat, had made any opposition to the resolution offered by Mr. Pettit. Mr. Pettit's resolution is too much in harmony with the patriotic feelings of every citizen of this State, to excite opposition in any quarter. No Honorable member of this Convention would, upon this floor, have uttered the sentiments contained in that article, or if he had done so, his remarks would have been received with manifest disapprobation by this body. But when a gentleman who, by your courtesy, occupies a seat as a reporter in this Hall, publishes to the world such sentiments—insulting, not only to the whigs of this body, but to all the whigs in the State—and he is publicly rebuked for the slander in this Hall, by a member of this body, that member is charged with the cowardice of attacking a man who has not the privilege to reply! That reporter has ample opportunity for replying. He daily uses the columns of two of the most extensively circulated papers in the State. Their columns will afford him ample opportunities for defending himself from all attacks that may be made upon him here. Let him observe that regard for the truth, which every gentleman should observe, and he will have no occasion to defend himself from another such attack, either here or elsewhere.

Mr. CARTER. I am somewhat surprised that on to-day, for almost the first time since the commencement of this session, the fire-brand of party has been thrown into this Convention.

And here let me remark, in the outset, that the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Gregg,) has been the first and last man who has made party strife in this Convention; and, sir, if party is to be the real principle of action in this Convention, the gentleman is in a miserable minority, and I certainly think that it would be prudent, on his part, to keep cool. I am a member of the party which the gentleman so strongly opposes, and the honesty of its actions, and the purity of its principles shall not be attacked in my presence, and I remain silent; while at the same time, I stand ready to denounce any man who will attempt to bring party strife into our deliberations, when, with but one or two exceptions, the name of party has been unknown. So far as the question which is more properly before us, is concerned, I will say that I can see no use in adopting any of these resolutions or amendments. They embody purely legislative matter. I would like to see monuments erected, not only to the heroes of Tippecanoe, but to those who fought in Mexico and elsewhere. Sir, I revere the memory of those who were "baptized in fire and blood," upon the heights of Monterey, and the plains of Buena Vista; I cherish, too, the memory of those who bled in the defense of our State, while we were in our cradles. Sir, as has justly been remarked, all those heroes have their monuments, not on the battle-field, or the streets of Indianapolis, but on the hearts of every citizen of the State of Indiana, and of every patriot of a grateful nation of millions of freemen. History and a nation's gratitude, are their monuments, which neither time nor the elements can destroy, which are co-existent with the idea of our nationality, and our freedom.

Why is it that such a proposition as this is sought to be made a part of the organic law of the State? Is the erection of a monument a principle to be ingrafted into a Constitution? If so, to what part of the organic law does it belong—the legislative, judiciary, or executive? I can see in it no restriction on legislation; nothing to secure the speedy execution of justice, or the faithful execution of the laws. Surely the Legislature has the power of erecting these monuments, if we should "forever hold our peace." Then what is this proposition for?

A VOICE. It is for Buncombe.

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir, it is for Buncombe and the securing of a few votes, not forgetting, however, the chance to make an attack on the Reporter of the Sentinel. In that attack, I wanted to see a fair fight, and would much prefer to have seen the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Gregg,) meet his opponent on equal terms through the columns of the newspapers, than insist on his right to speak here, where the Reporter has not the power to reply.

So far as the Reporter is concerned, I know nothing of him, except the knowledge I have gained by my stay here. I have found him a gentleman in every sense of the term; and, so far, he has said nothing that would have a tendency to produce dissension, or party feelings in this Convention. The Sentinel, as well as the Journal, have defended the Convention throughout, and I am very sorry to see any attempt to draw party lines.

I hope that these resolutions, and all similar ones, may be informally laid on the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I have not risen to debate the question, but merely to do justice to a gentleman on this floor, in reference to the subject matter of the resolution which I introduced a few days ago. I never desire to appear in borrowed clothes. It is due to a gentleman, who represents the county of Warren, to say that the idea that was embraced in the resolution that I offered was not mine, but that it originated in the head and the heart of as pure a man, and as modest a man, too, as any in this assembly. He, not being the representative of the county of Tippecanoe, and not wishing, perhaps, to take away from the representative of that county the privilege of moving in the matter, stated to me one day that he had a vivid recollection that that ground had been donated to the State upon the express condition that it should be inclosed and kept sacred to the memory of those who sleep there. The gentleman to whom I refer is Mr. Bryant. He called my attention to it in this way: He said, you are a delegate from the county of Tippecanoe, and your constituents are the more immediate guardians of that battle-ground. He then suggested that I should present a resolution upon the subject. It was at his instance that I did so. It was the promptings of his head and heart. It is a matter worthy of the gentleman, and he is worthy of the occasion. Sir, I have been informed that Gen. Tipton was applied to to know upon what terms he would surrender the property to the State; and to the application of the Governor he returned for answer that he would make it a free gift to the State, provided the State would keep it inclosed. I learned this from the gentleman from Ohio, and I am glad to see that he is now in his seat. He told me that he was the bearer of the letter to Gen. Tipton, and of the General's reply; and that his recollection was plain and vivid, that the condition upon which the transfer was made, was that of perpetual inclosure, and nothing else. I said that the committee would easily be able to find the deed of transfer, and if they found that such was the condition, good faith required—the credit of the State demanded—that we should comply with it, and that we should not trust the matter to the carelessness of the Legislature, but make it a permanent provision in the Constitution, and let it stand out to the living masses that Indiana has not been recreant to her undertakings and obligations.

Sir, I have said this much in regard to the introduction of the subject; and it was merely for the purpose of placing the credit where it properly belongs. It belongs to the gentleman from Warren, and I am willing that he shall enjoy it.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. My name having been referred to in connection with the subject of the Tippecanoe battle-ground, I esteem it a pleasure on this occasion, to state my recollection in regard to it, and to remind the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) that I told him he ought to introduce this proposition, because he was the delegate from the county, within whose limits this battle was fought; and that if he did not, I most assuredly would.

Mr. PETTIT. Upon reflection I believe the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper) did first speak about it, but I get my book evidence from the gentleman from Warren (Mr. Bryant).

Mr. PEPPER. My recollection of the circumstance connected with the inclosure of this battle-ground is this: In the year 1829, about the time when I went to reside in the Indian country, I met Gen. Tipton at Indianapolis. The General informed me that a few evenings before he left Logansport and traveled, all night in order to get to Crawfordsville, and bid for the tract of land. He declared to me then that he purposed giving the ground to the State, if it would inclose it, and take care of it. Some years afterwards, I was the bearer of a communication between Governor Noble and General Tipton, and an arrangement was agreed to, by the Governor, which was submitted to my notice. It was an entire acquiescence with the proposal of the General, providing the Legislature concurred in it. I know, sir, from frequent visits to the place, that it is now in a very dilapidated and neglected condition.

The conditions in the deed were that the ground should be kept decently inclosed. I have no idea that any member here contemplated making political capital out of the introduction of this measure. I think it is unjust to attribute any influence of this kind to members. I am sure from the conversations I have had with the gentleman from Tippecanoe and the gentleman from Warren that they had no such views; nor would I, even if such motive had been charged upon them, have allowed myself to be deterred from doing what I considered to be my duty. And as the Legislature has hitherto neglected to do its duty by fulfilling its contract, I can see no impropriety in providing for it in the Constitution.

Mr. SCOTT moved that the resolution and amendments be referred to the committee on Public institutions.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Mr. HUFF offered the following resolution: Resolved, That the Convention will now take up the orders of the day.

The resolution was adopted.

The twenty-first section of Report No. 17, making provision with reference to the filling of vacancies in office, by the Governor during the recess of the General Assembly, was then taken up and read a third time and passed.

THE VETO POWER.

The twenty-second section of Report No. 17, referring mainly to the exercise of the veto power, was then taken up and read a third time.

Mr. THORNTON moved to re-commit the section with the following instructions: strike out the word "five," in the 107th line and insert the word "three;" and at the end of the section insert the following: "But the power by this section conferred upon the executive to return a bill with his objections shall be confined to matters only involving the Constitutionality of the same."

Mr. T. said, when this subject was up on yesterday I had the misfortune not to be present, and when the vote was taken upon it I did not have the opportunity of recording my vote.

Now, sir, I am not one of those who would ask the Convention to give me permission to place my vote on the journal, unless I had attended to my duty. Circumstances, however, not within my control, obliged me to be absent on yesterday when the vote was taken upon this subject; still I will not trouble the Convention by asking this privilege. I do not feel disposed to repudiate the veto power entirely, but I must say that I entertain no great predilection in favor of that power, but look upon it as a relic of old British tyranny. I view it as a power emanating from a source for which I have no particular regard, and I think that, generally, it has been productive of more harm than good. I admit that under the old state of affairs, when there was a great deal more of local and hasty legislation than there is likely to be under our new Constitution, the exercise of the veto power has had a salutary tendency; but at the present time, when a system of general and uniform legislation is about being adopted, under the many and wholesome guards and restrictions we have or are about to interpose, around the process of future legislation. I do not see how any particular necessity for the exercise of this power can arise. I think then, sir, that this section is fraught with mischief. I understand that by it the Governor may, if he chooses so to do, pocket every bill passed within five days before the termination of the session. This is too great a power to be given to any one man. I am willing to see him have a qualified veto, and would be disposed to confer on him the right to return a bill, with his objections, provided they were confined to the constitutionality of the proposed measure, but I have great and insuperable objections to his interposing his veto upon any measure, merely upon grounds of expediency alone. I cannot but think that when any proposition has received the sanction of the immediate representatives of the people, who, coming fresh from among them, are presumed to be charged with their instructions and wishes, and enjoying their confidence, that it ought not to be outweighed or nullified by the arbitrary fiat of a single individual; and more especially when it is remembered that no law can be hereafter passed but by the vote of a majority of the members elect to the Legislature, and that confined to general subjects of legislation and gravely and formally expressed by ayes and noes, entered at length upon the journal. I believe that the exercise of the veto power, if thus guarded, might be productive of no mischievous results; but, on the contrary, might have a good effect. If we restrict the right of the Executive to withhold a bill or resolution to three days instead of five, as provided in the section under consideration it would not be so very objectionable; still it would be leaving in his hands an extraordinary power, which would be liable to great abuse.

In the Constitution of Kentucky it is provided that bills remaining in the hands of the Executive ten days, unless returned within three days of the succeeding session, shall become laws. We cannot have that advantage here, because of biennial sessions; and if the Governor pockets bills within five days preceding the end of one session, they remain there for two years. This, sir, I can never consent to, and I earnestly call upon the members of this Convention to remedy this evil before it is too late.

I know a great deal has been said about the salutary exercise of the veto power in eighteen hundred and forty. Now, sir, I do not desire to call up reminiscences of that period; I wish to act with reference to the present, and for the future to guard the exercise of this power so that it may not be used unwisely and unjustly upon posterity. Out of some thirty-one States in this Union, there are some eight or nine have omitted to adopt the principle of this section, or any veto whatever; and we find among them the old mother of States, Virginia. Without reference, however, to the action of other States, I desire to see the power rightly restricted in our own State. I was sorry to see the odious name of John Tyler invoked, by the Honorable member from Tippecanoe, when replying to my friend from Cass—a name which, when pronounced, only excites feelings of unutterable scorn and contempt from every honorable man, let him belong to whatever party he may. I trust the section will be re-committed, with the instructions I have proposed.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I hope the section may not be re-committed, with instructions as proposed by the gentleman from Floyd.

The great vice of republics, of all popular governments, is excessive legislation. This is an evil which has afflicted our State, and all the States. It has cried aloud for correction. The new Constitutions have provided various means for the prevention of hasty, injudicious, fraudulent, or unconstitutional legislation. This has been one of the great objects of constitutional reform. A single bad law may, in mere money, cost the people of the State more than many sessions of the Legislature. Dearly has this State paid for improvident legislation.

We have adopted, by a vote of this Convention, several most salutary restrictions. I trust we shall not remove any of those wise and prudent safeguards found in the old Constitution; among which, as I hold, is the modified veto power (if indeed it deserves this name) which may be exercised by the Governor. We have already voted that every bill must, in order to become a law, receive a majority of the votes of all the members of both Houses. We have voted that the names of all members voting for or against any bill, shall be entered upon the journals. We can have no more laws which nobody ever voted for. Let us now vote to retain that power which the Governor has of recalling the attention of the Legislature to oversights, or wrong acts of legislation, and of making a review, with new lights before them, necessary to the final passage of a law. This is the extent of the power, nothing more. It is a power which has been less abused to mischievous ends, than any other found in the now existing Constitution. It is a restraining power only. It is a shield, and not a sword.

The gentleman has referred to the Constitutions of other States in which this power is not found, and among others to that of Ohio. Let me remind the Convention that it is proposed to introduce this very power into the new Constitution of that State, and that the mover of the proposition in the Ohio Convention was Samson Mason, a gentleman of eminent ability as a close thinker, known to many members on this floor, and whose party predilections surely would not incline him to the measure upon party grounds.

I trust, sir, that while our elder sister is adopting this provision which she has not heretofore had, we shall not reject it, when it is commended to us by our own experience.

MR. BORDEN. I am entirely satisfied with the veto power as it exists in the present Constitution, and I do not believe that it can be modified much for the better. I am opposed to the proposition as it has been reported by the committee, because it extends the veto power too much. While there is great propriety in requiring two-thirds of each House of Congress to pass a bill over the President's veto, owing to the great extent of the United States and its diversified interests, I have thought that unless a measure could receive the sanction of the President, or if it was opposed to his opinions and yet should receive the vote of two-thirds of each House of Congress, it should not become a law. But the same rule should not apply to the States. I do not concur with those who wish to abolish the veto power entirely in our State, but wish to retain it in the modified form in which it exists in the present Constitution of the State.

Another reason why I oppose the section as reported by the committee is, that we have extended the term of the Governor to four years. Now if we allow him the veto in the manner proposed in the present section; and especially if we authorize him to take a bill he might disapprove of and hold it over, and the Constitution should not require him to return it to the Legislature, it would extend the veto power very much in our State. If the Governor was to be elected every second year, there would be a restriction upon the undue exercise of this power; for if he vetoed a bill approved of by the people, he would stand a chance of not being elected again. I think, on the whole, sir, that we ought to retain the veto power as it exists in the old Constitution.

MR. HOWE moved to amend the instructions so that they should read "strike out the present section, and insert the twenty-second section of article four, of the present Constitution."

MR. H. said, I object to the present section, sir. The section in the old Constitution upon the same subject, does not meet altogether with my acceptance, but of the two the old one I think is vastly preferable.

This section we are now considering, confers too much power upon the Governor in one particular, and in another particular not enough. It will answer very well for a season of peaceful legislation, but let times of difficulty arise, and it will not answer; and it is our duty—the duty of all true statesmen—to provide for all contingencies in the organic law. This provision of allowing the majority of the Legislature to set aside the veto of the Governor, is but a mockery of itself, if real danger to the Constitution arise. In that point of view the power of the Governor amounts to nothing; but there is one clause of the section that confers upon him almost tyrannical power, for it enables him to set aside at his will, without the responsibility of a veto, or even the expression of an opinion, the will of the people as expressed through their legislators. If a bill is sent to the Governor which does not meet his approbation, and remains in his hands by reason of the general adjournment, by what test will you determine whether the failure to return the bill is the result of want of time for its examination, or a private or Constitutional, or other objection. Morally speaking then the section is contradictory, by conferring an implied and marked tyrannical power in one particular, and conferring upon him the pageant—the mere semblance of power in another.

MR. EDMONSTON. I can see no propriety in the further continuance of this debate, after all that has been said in regard to it. I therefore call for the previous question.

The call having been seconded by the Convention, and the main question ordered to be put—the question was first taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe) to the instructions.

Upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 68, nays 44:

YEAS.—MESSRS. Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bryant, Chapman, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Foster, Frisbie, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Sims, Steele, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, and Zenor—68.

YAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hardin, Johnson, Kent, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Taylor, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, and Mr. President—44.

So the amendment to the instructions was adopted.

The question then being on the motion of the gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Thornton,) to re-commit with the instructions,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 34, nays 75:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bryant, Colfax, Maguire, Mather, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Robinson, Steele, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Walpole, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, and Zenor—34.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kinley, Lockhart, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tannehill, Taylor, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, and Mr. President—75.

So the motion to re-commit, with instructions, as amended, did not prevail.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved to re-consider the vote on the previous question, but upon a division—ayes 36, noes 40—the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question, now is, Shall the section pass?

Upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 55, nays 56:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bascom, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Carter, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Johnson, Kent, Lockhart, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tannehill, Taylor, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—55.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Frisbie, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Steele, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Walpole, Watts, Work, and Wunderlich—55.

So the section did not pass.

On motion of Mr. KELSO, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The first thing in order being the section which requires resolutions to be presented to the Governor for his signature, &c., on its third reading,

Mr. THORNTON remarked that the section containing the same provision in regard to bills, having failed upon its passage, it would be unnecessary to adopt this one. He would move, therefore, that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion requested the gentleman from Floyd to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. THORNTON withdrew the motion.

Mr. MORRISON remarked that it was not to be presumed that the Convention would omit to supply some section to take the place of that which had been rejected prescribing the manner in which bills shall be treated after having passed both Houses of the General Assembly. He thought, therefore, that instead of laying this upon the table, the Convention ought to adopt it.

Mr. KELSO. The more I reflect upon this matter, the more certain I am that the word "joint" ought to be prefixed to the word "resolution." As the section reads at present, it is, "all resolutions to which the concurrence of both Houses is necessary," &c. Now let me put a simple instance, and if it be found that we have been for three or four years past in the constant habit of violating the Constitution, it is no reason why we should place the Legislature under the necessity of doing so again. Now suppose that the two Houses of the General Assembly wish to fix the time for going into the election of an United States Senator—I ask you whether there is any necessity for submitting such a resolution to the Governor? But under this clause will it not be obligatory upon the Legislature to send up such a resolution to be signed by the Governor?

It seems to me that there can be no impropriety in saying “joint resolution.” For the purpose of testing the sense of the Convention I will move that the section be re-committed for the purpose of inserting the word “joint.”

A VOICE. Let it be inserted by common consent.

Mr. KELSO. Well, by consent, then.

The word “joint” was inserted by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOVEY. A “joint resolution” cannot be such without the concurrence of both Houses. I think that the section as now amended contains several words entirely unnecessary. I move to strike out the words: “to which the concurrence of both Houses may be necessary.”

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman’s object can only be attained by a re-commitment of the section.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the section be re-committed with instructions to strike out the latter part of the section and insert the twenty-second section of the fourth article of the old Constitution, so as to make the section include a provision in regard to the presentation of bills for the Governor’s signature, &c.

The question being taken on the motion to re-commit, it was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion inquired whether it would be in order to add anything to the section after it had been reported back?

The PRESIDENT replied that the report of the committee might be concurred in with amendments.

Mr. NEWMAN moved further to instruct the committee to amend the section by adding that the Governor shall have the privilege of signing bills (presented to him during the last five days of the session) within thirty days after the adjournment, and that he shall file such bills in the office of the Secretary of State.

Mr. NEWMAN said, that his object in offering this amendment was this: It had been doubted whether, under the old Constitution, if the Governor signed a bill in the vacation or recess of the General Assembly, it would be a law. The purpose of presenting the bills five days before the adjournment, was, that he might have time to examine them, and to determine whether he would approve and sign them, or not. But if there was not sufficient time for this purpose, before the adjournment, he proposed that he should have thirty days longer. It appeared to him that it would be well to add such a provision.

Mr. SMITH of Scott, moved to amend the instructions, so as to provide that it should require a three-fifths vote to overrule a veto, instead of a vote of a majority.

Mr. KELSO. I move that the amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. SMITH. I do not yield the floor. I wish to call attention to the change in our system that has been made by the action of the Convention. Under the system that is now proposed, a majority may pass a bill over the veto of the Governor. Of what use will it be then to require him to return a bill with his objections? It will be of no use whatever; because a majority may again pass the bill, so that the old system of log-rolling, or combinations, will not be prevented; and it will be altogether in vain for the Governor to assign his reasons against the passage of any bill.

Mr. KELSO said, it appeared to him that it would be improper to require a larger number than a majority to pass a bill that had been objected to by the Governor. If gentlemen will refer to the journals of 1846, they will find the Governor had vetoed six bills—and that five of those vetoes had been sustained by overwhelming majorities by the body which had before passed the bill, the sixth bill was passed over the veto and perhaps very properly.

Now, sir, the Legislature assembles, and they deliberate and pass measures through both Houses by a majority, consisting of 51 in one House, and 26 in the other, and they are sent to the Governor, he examines them carefully, and if he believes that they are either unconstitutional or detrimental to the interests of the State, he returns them with his objections; they then pass a review before each branch. They have the advantage of the reasons assigned by the Governor; they have the imperfections of the bill pointed out, and if after that, in the judgment of a majority of each branch, it is deemed worthy to be passed, it becomes a law. I ask you, if that is not sufficient? But the plan that is here proposed, gives power to the Governor to permit the bill to be passed, or not, just as he pleases.

Gentlemen talk about combinations. All combinations are dishonorable to some extent. But let me tell you, sir, though a man may be clothed with the chief authority in the State, it is easier to corrupt one man, than it is to corrupt an hundred. I say the danger is in putting too much power in the hands of one man. I hope that the word majority will be permitted to remain.

Mr. COLFAX said, he would like to have an expression from the Chair, as to whether this motion was in order. The only question now before the Convention, was, according to his view of the matter, upon the additional instructions, moved by the gentleman from Wayne. The motion of the gentleman from Scott, was to amend the section which has already been referred to the committee, and which was not now before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT remarked that he did not consider it the province of the Chair, under the circumstances, to decide the amendment to be out of order. A legislative body, or a Convention might adopt an amendment to instructions to a committee, although the amendment and the additional instructions might be contradictory and incongruous. The Chair had no control over it—it was a matter for the body to determine. After they had given one set of instructions, they might, if they pleased, give contradictory instructions. It was a matter for them to judge, and not for the Chair.

Mr. RITCHIEY. I would be glad to have the instructions go to the committee as moved by the gentleman from Scott; and in reply to the gentleman from St. Joseph, I would say that it appears to me that there is nothing incompatible in the two propositions.

I have always been in favor of that provision in the Constitution of the United States which gives the President the veto power. I believe, as was stated yesterday by two distinguished gentlemen on the democratic side, that the measure is conservative—that the power is a salutary one—and I am glad that the present incumbent of the Presidential Chair endorses that sentiment. And, sir, I object to the proposition as contained in the report of the committee, because it does not give the same power to the Governor to veto bills under the new Constitution that he had under the old. Under the old Constitution, a bill might pass by any number of votes, so that they were a majority of those present. Important bills were often passed by twenty or thirty votes. Well, sir, when a bill was sent to the Governor and returned with his objections, then it required a majority of all the members elected to pass it over the veto. I will venture to say that, by far the greater number of all the bills that have been returned with objections by the Governor, were passed in the first instance by less than a majority of both Houses; and if the section under consideration gave the same powers, I would be satisfied with it. Sir, the proposition of the gentleman from Scott is a remarkable one. He proposes that it shall require three-fifths of both Houses to overrule the objections of the Governor. Three-fifths would be only sixty in one House, and thirty in the other. Well, sir, I believe it is right that, when the Governor has presented his objections, it should require a larger vote to pass the bill than it did upon its previous passage. It is said that the mere statement of his objections is sufficient; but, sir, the objections of the Governor may have been known to both Houses before the passage of the bill; they may have gone against his known wishes and opinions in regard to the measure. He is bound to recommend the passage of such measures as he may think salutary, at the opening of the session; and the Legislature may adopt a directly contrary course of legislation from that recommended by him. Well, then, if you permit the Legislature to overrule the Governor's objections by the same vote by which the bill was passed, it is a perfect farce to require him to assign objections. You might as well not have any objections stated by the Governor, if you allow the bill to be passed by the same number of votes. Sir, I hope the instructions moved by the gentleman from Scott will be adopted, and that the committee will report in accordance with such instructions.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the instructions will not pass. In avoiding Scylla, we should be careful not to fall into Charybdis. Some gentlemen oppose the veto power altogether; others wish to carry it to extremes; and some are for requiring a vote of three-fifths to overrule the veto. For my own part, I think the medium is the proper course. The course that was adopted by the framers of the old Constitution is the best, and it is the one which meets my decided approbation. Now, some gentlemen who object to the veto power tell you it is the "one man power," but they forget that it is in the power of this one individual, a judge, to veto the action of two co-ordinate branches of the Government. In this case, the General Assembly may pass a law, and the Governor may veto it. The General Assembly has the power, nevertheless, to carry that law into execution by the will of a mere majority of both Houses. But, sir, a bill may pass both Houses, and it may receive the signature of the Governor; yet it may be set aside by a Circuit Judge, or by a Judge of the Supreme Court. Well, if there is an objection on one hand to giving the Governor power to veto an act of the General Assembly, when his veto comes in conflict with only one branch of the Government, how much greater power does the judge possess, when he, by his own individual will, may set aside the action of two co-ordinate branches of the Government. So much, then, for those who oppose the veto power altogether. I recollect, during the campaign of 1840, and since, the course pursued by a certain party in regard to this matter. They abandoned the State Bank, and almost entirely abandoned the idea of a Protective Tariff: but they still cling, with the tenacity of death, to that idea of theirs, that there should be no veto power. They tell us that it is aristocratic, and that they want to see everything conducted upon democratic principles.

The fact of the matter is they want to steal our thunder. [A laugh.]

Now, as I observed at the outset we ought not to go to extremes. In avoiding one extreme we should be careful not to fall into another; therefore, the medium that has been proposed by adopting the section of the old Constitution in reference to this subject ought to meet the approbation of the Convention, as it will assuredly meet the approbation of our constituents.

One word while I am up in regard to a collateral subject, because I seldom get the floor. It is said that complaints are coming up from the people because we have continued in session so long. I hear a different tale from my part of the State, brought by a member of the Legislature. The people of my county say, what you do, do well. But we have gentlemen on this floor continually presenting resolutions for adjournment, and those very gentlemen have leave of absence about every week. The gentleman from Wayne has had leave of absence three times to my certain knowledge, and it is just such men as these who are continually talking about the waste of time, while they leave to a few of us who remain at our places here all the labor.

Mr. BASCOM moved that the instructions, and the amendment to the instructions, be laid upon the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded and they were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Scott called for a division of the question.

The question being first on laying the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Scott on the table,

The yeas and nays were taken, with the following result—yeas 82, nays 29:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Aryant, Butler, Carter, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Notsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—82.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bracken, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Hardin, Hitt, Johnson, McClelland, McFarland, Milroy, Moore, Ritchey, Shoup, Smith of Scott, Taylor, Trimble, Wallace, Wiley, and Mr. President—29.

So the amendment was not laid on the table. The question then being on laying the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, on the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded and they were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 62, nays 47—as follows:

AYES.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Borden, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hovey, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, March, May, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—62.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Ballingall, Beach, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Gregg, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Howe, Johnson, Kelso, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Sims, Steele, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, and Wunderlich—47.

So the instructions were laid upon the table.

Mr. RARIDEN. I wish further to amend the instructions.

The PRESIDENT. There are no instructions pending.

Mr. RARIDEN. Then I will move additional instructions. I wish to instruct the committee to amend the section so that bills not returned by the Governor to the Legislature, during its session, shall become laws.

The whole objects of the instructions and amendments that I have moved during the last two or three days, in reference to this subject, has been to force the executive to act upon the bills presented to him before the adjournment of the Legislature. I hate skulking. I have been aiming at the pocket veto. I have no wish to impair the veto proper; what I desire is to force the Governor to exercise it in the face of the representatives of the people. Every gentleman can understand the question readily, and I hope the committee will decide upon it discreetly.

Mr. FARROW moved that the instructions be laid upon the table.

The motion was upon a division—ayes 91, nays 28, decided in the affirmative.

So the instructions were laid upon the table.

Mr. MARCH moved further to instruct the committee, to amend by providing that no new bill shall be introduced in either house of the General Assembly, within three days of the final adjournment.

Pending the question upon the adoption of these instructions,

On motion by Mr. KELSO,
The Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, DEC. 30, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. FLETCHER.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

There being no reports from committees,

The Convention resumed the consideration of the orders of the day, the pending question being the motion of the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. March,) to instruct the committee on the executive department, to which had been referred the section in relation to the veto power of the Governor, to amend the section, by adding a provision, to the effect that no new bill shall be introduced in either body of the General Assembly, within three days of the final adjournment.

The question being on the adoption of the instructions, it was, on a division, by ayes 25, noes 26, decided in the negative.

Mr. HOVEY moved a call of the Convention.

The motion was, upon a division, ayes 33, noes 35, not agreed to.

The section relating to a seal of the State, was read a third time and passed.

The section which declares that all commissions shall be in the name of the State of Indiana, &c., was read a third time and passed.

The section in relation to contested elections for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, was read a third time and passed.

The section which provides that the general elections shall be held on the second Tuesday in October, was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio moved that it be re-committed with instructions to strike out "October" and insert "August."

I desire, said Mr. PEPPER, to call the attention of the Convention to what I believe all who have any knowledge of the section of the country in which I reside, will admit to be a fact. In that region of country, which lies within twenty miles of the Ohio river, the Miami, and the Wabash, there is, and will be, at about the time designated in the section, for the holding of the elections, at least one quarter of our most intelligent and enterprising voters engaged in trade on the river. Now if it be the wish of gentlemen to deprive this portion of our fellow citizens of the privilege of exercising the right of suffrage, unless at the sacrifice of their business, they will adhere to the section as it stands. For myself, I prefer that the election should be held on the second Tuesday in August, because that will afford sufficient time to the agricultural portion of community to complete their harvest. The first Monday in August has been found to be too early. I think that the second will be better. And with respect to the accommodation of the candidates in canvassing their respective counties, I think the time that I propose will suit them very well. I think in respect to that portion of country, at least, it will be better that the election should be held on the second Tuesday in August, than in October.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. Mr. President, when I reported this section, the biennial system, which we have since adopted, was pending before the Convention, as also the tenure of office. It was thought that all offices would expire upon the adoption of the new Constitution. But these questions are now settled. Our Legislatures are to be biennial, but, according to the principle now settled, as to the tenure of office, our offices will not all expire at the same time. Consequently, I am satisfied with the action of the Convention, in striking out the word "biennially," which will leave it annually. But, sir, I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Pepper,) to recommit with instructions to strike out the word "October" and insert "August." It is well known to all farmers, that there could not be a more inconvenient day in the year, for attending elections, than the first Monday or Tuesday in August. Farmers are in the hurry of harvest, and a day lost at that time is of more consequence to them than four days in October. As to the arguments of gentlemen, that many persons in counties bordering on the Ohio river, are absent in October, I have but little to say; but this I will say, that, although a few along the Ohio river may be absent, at that season, yet this will not afford a sufficient reason for continuing our elections in August, as heretofore. Why, sir, they have forgotten that our railroads will give the interior of the State access to the Ohio river, and persons in the interior will be as likely to be absent, as those in counties bordering on the river. But, sir, all this is certainly not a sufficient reason for referring the section with the instructions proposed. I hope, therefore, the section will pass in its present shape.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I hope the section will be re-committed, with the instructions offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper). His reasons are good, and should prevail. This section was ordered to be engrossed late on last Friday evening, amidst much confusion, and at a time when the Convention was too impatient to listen to amendments. It is admitted by gentlemen who favor the section in its present form, that August is as leisure a time as any for holding annual elections, but they say that at the time candidates are canvassing for office it is a busy season, and the people cannot turn out to hear them.

It is true that July, the month generally spent in electioneering, is a busy season, but it should be resolute that we are not making a constitution for the candidates merely, but for the whole people.

The gentleman from Scott (Mr. Smith) says that the great mass of the voters can more conveniently attend the polls in October than at any time earlier in the season. In this, I think, he is mistaken. The farmers, as a general thing, are more busily engaged in the early part of October than at any time in August.

Sir, the mere time lost in going to an election is not so important as gentlemen seem to think; on the contrary, I aver, it is time well spent.

The people are too watchful of their political rights, have too deep a regard for good government and the prosperity of their country, not to be willing to spend a day in each year, at any season, and think it no waste of time. Indeed, sir, there can be but little hope for the country when the people cease to take an interest in important general elections, when they will not go to the polls except on some holiday, or at some particular time when there is "nothing else to do." There is no duty so cheerfully and universally discharged as that of voting; it is no secondary privilege, and fix the day of election when you will, those in reach of the polls will attend. And, while gentlemen are fixing election day at a season of general leisure, to accommodate those who cannot vote if there is any other duty to perform, they should be careful that they do not virtually disfranchise another portion of our citizens.

There are thirteen counties bordering on the Ohio river, and from my knowledge of the citizens who live in those counties, there will be, on the second Tuesday in October of each year, the day now fixed for holding elections, from fifteen hundred to two thousand worthy and intelligent voters necessarily absent on the river, who are always at home during the month of August and the early part of September. These men constitute a portion of our most valuable and enterprising citizens—traders, mechanics, and farmers, engaged in buying and shipping produce and other commodities, thereby furnishing a ready cash market for all the surplus of a large portion of the State. It is certainly not desirable to deprive this portion of our citizens from voting, or which is the same thing, by fixing the annual elections at a time when they, and all others engaged in these pursuits, must necessarily be absent from the State.

I can see no good reason in changing the old Constitution in this particular; it has been cheerfully acquiesced in, and the people do not now demand a change. Kentucky, in amending her Constitution, did not change the time of holding her elections. But, if we must have a change merely for the sake of change, and it can be for no other purpose, I prefer having elections earlier in the season than the second Tuesday in October, for the reason that while it can make no essential difference to those who stay at home pretty much all the time, it will be of great importance to those persons whose business, of necessity, calls them away at that particular time. I shall, therefore, vote to re-commit the section, with the instructions offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MATHER moved to amend the instructions by striking out the second Tuesday in August, and inserting the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday in November.

Mr. M. said: I have a single remark to make in reference to this matter. If the section be re-committed and amended according to the instructions which I have proposed, the general election will take place on the same day on which the Presidential election is held, and thus we shall save to the citizens of the State one day at least, once in four years.

This subject, unlike most other matters which has or will occupy the attention of this Convention, presents no great principle to guide or control our action in the premises. It is a mere question of expediency and convenience to the people; and the great mass of the people of this State being farmers, it appears to me that if we agree upon a day which will be acceptable to that portion of our citizens, we have done the best that can be done in this matter.

It may be objected that the day I have indicated is at too late a period of the year, but I think if gentlemen will look back for a few years past, and recollect the kind of weather we have had at that time of the year, they will agree with me that it has been as pleasant and agreeable weather for all purposes of this kind, as at any other period of the year. This is, to my mind, not a sufficient objection. We find in other States, even those situated in a more northern latitude, that this is the day that has been fixed for their general elections, and so far as I have known, they have never experienced any inconvenience from it.

Mr. WATTS. My views accord with those of my friend from Ohio, and I am in favor of the proposed instructions. I belong, sir, to the farming interest, and I am of the opinion that there is no time in the year that will suit that interest so well as about the second Monday in August. The farmers seldom get entirely through with their harvest by the first Monday in August. And I am inclined to think that there is no time that would suit the candidates so well as at about the close of harvest. They will then, on riding through the country, find the people collected together, and it affords them a fine opportunity to pass eulogiums upon industry, and to talk of the importance of the agricultural interest, and to tell the people how much they would like to be farmers, and all that kind of thing.

This arrangement of the time then, will be a convenience to the candidates, as well as to the people themselves. As to the time proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, I am quite satis-ded that if the election should be held at that period of the year, there would not be more than one-third of the whole strength of the popular vote brought out at the polls. A great portion of the citizens of the State would be unable to attend. I am of opinion that there is no time so suitable as when the farmers have just got through a hard summer's work. They are generally disposed then to have a kind of frolic. It is a time that will suit my portion of the State, at all events, better than any other, and I am fully persuaded that it will meet the wishes of the great majority of the people of the whole State.

Mr. OWEN. I am sorry to be obliged to differ with the gentleman from Ohio in regard to this matter. I live in what may be called, emphatically, a river county; bounded on one side by the Wabash, and on the other by the Ohio river. I have had frequent conversations in regard to this very subject, with the people of my county, and I can say that I know they are in favor of having the elections in October. The gentleman from Dearborn talks about the glorious privilege of finding the people in the harvest field. Now I have had the privilege of speaking to the people from the stump at such times. I can assure the gentleman that from the experience I have had in regard to this matter, I am convinced that you will have two men in October attending the elections, for every one that will attend in August.

Mr. KELSO. Unless my colleague—for I have the honor to represent in part the county of Ohio in connection with the county of Switzerland—unless my colleague will consent to amend his instructions so as to provide that the elections shall be holden later than the second Monday in August, I shall be compelled to vote against re-committing the section. I have talked the matter over with the people of my county, and there is not a single individual, I believe, who is not in favor of having the election holden in October; and they have as good opportunities of knowing what the interests of the people of the State are in this respect as we have. It is true there could hardly be a time selected that would suit every man, but I am convinced that it would be very inconvenient for a large portion of the citizens of the State to have the elections holden in August.

Mr. RITCHEY said he had always felt a great interest, as he supposed every member of the Convention did, in the subject of elections; and it had been his business, as a practising physician for years, to visit a great number of people throughout the county in which he resided. He had found, in the case of those who were sick, that they had manifested a great deal of interest in the elections; and, as a medical man, he could bear testimony to the impropriety of having the elections holden in August or September. It was a well known fact that in Indiana there is every year a sickly season, from July to the latter part of September, and if the elections were to be holden either in August or September, thousands of voters would be deprived of the privilege of exercising the right of suffrage; and those engaged in trade along the Ohio river, would also be prevented from attending the elections, which would not be the case if the elections were holden in October. He hoped that the motion would not prevail.

Mr. READ of Clark said he was satisfied that there was not a member of the Convention who had not made up his mind in reference to this subject. It had been talked of ever since the commencement of the session; and, indeed, it had been talked of amongst the people for years past. As far as he was concerned, he was in favor of the change proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, and as he believed that every member was prepared to vote, he would move the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Elkhart, to strike out "the second Tuesday in August" and insert "the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday in November," it was decided in the negative.

The question recurring on the re-commitment of the section, with the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, to strike out "October" and insert "August."

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered; and being taken, were—yeas 10, nays 99—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Beard, Johnson, Kinley, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, and Watts—10.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Bal-ingall, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermilion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Goote, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Har-bolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hugin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kil-gore, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Ma-thias, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—99.

So the section was not re-committed.

The question being, Shall the section pass? the rule which requires the yeas and nays to be taken was suspended, and the section was passed by consent, and referred to the committee on revision.

The Convention then resumed the consideration of the article on the subject of the militia, the pending question being on the motion to strike out all the article except so much as declares that the Legislature shall have power to organize the militia.

Mr. NAVE said that he desired an opportunity to address some remarks to the Convention in reference to the entire article, but in consequence of bad health he was not prepared to do so at this time. He would move, therefore, that it be laid upon the table for the present.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the question on the table; and, upon a division—ayes 37, noes 39—it was decided in the negative.

Mr. PEPPER, of Ohio, said that as he had the honor to be placed at the head of the committee on the militia, he was desirous of having an opportunity to say a few words in reference to the report that had been made by the committee, before it was acted upon by the Convention, especially as there seemed to be a disposition to demolish the whole system, without giving it a moments consideration. He had endeavored to get the floor for this purpose on Saturday, but having failed to do so, he wished to address a few remarks to the Convention at this time.

Mr. President, it has occurred to me, continued Mr. P., that there has been an attempt to treat the subject embraced in this report in a spirit of derision. Now, sir, I remember very well—in fact I shall never forget, the derision with which the cornstalk militia has been treated heretofore. I hope never again to see the cornstalk militia organized. But, sir, an article carefully drawn up has been presented for the consideration of this Convention, considerable time and attention has been bestowed upon it. We have had the benefit of the experience and skill of the gentleman from Carroll, (Mr. Milroy,) who has received a regular military education, and who has had more experience in actual service—he is in fact, entitled to the credit of having framed the article that has been laid before the Convention, and it had received the unanimous approbation of the committee. I had hoped, sir, and I still hope that before that article is set aside, and that too without being examined, and without any reason being assigned—I say I hope that the Convention before they summarily dispose of the article will afford an opportunity to the friends of the system to say a word in its favor.

Now I do not know but that the gentleman from Jefferson who addressed the Convention on Saturday—and he will permit me to say that the spirit of derision seemed to be manifest in his remarks—I say I do not know but that the gentleman is skilled in military affairs. He may also have received a military education; he may also be capable of instructing this Convention, and the gentlemen composing the committee. It is known to the Convention, however, that the committee is composed partly of gentlemen who were officers in the late war with Mexico.

Now, sir, if gentlemen can show that there is any provision in the article that has been reported by the committee, that is dangerous to the liberties of the country, or calculated to prevent the efficient organization of such portion of the militia of the State, as will be sufficient for the service of the country in time of war, I hope they will show it.

This system proposes two things, which I think it would be desirable that gentlemen should maturely consider. First, it proposes to require the performance of no military service in the time of peace, by any one who does not voluntarily enter into the service. And it proposes to exempt those who have conscientious scruples against bearing arms.

In the next place it proposes to organize a body of volunteers, such as have been useful and efficient in all the wars in which the country has been engaged, from the time of achieving our national independence, to the present moment. A better, a braver, a more intrepid corps of troops, have never presented themselves for service, than such as have been organized, in the several States, from among the militia, and those who voluntarily engaged in the service of the country.

Well, sir, these are the things that the plan proposed by the committee will accomplish. It will, in the next place, excuse every one who does not voluntarily enter into the military service, in time of peace, and it will enable such as are willing to volunteer, to meet together to drill, and to prepare for active and efficient service, when called on, by the country, to render such service.

Mr. President, it has been said, and I believe it has been the common sentiment of the whole country, ever since the declaration of our independence—ever since the organization of the government of the United States—that the militia of the country are the bulwark of our liberties. I hope it has not fallen into such a state of derision and contempt as is indicated by the summary and cavalier manner in which the subject is treated, and by the laughs and jeers of some members of the Convention.

Why, sir, we have, for a long time, had peaceful relations with all governments. There has been no necessity, until the late Mexican war, for organizing the militia at all; and it has consequently fallen into disuse. The want of arms, in the first place, however, was the cause why the militia was not sufficiently drilled at all times, and kept in a state of readiness for service.

Now, we have large expenditures made by the United States Government for the purpose of manufacturing arms. There are large supplies that are to be distributed in the several States every year. If the enumeration of our militia had been kept up and reported to the United States authorities, we should have secured our proportion of those arms; but such has not been the case. On the contrary, we have scarcely derived any benefit from that source. Although it is not important, in time of peace, that the organization of the militia should be very particularly attended to, or that drilling of the militia should be constantly practiced, yet it is necessary that we should be provided with the necessary implements of war, and that we should have a number of soldiers ready drilled and prepared for service, so that, together with those who volunteer their services, we should be prepared for any emergency. Well, sir, this system proposes a cheap mode of maintaining the militia force of the State, by the means of the assessors of the several counties, who are to report to the Clerk of the county, and he, in his turn, is to report to the Adjutant General. We shall thus be enabled to obtain the necessary quantity of arms. It provides, also, that a suitable place shall be provided at the seat of Government, where the arms shall be deposited and taken care of, so as to be ready for use whenever it may be necessary to use them. It imposes no expense on the country, except for these companies of volunteers that are provided for in the article, three only of which are authorized to be organized in each county. It seems to me that, if gentlemen will take the trouble to examine carefully the system that the committee has proposed, they will see an evident propriety in adopting it or something of a similar kind. I hope that gentlemen will not attempt to pull down the plan that is proposed, unless they can present a better one.

Mr. MURRAY. The history of the country shows that every few years—nay, almost every year—there are instances in the larger cities, and sometimes elsewhere, in which it becomes necessary to call military force to the aid of the civil Government; and the history of the past will probably be the history of the future. We cannot look forward and contemplate the long period for which this Constitution will probably last, without supposing that there will be outbreaks of the people which will require a resort to military force to restrain them and keep them in subjection—to put down mobs and riotous assemblages. It appears to me that the plan proposed by the committee is a very reasonable one; and, with a few amendments and alterations, I have no doubt it will furnish that protection which the country will need. And it seems to me that the miserable objection of want of arms should not have so much importance attached to it. Under the old system, there was nothing to awaken the pride of those who constituted the militia, and there was nothing of practical utility accomplished. But, sir, if volunteer companies are authorized to be formed, they will take pains to become instructed in military tactics and in discipline, such as prevail in the regular army. It seems to me that we ought to adopt some such system as this, in order that we may have at all times a reliable means of defence, and a necessary force for preserving order in the country.

Mr. STEELE said he was opposed to the amendment; and the reason why he was opposed to it was this: The Convention ought to act consistently. They had approved and passed a section constituting the Governor of Indiana the Commander-in-Chief of the troops of the State, or rather of the militia of the State; and after having passed the section conferring that honor upon the Governor, the gentleman from Jefferson, with the aid of the gentleman from Allen and the gentleman from Delaware, was for striking out all that power which it was proposed the Governor should command; and those gentlemen were endeavoring to persuade the Convention that there would be ample provision made by the Legislature in reference to the subject of the militia. The Governor, then, with his command, was to be left to the mercy of the Indiana Legislature.

Sir, continued Mr. S., why not insert both provisions in the Constitution? If you insert one, why not insert the other? If you declare that the Governor shall be Commander-in-Chief of the militia, why not insert a provision in relation to the organization of the militia? Why should you leave their organization to the Legislature? If you leave the organization to the Legislature, you may as well leave it to them to declare who shall be the commander-in-Chief. One is just as reasonable as the other.

Now, sir, I have been truly diverted by the remarks that have been made by gentlemen, especially the gentleman from Allen. I am sorry he is not in his seat. [Cries of "go on," "give it to him."] I don't like to say anything about him in his absence. ["Never mind," "give it to him, any way."] I suppose he has been called away to attend to his official duties this morning, so I will lay him over until he comes back [laughter]. But I suppose I may be permitted, at least, to speak of the views of the committee who have made this report to the Convention. It is said by gentlemen who oppose the article that has been reported—although I have heard no opposition that is very formidable—but the principal objection there seems to be that the system is a novel one. Gentlemen say that such a system was never heard of before. I think I have heard of something similar to it. If gentlemen have not entirely forgotten the history of the country, they will remember that one of the most prominent men, in the early days of the Republic—I mean Alexander Hamilton—made one of the most interesting reports that were ever made upon the subject; and to go still further back, we find that Gen. Knox made a report of a similar character, showing the expense as well as the inutility of having the whole militia of the country organized for service at the same time; and it cannot be forgotten that at a more recent period, Mr. Poinsett—in 1829, I think—made a report on the subject. The gentleman from Jefferson cannot have forgotten that report. I believe there was more Buncombe made out of it than out of any report that has ever been made before or since. The gentleman from Jefferson cannot have forgotten the manner in which it was used. Yes, sir, and I recollect perfectly well that on the occasion of the Presidential election, though I was a Harrison man and opposed to Mr. Van Buren, I took the trouble to send to the federal city and get from Mr. Smith the report of Gen. Knox, and also the report of Mr. Poinsett, in order to show the important improvements that were proposed to be made in the militia system under the administration of Mr. Van Buren, for whom I entertain the highest regard.

Now, sir, all this cannot be forgotten, yet gentlemen stand up here and pretend to say that the system reported by our committee is entirely new; that such a thing was never before heard of. I can assure gentlemen it is not. The idea of having an active and a sedentary militia is by no means a new one. It is a thing about which there has been much said in the State of Indiana. I hope the Convention will take up this report and consider it item by item. I am willing to admit that the article may be abbreviated; but as to the substance, the plan presented here is the one we ought to adopt. The Governor should be the Commander-in-Chief of the militia of the State, in the same manner as the President of the United States is the Commander-in-Chief of the army of the United States. And he must have it in his power to report upon the organization of the militia, not only for the protection of the State, but to draw the proportion of arms that properly belong to the State of Indiana. The plan proposed here, in the first place, shows you of whom the militia shall consist. And in the second place, it provides that there shall be volunteer companies organized for active service in case of emergency.

The gentleman from Jefferson finds fault with the report, because he says that he is opposed to a standing army. The report proposes no such thing. But there are some gentlemen who oppose everything except what they themselves introduce. It is provided, also, that those persons who have conscientious scruples against bearing arms, shall not be called for in time of peace. And it makes ample provision, so that the Legislature may, if the country should be involved, call their companies of active militia immediately into service.

The gentleman from Cass, the other day, spoke of there being three departments of the government, and of three classes of functionaries. By whom are these departments of the government to be protected? It is the militia who are the bulwark of the country. It is the military force of the country that protects the civil government. Now, sir, if you strike out the article, and leave it to the Legislature to act upon the subject or not, as they please, you take away the very authority that your marshals, or that your sergeant-at arms, of this Hall, may have occasion to call upon if you should be invaded by a mob. If you strike this out, where is your civil authority? How will the execution of your laws be enforced? How will your courts be protected in the administration of justice? You cannot protect them. It is morally impossible to do it without the aid of a military force. That is the great safe-guard of the nation—the great bulwark of civil liberty. I hope that gentlemen will view the matter dispassionately; that they will take it under serious advisement, and that they will make such provision as will secure a proper organization of the militia.

Mr. SHOUP moved to amend the original section, so that there should be an enumeration every five years, instead of annually of the sedentary militia.

Mr. S. said, it appears to me that an annual enumeration of the militia is unnecessary. My amendment proposes that it be made once in five years, leaving the matter entirely with the Legislature to have it taken oftener, if they think it necessary.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. My object in making the motion to strike out all after the word "year," was to prevent the consumption of time in efforts to perfect the details of the section, which duty, I considered, belonged more appropriately to the Legislature. In making this motion, I meant no disrespect to the committee who reported the section; I did not even know, at the time I made the motion, who constituted the committee. All, it appeared to me, that was necessary to be done, was to declare in the Constitution who constituted the militia of the State, and then to leave it to the wisdom of the Legislature to pass such laws as they might think proper for the enumeration and discipline of the militia. I do not think it is our duty to enter into the details proposed in this article. I confess I am not a competent judge to say whether the system presented to our consideration is a good or a bad system. I have been upon the peace list all my life, and I trust to remain there the remainder of my days. Military men are better competent to decide as to the correctness of the details in this article, than I am; but I think the proper plan for their adjustment is in the halls of legislation, rather than in this body. I trust we may be permitted to come to a vote, so as to ascertain the views of the Convention as to whether we shall now go into a discussion of all the details of this article, or whether we may not fix upon the principle and leave the details to the Legislature. If we go into the details, it will probably consume several days, whereas we can settle upon the principle in half an hour.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I am in favor, sir, of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Shoup,) as I think an annual enumeration of the militia is unnecessary, leading to an expenditure totally uncalled for. Unless, however, the original section is modified, I cannot vote for it, even with the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin. In regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) I consider that he proposes to strike out too much: if he will modify his motion so as to strike out all after the first section, I will vote for it: if he does not so modify it, I shall be compelled to vote against it, and shall endeavor, at the earliest opportunity, to offer a motion to strike out all after the first section. I fully appreciate the motives of the committee in drawing up this article, but at the same time I think it is sufficient for us to establish the principle, leaving the details for the action of the Legislature.

Mr. MAGUIRE. It has been a desideratum for some years to find out some mode of enumerating the militia, without having them actually enrolled. This section proposes to supply that omission. I appreciate the motives of the committee in reporting the section, and I would gladly support it if I believed it would answer the purpose intended. But, sir, believing that it would be a failure, and that it would cause trouble for nothing, I desire to present the reasons upon which my opinion is based.

In 1842, the Legislature of Indiana passed the following joint resolution:

"Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That the Adjutant General be, and he is hereby directed to report to the Department of War, as to the strength of the militia of this State, the number of taxable polls returned to the Auditor's office, for the year 1842."

As Adjutant General of the State at that time, I forwarded this resolution, accompanied by such explanatory remarks as seemed proper, to the Secretary of War, and received from the Adjutant General of the United States the following reply:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 12, 1843. }

SIR: Your letter of May 30, to the Secretary of War, reporting as the strength of the militia of the State of Indiana, "the number of taxable polls returned to the Auditor's office, for the year 1842," pursuant to a resolution of the General Assembly, has been referred to this office.

This report of the "taxable polls," it appears, is designed to take the place of a return of the militia of the State, required by the act of Congress, approved March 2, 1803; and I regret to inform you that the information so communicated is not what the law contemplates, as you will readily perceive by a reference to its 1st section. The statute requires the Adjutant General of the militia to make a "Return of the militia of the State to which he belongs, with their arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, to the President of the United States, on or before the first Monday in January in each year." To produce uniformity in the "returns," a printed form was prescribed by authority of the Secretary of War, according to which, the strength of the militia is required to be reported. A supply of these blanks, (as heretofore,) is herewith enclosed for your future use. You will observe that it is not the number of taxable polls which is required, but the force actually "enrolled and organized into companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions," under the act approved May 8, 1792.

The distribution of arms under the act of April 23, 1808, can only be made according to the strength of the "effective militia," as exhibited in the last annual returns received at the War Department, agreeably to law. The quota for the State of Indiana for the present year, is based on the return for 1832, (the latest received,) which gives 51,052 men, being less than half of the "taxable polls," (107,876) which you state has been returned to the Auditor's office. You may readily perceive, therefore, how much it is to the interest of the States to make the required "returns" of the effective militia, &c.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

R. JONES, Adj't Gen'l.
D. MAGUIRE, Adj't Gen'l, Indiana Militia, Indianapolis, Ind.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. President, that, whether the return be made by the county assessor every year, or every five years, it will be unavailing for the purpose contemplated. My object in producing this correspondence was simply to show to the Convention, and to the committee on the militia, what sort of return the War Department regards as necessary to secure the quota of arms to the State.

Mr. SPANN. The main object, sir, which the committee who reported the present article had in view, was only to secure to the State of Indiana the arms to which she is entitled from time to time from the General Government. It is true the first section refers to the manner of organizing the militia, and to that section I have heard no objection. The main objection seems to be to the sections from the 4th to the 8th inclusive.

To the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Shoup,) providing for an enumeration of the militia only once in five years, I have no particular objection; and such an enumeration will probably be sufficient, and I shall therefore make no opposition to it. If we do not make some provision for the organization of light companies in the State, we must abandon the idea of receiving arms from the General Government, and therefore I think this Convention should not hesitate to adopt some measures to effect that purpose. I have, sir, as much reliance upon the intelligence of the people's representatives in regard to this subject as any one can have, and I am willing to leave the mere details to the Legislature; but I would ask gentlemen to compare this article with the one in the old Constitution, and see the slight difference as regards its provisions. This is a much shorter article, and releases the people from anything like a tax upon their time and means. It merely proposes that the young men shall form themselves into light companies and equip themselves, and have certain exemptions—though that is not of much importance. I would here remark, in reference to one of the statements of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) that he admits he knows little or nothing about the subject, and yet he makes a motion to strike out the principal portion of the article. He ought at least to have some acquaintance with a subject before he undertakes so unceremoniously to dispose of it. The sweeping amendment he proposes will take away the entire article with the exception of some four or five sections, which virtually destroys the whole matter. I must object to any such proposition.

Mr. WATTS. I have had some little experience with regard to this corn-stalk militia, as some gentlemen have termed it, and therefore have no hesitancy in expressing my views in regard to it. I believe that the whole of this article, except the first portion, is legislative in its character, and therefore should not be engrafted in the Constitution.

I do not believe, sir, that anything we can put upon paper will infuse a military spirit in the breast of the citizen soldier. You may write, and talk, and act as much as you please upon the subject of the militia, but unless the country is invaded you never can engender a military spirit at home. I saw an account of one of the most efficient officers engaged in the last war, who said he never mustered his men but twice—once he mustered them into service and once out of service. When asked what he did with his men upon going into an engagement, he said he just showed his boys the enemy and turned them loose. I have seen something, sir, of these independent organizations in time of peace; they grow up like mushrooms and die away in like manner; they do not effect anything. We hardly ever see any of these independent military companies in time of war mustered into service. The army is officered and soldiered by the citizens of the country who love their country and who patriotically hasten to drive the enemy from our borders. I am in favor, sir, of retaining the first portion of the article having reference to the enumeration of the citizen soldiers of the State, so as to draw our quota of arms from the General Government, and then of leaving the details with the Legislature.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. Objection is made to the report of the committee because it is said it contains too much. This may be true, but the article in the old Constitution on this subject is much larger. There appears to be great propriety in what was said by the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Maguire,) in respect to the necessity of organizing the militia so as to draw arms from the General Government, and also as to the best mode of preserving them, and there may be also some other alterations needed in this article, and as I believe, if the article is again re-committed, that the committee will be able to report a much more perfect article. If it be in order I propose that the article be re-committed for the purpose of making such modifications as may be deemed necessary.

The article was accordingly re-committed to the military committee.

FIREMAN'S FAIR.

Mr. BADGER. Before we proceed to the consideration of any further sections I desire to ask the attention of the Convention to a subject in which I think we are all interested. I desire, sir, to have the rules suspended in order to introduce a resolution referring to our occupancy of this Hall. I am informed, sir, that this Hall is proposed to be occupied to-night and to-morrow night, for the purpose of a fair; and that our tables and the papers on them have necessarily all to be upturned and mixed up together to carry out the design I have alluded to. Now, sir, the resolution I propose to offer if I can get the rules suspended for that purpose is as follows: "That the President of this Convention authorize the Secretary to confer with the officers of State at 1 o'clock to-day to ascertain the conditions of the contract made by them with Mr. Sheets in relation to the use of this Hall, and report to the Convention this afternoon."

The rules of the Convention were accordingly suspended.

Mr. KELSO. I do not think, sir, there can be any difficulty in understanding this matter. Sometime previous to the arrangements made by the officers of State with Mr. Sheets in regard to the occupancy of this Hall by the Convention, the friends of one of the fire companies of this city (Relief No. 1,) applied to Mr. Sheets for the use of the Hall on this and to-morrow evening, for the purpose of holding a fair to raise a certain amount of money necessary to pay off a debt due for the fire engine. This fire engine is of course used for the protection of the public property of the State as well as the private property of individuals. The proposition of the friends of this company was accepted by Mr. Sheets, who informed them they could have the use of the Hall two evenings in a week at twenty-five dollars an evening. Thereupon notice was published in the papers several days in advance of our contract, that, this evening and to-morrow evening a fair would be held in this Hall, and all the members of the Convention had a full opportunity of knowing that the Hall was thus pre-engaged before they consented to the contract with Mr. Sheets. This fair has been mainly gotten up by the ladies, and the object of it I consider to be a very laudable one. I consider, sir, that it is as little as we can do to resign the Hall this afternoon and allow the ladies an opportunity of fixing up the Hall for the fair this evening; and this privilege will not be asked of us to-morrow afternoon. We can easily stow away our papers safely, and no great inconvenience can result from a temporary removal of our seats. I move now that the Convention adjourn until to-morrow morning.

At the request of several members, Mr. KELSO withdrew his motion.

Mr. BASCOM. I do hope that this Convention will not adopt the resolution just offered. If this fair is gotten up for a laudable object as the gentleman from Switzerland informs us it is—if a fire company is to be relieved by it, thereby protecting the public property of the State—if in short it is for the interest of the State of Indiana that the sum proposed to be raised by this fair should be raised, why not make application at once to the Legislature now in session for an appropriation for that object, and not come here and trouble a Convention convened solely to revise and amend the organic law of the land? Again, I would ask, if this is the only Hall that can be got for this purpose here? Are there not other spacious halls that may be procured for the purposes of this fair in this city? Say we adjourn over until to-morrow morning, there will then be a further loss of our time in waiting for the confusion in the Hall to subside, which will be necessarily attendant upon preparing it for our use. Can we, I would earnestly ask, do any good to ourselves, or those we represent, by this adjournment? Sir, I consider that the interests of my constituents are as dear to me as the interests of the citizens of Indianapolis; I shall, therefore, vote against this resolution.

Mr. BADGER. The gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom) mistakes the object of my resolution. It is this: to ascertain whether Mr. Sheets has a claim to this Hall during the evenings. If he has not retained the use of the Hall at night I maintain it is our duty to prevent this fair from taking place; whereby for the sake of securing a couple of hundred dollars for a fire company in this city, the State is to be put to an expense of several hundred dollars. I am in favor of adopting the resolution, and of having the inquiry made; and if it is our right to use the Hall during the evening I shall go for maintaining it at all hazards, and shall refuse to adjourning over as suggested.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I believe it will be wholly useless to refer this matter to the officers of the State, inasmuch as the Hall has been engaged for this and to-morrow evening. I have a paper now in my hand from the ladies who have gotten up this fair, stating the fact that they have contracted for the use of the Hall on Monday and Tuesday evenings of this week, and asking me to offer a resolution to adjourn over this afternoon until to-morrow, for the purpose of enabling them to prepare the Hall for the fair this evening.

The authority of this document I do not think any one can dispute, as it is not to be supposed that any gentleman will doubt the integrity of the ladies. I therefore move to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Badger) by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

"Resolved, That when this Convention adjourn it adjourn until Tuesday morning, in order to allow the use of this Hall on Monday afternoon and evening to the ladies, for the purposes of the fireman's fair."

Mr. KILGORE. We have heard a great deal, sir, here and elsewhere, from gentleman, in regard to the expense the State will incur by the Convention adjourning over this afternoon. Gentlemen have said that it would be more economical at once for us to appropriate three hundred dollars and pay off the debt of this company, than to adjourn over. Now, sir, I have only to say that the Convention has no power to make any such appropriation, and if they had the power, I do not think they have the will. Now, sir, it is well known that the ladies who propose to hold this Fair have had a pre-engagement of this Hall for two evenings in this week, before we entered into the contract for it with Mr. Sheets. Now, I do not insist upon their right, but I appeal to the gallantry of the members of this Convention, and ask them to give the ladies the Hall this afternoon, in order that they may prepare it for their Fair. So far as any effort on the part of the ladies is concerned to get money out of the gentlemen at the Fair, I am prepared to defend them against any charge of espionage. All they do is to invite gentlemen to visit the Fair, and purchase the articles they have for sale; if gentlemen are disposed to come and purchase, they can do so; if not, they can stay away. There is no compulsion about the matter.

Mr. LOCKHART. I am opposed to this proposition of adjourning over until to-morrow morning. I think we ought to keep on with our business; and I am, therefore, equally opposed to the resolution of inquiry offered by the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Badger). I think that, without any serious inconvenience, we can adjourn at three o'clock, or a little after, and thus we will afford the ladies full opportunity to fix up the Hall for the Fair.

Mr. RARIDEN. I think, if gentlemen will consent to forego the gratification of making a speech or two on another day, we can easily give the ladies this afternoon, and lose no time in the transaction of our business either.

Mr. MURRAY. It is well known that the ladies made a contract for this Hall for two evenings, before the contract we entered into was made; and now they simply apply to us to extend the courtesy to them which is their due. They have planned their Fair upon a large scale; and I am informed that the only other Hall in this city suitable for a Fair—Concert Hall—has too narrow a staircase to allow their tables to ascend. I think, then, by way of compromise, that we should give them this afternoon to prepare for their evening's entertainment.

Mr. WATTS. I am not like my friend from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore,) or my friend from Ohio (Mr. Pepper,) much of a ladies' man. If I am rightly informed, the State of Indiana appropriated four hundred dollars towards the purchase of this fire engine last winter. It may be considered ungallant in me to refuse to allow my constituents to contribute of their money to protect the property of the citizens of this city; but, sir, I am compelled to take this position, and, under the circumstances, shall vote against the proposition to adjourn over.

Mr. RITCHEY. If, sir, upon looking at the terms of one contract for this Hall it is found that the ladies are entitled to the use of this Hall this afternoon and evening, and to-morrow evening, I am perfectly willing to give it to them. But if the ladies have not a prior claim to the Hall, I am for continuing our sessions. I do not desire, sir, to adjourn over any day, except Sunday, until we have completed our business. I desire, for one, to have a report from the officers of State as to the terms of our contract with Mr. Sheets.

Mr. MOORE moved to lay the resolution and pending amendment upon the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 48, nays 57:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Butler, Chandler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dick, Dobson, Edmonston, Fisher, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbolt, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, March, Mather, Mathis, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Nave Newman, Ritchey, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Thomas, Trimby, Wetts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—48.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Biddle, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Elliott, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hovey, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mowrer, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, and Mr. President—57.

So the motion to lay upon the table did not prevail.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The statement made by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts,) that the State has appropriated four hundred dollars towards the purchase of this fire engine, is incorrect. The State has never paid one cent towards the purchase of it; and it is the ladies alone who are now endeavoring to pay off the remaining portion of the debt incurred in its purchase.

Mr. MAY. I wish simply to remark to those gentlemen who are opposing the giving up of this Hall to the ladies this afternoon, that it is very evident to me that they are fooling away the time of the Convention by such opposition. I have lived long enough to know that when a woman sets her heart upon a thing she will get it. It is an old saying, and a true one of woman that "When she will sho will, you may depend on't, And when she won't, she won't, and there's the end on't."

[Laughter.]

I advise gentlemen at once, without further delay, to come down from the position they occupy, for there is no hope for them. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. KELSO. I believe, Mr. President, the question is upon striking out the resolution of the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Badger,) and inserting the amendment offered as a substitute by my colleague.

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I am satisfied that there is no use in holding out any longer. I therefore move that we adjourn until Tuesday morning.

Upon this motion, the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 53, nays 57:

YEAS.—Messrs. Biddle, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Dunn, of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Elliott, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gregg, Hall, Harbolt, Hovey, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, May, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Sherrod, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, and Mr. President—53.

YAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Helmer, Hitt, Hoggins, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, March, Mathis, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Thomas, Trimble, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—57.

So the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. PRATHER. I move that the Convention adjourn until to-morrow morning at half past 8 o'clock.

Mr. COOKERLY. I am in favor of the Convention adjourning until to-morrow morning. If we come here this afternoon, we shall consume our time to no purpose; there will be a constant effort made to effect an adjournment and we had better adjourn over at once, and settle the matter.

Upon the motion of the gentleman from Jennings (Mr. Prather) the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 55, nays 60:

YEAS.—Messrs. Biddle, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cookerly, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Elliott, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gregg, Hall, Harbolt, Hawkins, Hovey, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, May, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clarke, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, and Mr. President—55.

NOES.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hoggins, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Ritchey, Schoynover, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Thomas, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—60.

So the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. BASCOM. I move that the Convention adjourn until two o'clock, this afternoon.

Mr. PRATHER moved as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Wells, that the Convention adjourn until one quarter past eight o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Read of Clarke). The question will be first taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Jennings (Mr. Prather).

Mr. BORDEN appealed from the decision of the Chair, contending that the question should be first taken on the motion to adjourn till two o'clock.

Mr. KELSO remarked that he thought it rather inconsistent, for the gentleman from Allen, after having been out until the present time, half past eleven o'clock, probably engaged in electioneering for appointment to the United States Senate, to come into the Hall and attempt to deny to the working men of the Convention the privilege of fulfilling an engagement which they were bound to carry out.

The appeal made by the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) was not acted upon.

Much confusion prevailed in the Hall.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Jennings, (Mr. Prather,) and

The yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 54, nays 54:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Blythe, Bracken, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Gordon, Haddon, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hoggins, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Ritchey, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Thomas, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—54.

NAYS.—Messrs. Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chapin, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Elliott, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Hovey, Kelso, Kilgore, Maguire, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mowrer, Murray, Niles, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, Wolfe, and Mr. President—54.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the motion of the gentleman from Wells,

Mr. GIBSON moved, as an amendment, that the Convention adjourn until eight o'clock to-morrow morning.

The question being upon the amendment of the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson),

The yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 55, nays 48 :

YEAS.—Messrs. Biddle, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Cookerly, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Elliott, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, and Mr. President—55.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Blythe, Bordon, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Lockhart, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Ritchey, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Thomas, Trimble, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—48.

So the Convention adjourned until to-morrow (Tuesday) morning, 8 o'clock.

TUESDAY, DEC. 31, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. FARROW, a Delegate.

LEASE OF MASONIC HALL.

The consideration of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Putnam, (Mr. Badger), with the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Pepper,) pending at the time of adjournment yesterday, was resumed.

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper),

Mr. SMITH of Scott. The resolution, sir, provides for an inquiry which I think ought to be made. If this Convention is to have possession of this Hall, so that it may carry on its business, I think it ought to know it; and if the Hall is to be let out from time to time, for other purposes, it is also well to know it. The terms of the contract made between the officers of State and Mr. Sheets, in regard to our occupancy of this Hall, should be clearly made known, so that we shall know what we are to depend upon, in future.

Mr. RITCHEY. If Mr. Sheets claims the privilege of letting out this Hall evenings, to whomsoever he chooses, I for one wish to know it. If we are to be deprived of the use of this Hall at the caprice of Mr. Sheets, I desire to know it, and I shall then be in favor of leaving this place, and going to Madison. If we are to be insulted for doing our duty to our constituents, in voting against any adjournment until the regular hour of adjourning, by any portion of the citizens of this place, as one of our number was, on yesterday, we should be informed of the fact, I am told that a gentleman, who voted as I did, on yesterday, against surrendering the use of this Hall, was disgraced publicly, by having his name appended to a calf's head, and the words "A candidate for the United States Senate," written under it. These things, sir, should not be done, and if the fact is ascertained, that we are to be subject to like insults in future, I myself will offer a resolution to adjourn this Convention to Madison.

Mr. SPANN. In my opinion, sir, the expression of sentiment evoked in this resolution, is entirely unnecessary. There has never a legislative assembly convened here, without something similar—motions like that offered yesterday, to adjourn, though for different objects, having been presented. But this case is one of a much stronger character, than any that is generally presented. The claim advanced on yesterday, was such as should not have been disregarded by this Convention. If Mr. Sheets conferred the right of renting, on two evenings in this week, on the persons whom he did confer it upon, it illy becomes us to contest that right, particularly when it is remembered that this engagement was made prior to the contract into which we have entered. Sir, it is beneath the dignity of this Convention, to quarrel about this matter. Yesterday we lost nearly the whole forenoon in a discussion upon this subject, when it might have been settled in a few moments, previous to the hour of adjournment at noon. This is the smallest matter in which we have yet been engaged; and it has resulted as all things do result, when there is but one true basis to go upon. If this Convention has made a bad bargain, we must abide by the consequences. I never voted to come here, and I do not think we should have done it; but this Convention has agreed to come here, and of course we should all stand by the agreement. I represent a constituency that can appreciate my votes, and therefore my action here, notwithstanding the opposition of gentlemen, will receive its just consideration at their hands. I trust that this resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. WOLFE. I hope, sir, that the resolution will be adopted. It is said by gentlemen, that this Hall was engaged, to-night and to-morrow evening, previously to the contract into which we entered with Mr. Sheets. Now, sir, if there was any such pre-engagement, we ought to have known all about it. Time is money, sir, and therefore it is foolish for gentlemen to say that this is a trifling matter. Six or seven hundred dollars, gentlemen say, is too little to talk about, and that amount, sir, we lose by adjourning over one day. Now, sir, I will put my hand in my pocket, and pay my proportion towards paying off the amount intended to be raised by this fair, rather than that we should be further disturbed in our business. Time is money, sir, and it is life; and we ought not so to act, as to uselessly expend both. If we are not willing to adopt this resolution, let us appoint a committee to find out the terms of the contract which we have entered into, in regard to this Hall, so that we may come to some satisfactory adjustment of the matter.

Mr. HAMILTON desired to express his disapprobation of the insult that had been offered to his colleague on yesterday, for doing that only which he thought to be his duty to do. Such conduct should be frowned down by the Convention, no matter by whom perpetrated. He would move the previous question.

The previous question having been seconded by the Convention, and the main question ordered to be put,

The question was first put upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Pepper,) and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the original resolution, the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 32, nays 4:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hoggins, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kiniey, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Owen, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—92.

NAYS.—Messrs. Rariden, Spann, Steele, and Thornton—4.

So the resolution was adopted.

PROTEST.

Mr. EDMONSTON presented a protest, signed by himself and several other delegates, against the action of the majority of the Convention in adjourning over from twelve o'clock on yesterday until eight o'clock this morning, alleging that it was for no other benefit than to give the members an opportunity to revel and frolic at the expense of the State.

Mr. FOSTER remarked that, in his opinion, this protest was not couched in respectful language to the majority of the Convention, and therefore it should not be entered upon the journal. And he would further observe, that it came with a very ill grace from members who had been in the habit of absenting themselves from the sittings of the Convention. It appeared to him somewhat ungracious, to say the least, that gentlemen who, like the member from Dubois and the gentleman from Johnson, were in the habit of going home and staying for days, should come forward and undertake to blame the hard-working members of the Convention for adjourning over a half a day. He viewed a protest of this kind in no other light than a protest for buncombe. He had not been in the Hall in the evening as a visit; he had devoted the spare time to study; and this fact he could prove, if it were necessary. He did not wish to occupy the time of the Convention further upon the subject, but desired that the yeas and nays might be taken upon the question of the reception of the protest, as he did not wish it to appear upon the journal. He did not know exactly what was parliamentary usage with reference to a protest of this kind, he would therefore appeal to the Chair for information.

The PRESIDENT stated that individual members had a right to protest against the action of a majority, still they were bound to couch that protest in respectful language, so as not to place the majority in a false position. If members considered they were placed in a false light, they had a right to make a motion to reject the protest.

Mr. BORDEN desired to make a brief explanation in regard to his absence from the Hall a short time yesterday morning. The gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) on yesterday had called the attention of the Convention to his being absent, charging him with spending his time in electioneering for the office of United States Senator. Now he had only to say in reply, that what he had done on yesterday was simply what he considered to be his duty to do. He had went, on yesterday morning, to the Hall of the House of Representatives, not with a view of electioneering but at the request of the Auditor of State, who desired him to swear in the members, the judge who was expected to swear them in, not having arrived. He had discharged the duty, which the Auditor had the right to demand at his hands, and should do it again if requested.

He had only one remark further to make, and that was this: in opposing the motion to yield the occupancy of the Hall, he had only done what he thought his duty to his constituents required him to do, and no threats, insults, or abuse, could or would debar him from the performance of what he considered to be his duty.

Mr. EDMONSTON remarked that he was sorry to see the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) take the position he had in regard to this protest. He could not but think, however, that a tender point was touched by it, otherwise so much complaint would not have been made in regard to it. The adjournment was evidently affording an opportunity for members to enjoy themselves as they pleased; those who were opposed to wasting time in that manner could, of course, refrain from fun and frolic, but the natural inference was if members voted for the adjournment that they were in favor of spending one-half of the day in amusement. Against such a course of procedure he must protest, in behalf of the constituency he represented. If it had been left with his constituency to settle the hubbub that had occurred on yesterday, and to have dispersed the mob that for a season occupied the Hall, they would have very soon sent them to their homes, to attend to their home duties. The majority, at first, was opposed to adjourning at the public expense, and he would inquire if the minority were to hang on to the majority and worry them into acquiescence and not expect to reap the benefit of their misconduct at the hands of the people? If this was the way the Convention was to proceed, he hoped to God the people would be informed of it.

Forty, and even fifty thousand dollars, would not liquidate the expenses of this Convention, and he would ask where this money was to come from? From the toiling masses, of course. The farmer at his plough, and his wife and children at the loom; the mechanic in his workshop and the trader in his store, all had to bear their proportion of the expense they were incurring; and was it just, was it honest, to increase that expense unnecessarily? It was not; and so long as God gave him health and strength he should declare the truth to the people and his constituents, without fear of reproach from any gentleman there or elsewhere.

Mr. COOKERLY said he had a word or two to say on this subject. He objected to the language of the protest, because it was not couched in becoming or gentlemanly language. And who, he would inquire, was the gentleman who got up and talked about his patriotism, his great love for the people, and great contempt for mobs, and love of order? He would have gentlemen look back for a few days, and bear in mind the conduct of the gentleman from Dubois, (Mr. Edmonston,) and see whether he had ever been concerned in a mob, as the gentleman termed it. Perhaps the gentleman had forgotten his action as a leader of a mob who endeavored to thwart the will of a majority of this Convention, who desired to sit on Christmas day. But times had changed now. He loved the dear people! He loved their treasury! He had opposed the motion to adjourn on yesterday, and characterized the proceedings of a majority as those of a mob, when only a few days since he had been the leader of a mob upon the question of adjourning over Christmas day. And he was not satisfied then with creating a disturbance in the Convention upon the subject, but he crawled up sneakingly into the gallery of their former place of meeting and threw a chair down, in order to create confusion in the Convention while the motion was pending to adjourn over, so as to have it carried. He (Mr. C.) would appeal to the members of the Convention, and to the free-men of Indiana, if such buncombe speeches and such a buncombe protest did not come with a bad grace from the gentleman from Dubois, in view of the course he had hitherto pursued in regard to the adjournment over Christmas.

Mr. EDMONSTON inquired what the gentleman from Vigo was doing at that time?

Mr. COOKERLY replied that he was in his place, orderly, and desirous of going on with their business. The gentleman from Dubois had been mainly instrumental in causing a loss to the State by adjourning over Christmas day of some six hundred dollars; and now he came forward to oppose a justifiable expenditure of some two hundred and fifty dollars. In the protest which he (Mr. E.) had presented, he would not come out openly, and declare that the members had wasted their time in frolicking on yesterday afternoon; but couched its language in so artful a manner, as that the inference would be unmistakable. He Mr. C. desired that the facts should go to the people, in connection with all this protest, and he did not fear the result. How did the matter stand? The ladies who had gotten up this fair, had entered into a contract with Mr. Sheets for the Hall before the Convention had contracted with that gentleman, and yet they had generously come to them and said if you will adjourn and give us this Hall a half a day in order to prepare for our evenings entertainment, we will be content, we will ask no further delay of your business on our account. Was not this action proper and just on the part of the Convention—that of adjourning half a day only? He would ask the gentleman from Dubois, and those who voted with him, what the Convention would have gained by it if they had assembled here on yesterday afternoon—whether there was the slightest prospect of anything being done, if they had assembled together?

Mr. EDMONSTON said if the people had sent up a set of delegates determined to do nothing, or who could not do any thing, it was time that they knew it.

Mr. COOKERLY stated it was time also that the people should know that there were delegates here continually running home, and at the same time pocketing their three dollars a day, like the gentleman from Dubois. And again laying aside all ideas of justice and liberality, how could they as men having hearts refuse the trifling boon asked of them when surrounded by the fairer, better part of creation. [Laughter and applause.]

He hoped that this protest would be rejected as it was not true or respectful in its relation of facts. He would not have objected to it if it had simply set forth that it considered the action of the majority wrong, and had stated facts as they really were, but he must object to its present recital.

Mr. OWEN. We have much business before us; and I am sure there is not a gentleman on this floor who does not desire to see it speedily and faithfully performed. But it is sufficiently evident, that if bad feelings are engendered between members, it will be neither well done nor quickly done. If there be, therefore, one matter in regard to which we ought to be guarded, it is that no personal feelings of hostility should be encouraged or permitted among us. But if crimination and recrimination are indulged, what but feelings of personal and perhaps of settled enmity are the natural result?

If it be not the intention of the gentlemen, who now seek to have this protest spread upon the journal to impute to the majority, in regard to their action yesterday, evil motive and wilful neglect of duty; such at least, is the inference that will inevitably be drawn from their language.

Private judgement is the right of every man. But a minority has no right, under color of protest, to assume, on the journal a state of facts, injurious by their inference to the character of the majority, while no opportunity is afforded the majority either to explain or to justify. To suffer this would be to establish a precedent unjust in itself, and mischievous in the consequences likely to follow it.

I must vote, then, against the protest, if it be pressed in its present form. Let its signers protest if they see fit, against all adjournments. Let them declare, that in their opinion, every single day during the holiday season—Christmas and New-years-day included—ought to have been occupied, from morning to night in session. They are welcome to do this, for me, I do not indeed see the propriety of protesting in any such case. Some relaxation during this period of holidays is customary. The people all over the land take it. Nor do I believe that in the end, it retards business. The attempt to break in on such a custom often does more harm than good. Witness the scene on Christmas morning, not very reputable certainly, affording proof sufficient that it is idle to combat in a public body, a state of feeling demanding a customary holiday. I feel that I have labored here, day by day, (not going home as some of the gentlemen did,) as assiduously as any one whose name stands to that protest. And personally I care nothing at all, whether or not we sit every day through the entire holidays. It suits me quite as well to work here as to be elsewhere. What I do object to is, that time should be consumed and ill blood engendered by a charge of dereliction of duty not merited; and by a protest disrespectful in its terms, unparliamentary in its imputation of motive; and which, unless its authors consent to erase the expressions offensive to the majority, I shall certainly vote to reject.

Mr. MURRAY said that he had voted with the majority on yesterday for an adjournment on principle. There was, sir, continued Mr. M., an obligation resting upon the Convention, arising from the pre-engagement of this hall by the ladies, which as a matter of justice and of courtesy demanded that we should give them the hall on yesterday afternoon. If we had went on with our regular business until noon on yesterday, and then adjourned over, we would have saved nearly half a day which was consumed in unnecessary discussion of this subject. I was surprised to see those who claimed to be the conservators of time, engaged in protracting the debate when it was evident that the result would not be affected and that the Convention would adjourn over. I move, sir, that the protest be rejected.

Mr. RITCHIE. I am one of the signers of this protest. I signed it without reading it over very carefully, and if it conveys an unmerited rebuke upon all those who voted in favor of adjournment, it goes further than I intended. I am willing to say just what the protest said in regard to some gentlemen on this floor, and I am not afraid to say the same here or elsewhere, personally to their faces. I know there were gentlemen who voted from pure and honorable motives for adjournment. Many gentlemen, no doubt, worked themselves up into such a state of feeling that they thought it was the wiser course to pursue to adjourn; others, however, voted to adjourn, from no such motives. I was sorry to see cause for this opinion, especially, in the action of the gentleman from Switzerland, who was not particularly guarded in his allusions to the action of gentlemen who saw fit to oppose the motion to adjourn.

The gentleman from Monroe says that I have enjoyed holidays at home, when he, and others have been here constantly at work. Now, sir, the brief period that I was absent I was with my family, and I am a little surprised that any gentleman, that has so much gallantry as to vote for adjourning the Convention, at an expense of six hundred dollars, in order to give time for amusement, has not been gallant enough in twelve long weeks to go home and see his wife, although she lives only about forty miles distant. I have a beautiful young wife who lives only twenty miles distant, and I think I might well be charged with a want of gallantry did I not go home and see her occasionally. [Laughter and applause.] And I would simply remark to this Convention, that I regard that lovely wife above all the other ladies of Indianapolis. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

I prefer, sir, that this protest should be so corrected as to strike out the language that is offensive to a certain number of gentlemen who voted for adjournment. I hope then, sir, that this will be the end of the matter, and it will not be made a bone of contention any further.

Mr. KELSO. I feel bound, sir, to say a few words inasmuch as I have been basely misrepresented; yet I would make that charge as modestly as I well can, and therefore, I will say that I have been grossly misrepresented, perhaps, inadvertently. [Laughter.] Now, sir, for what I have said on this subject, I am responsible here and elsewhere. What I said, I said purposely, and for this reason. When my friend from Allen (Mr. Borden) got up on yesterday apparently somewhat excited. I do not blame him at all—as the State was about to lose a half a day of our services, the gentleman's of course, included.—

Mr. BORDEN. It was upon the point of order that I was excited, not on the subject of adjournment.

Mr. KELSO. I simply stated that the gentleman was somewhat excited. He probably got word in the House of Representatives as to what was going on here, and immediately hastening to the hall, he reached his seat a little tired, and, perhaps panting. [Laughter.] Well, sir, the gentleman from Allen spoke, to his appeal from the decision of the Chair, and gentlemen listened to him very quietly, but when I got up to make a brief statement with regard to the action of the gentleman, a shout of question and order went up from different parts of the hall—but I mildly rebuked it by saying that I would speak to that portion of the Convention who were disposed to be civil, and those who had neither sense nor manners, could continue to cry out question.

Mr. K., here proceeded at some length to speak in support of the action of the majority of the Convention in adjourning over on yesterday, but as the same arguments were advanced in a previous speech he made upon this question, the reporter has not deemed it necessary to insert them. He concluded with hoping that the protest would be rejected, as it was couched in language at once direspectful and untrue, so far as the action of the majority of the Convention was concerned.

Mr. GORDEN. I rise only to express the hope that the gentleman who introduced this protest will withdraw it for the present, so as to erase the offensive words it contains. If this is done, I will subscribe my name most cheerfully to the protest. Unless this is done, I shall be under the necessity of voting to reject it.

Mr. EDMONSTON. If I were to consent to strike out all the offensive language in this protest I should have to strike out the protest entirely, as I have no doubt that every portion of it is offensive to some members. Gentlemen may draw what inference they please from the language of the protest; but that language expresses but the truth. I prefer taking a vote on the protest just as it is, and the majority can vote it down if they choose. I desire to place myself right upon the record, and I will risk the consequences of such action. In case the Convention refuse to receive the protest I pledge myself to carry the matter to the country.

Mr. STEELE said he would ask the gentleman from Dubois whether from his personal knowledge of his action here and elsewhere, he could charge him with indulging in frolic and revelry; but on the contrary, whether he had not always been seen at his post endeavoring to do his whole duty as a representative of the people, and voting in accordance with his best judgment upon the subjects under consideration. He had voted on yesterday for adjournment because he believed it was due to the ladies who had applied for the Hall in order to carry out an engagement which they had made for its occupancy previous to the contract made by the Convention. It was a simple matter of justice that they should give the ladies an opportunity of fixing up the Hall; and even at his advanced age he felt bound to say that when justice and beauty presented a petition for so trifling a boon as had been asked of the Convention, he for one, would not reject it. [Applause.]

Mr. SHOUP called for the previous question.

The call having been seconded by the Convention,

The main question was ordered to be put.

The question being, Shall the protest be rejected.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 72, nays 39.

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Balingall, Beach, Biddle, Bourne, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Conduit, Cookerly, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hovey, Howe, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Maguire, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, and Mr. President—72.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beard, Bicknell, Borden, Butler, Chandler, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Edmonston, Fisher, Gootee, Haddon, Hardin, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Johnson, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, Moore, Morgan, Newman, Ritchey, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Thomas, Trimble, Watts, Wolfe, Work, and Wunderlich—90.

So the protest was rejected.

HOLDING OF OFFICES.

Mr. DOBSON from the committee on salaries, compensation, and tenure of office, reported the first section of report No. 15, which had been re-committed with instructions, and amended so as to read:

"That no person shall hold more than one lucrative office at the same time, except as in this Constitution expressly permitted: Provided, That counties casting less than one thousand votes may confer the offices of Clerk, Recorder, and Auditor, or any two of said offices upon one person: Provided, however, That the office of Postmaster, where the compensation does not exceed ninety dollars per annum, shall not be deemed lucrative."

Mr. BASCOM moved to re-commit said section with instructions to strike out the words "casting one thousand votes," and inserting the words "containing one thousand polls."

Mr. FARROW moved a call of the previous question.

The call was seconded by the Convention, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question then being, Shall the section be re-committed with the instructions offered by the gentleman from Wells.

It was decided in the affirmative.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The section providing that no laws shall be passed restraining the free interchange of thoughts and opinions, or restricting the right to speak, &c.; the section declaring that in all prosecutions for libel, the truth of the matters alleged to be libellous, may be given in justification; and the section requiring that all courts shall be open, and every person, for injury done him in his person, or reputation, shall have remedy by due course of law; were severally ordered to be engrossed.

The fourth section was read a second time, as follows:

"No person arrested or confined in jail, shall be treated with unnecessary rigor. No person shall be put on trial on any criminal charge, without public opportunity first had, to offer rebutting testimony, and repel the charge in its inception."

Mr. LOCKHART moved to amend by striking out all after the word "rigor," and inserting

"no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and all offenses the punishment of which is by fine or imprisonment in the county jail, or imprisonment in the county jail alone, shall be prosecuted in such manner as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. GORDON rose and said: This question was discussed at length in the earlier part of the session, when the resolution of the gentleman from Tippecanoe was under consideration; and it is presumable that the members are now ready to vote on it without farther delay. This, but especially the protracted length of our session, admonishes me, as it ought every member, to be brief in the remarks that I may make.

As this section, as it comes from the hands of the committee, dispenses with the use of the Grand Jury, it appears to me that a due regard for the wishes of a majority of our constituents, requires that the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Vanderburgh, should be adopted. The idea of abolishing the Grand Jury is new to the greater portion of the people of our State; too new, I fear, to justify us in incorporating a section like this in the Constitution. I apprehend that, had those who voted in favor of calling this Convention to amend the Constitution, been requested to state their reasons for so doing, but a small portion of them would have mentioned the abolition of the Grand Jury as one of their reasons. There were some amendments that the people were desirous of seeing made to the old Constitution, but there is reason to fear that we may make such radical changes in it, that they will have as much objection to the amended as to the old Constitution. I think that, if we would act wisely, we would proceed to make only such amendments as the people contemplated would be made, when they voted for the calling of this Convention; and not protract our session by discussing questions that were not then agitated, or at most, were thought of but by few. Already have the murmurings of our citizens from the most remote parts of our State, like the mutterings of the distant, but steadily approaching tempest, reached our ears, warning us to seek our political safety, by a speedy adjournment.

Gentlemen may descant upon the odiousness of some of the features of the old Constitution; still, I think it would be well for our action not to precede public sentiment. It will be time to make a radical change in our organic law, when the people have determined that such a change ought to be made. All great changes in governments, that have been beneficial, have been made after the public mind has been prepared for them. Our citizens did not expect this change to be made, when they voted for the amendment of the Constitution. The amendments they desired to be made were few. They were satisfied with the old Constitution in the main. They considered it an excellent Constitution, and in this they were correct; for, to its excellence the uniform prosperity of our State since its adoption, bears ample testimony. For thirty-four years have the people of Indiana lived under it, in the full enjoyment of their liberties; each citizen pursuing the road pointed out by his own fancy, to wealth and to happiness. The population of our State in the mean time, has increased, from comparatively a few thousands to one million of souls. Wealth and improvements have kept pace with our population. Large portions of our State that were then uninhabited, except by the Indian, have since been settled. The forests have been cut down, and the wilderness has become the abode of civilized men. Where then were only the wigwag of the Indian or the lair of the wild beast, flourishing towns and villages now present themselves to our view; bearing silent but conclusive testimony to the energy and enterprise of the citizens of Indiana, and to the excellence of the government under which they live.

In changing, then, the Constitution under which our State has advanced from a thinly populated territory to the prominent position she now occupies among the States of this Union, care should be taken that the innovation be not greater than we have reason to believe can, with safety, be made. No provision should be incorporated in the new Constitution that might possibly have an injurious effect, or even the effect of which may be doubtful. The people wish no untried experiments to be made. They wish nothing to be incorporated in the Constitution that might possibly retard the upward march of our State, to that prominent position which, by proper management, she is destined at no very distant day, to assume among her sister States. With a mild climate; with a fertile soil; with expansive prairies; and forests of excellent timber; with a surface well adapted to the construction of the different kinds of public works; with numerous manufacturing facilities; with a population, too, whose intelligence and enterprising spirit will favorably compare with the intelligence and the enterprise of the citizens of the surrounding States. If possessing these elements of future greatness, Indiana should fail to meet the just expectations of her friends, the cause can only be sought for in her Constitution and laws.

Then I hope that each member of this Convention, in the amendments that he may favor, may be actuated by an innovating spirit, not simply for the sake of innovation, but only from a conviction that such amendments will advance the best interests of the State, and will meet with the approbation of a majority of our fellow citizens.

In amending this Constitution, we should constantly bear in mind that more than fifty thousand voters of Indiana cast their votes against the calling of this Convention, and consequently, in favor of the old Constitution as it is; and should govern ourselves accordingly. Not that we should (as some of the members appear to think we ought to do) recommend the old Constitution back to the people, after a majority of the voters of our State have decided in favor of amendment, and have sent us here for that purpose; but I only request that in amending it, some little regard, at least, should be paid by us, to the wishes of so large a portion of our fellow citizens.

From the observations that I have made, I am led to believe that even the majority of those who voted for the calling of this Convention, do not desire many alterations to be made to the old Constitution, and I know that thousands of our citizens wish none. Under such a state of facts, it seems to me the proper course to be pursued, in order to avoid the danger of the Constitution that we may submit to the people for their adoption, being rejected by them, is to make only such amendments as we have reason to believe the people will approve.

Mr. President, I am under the impression that the majority of the voters of our State do not favor the abolition of the Grand Jury, and I believe that to incorporate a clause in the Constitution, abolishing it, will not meet with their approbation. It is an institution that American citizens have ever regarded in a favorable light. It has existed in our country from the days of the Puritan fathers down to the present moment. The people have never discovered it to be that destroyer of reputation, that enemy of innocence, that adversary of liberty, that engine of evil, which gentlemen would have us to believe it to be. Strange that such should be its real character, and the American people live so long in total ignorance of it! So far from considering it the adversary of liberty, they have thought it so important to the protection of the rights of the private citizen as to require a place in the Constitution of the United States. And as that Constitution, as originally adopted, did not extend to the citizen this protection, it was afterwards so amended that no person should be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except as therein provided. I shall not contend that this provision in the Constitution of the United States, interferes with the rights of this State, to proceed against offenders within her jurisdiction in any manner she may see proper; but I do think that, as it has been thought proper to interpose the Grand Jury between the General Government and its citizens, the same barrier ought to be placed between the State government and her citizens.

Without attempting to give an account of the origin or original design of the Grand Jury, I would merely ask those gentlemen who have alleged that it was an engine of oppression in the hands of the king, if the great cause of complaint against the court of the Star Chamber, was not that its proceedings were conducted without the intervention of a jury? and that when an attack was made by the prince, on the rights of the subject, was not this court preferred on this account? It was principally because its proceedings were conducted without the interposition of a jury that its existence was considered dangerous to the liberties of Englishmen, and it was therefore abolished; not, however, without great reluctance on the part of the king; but juries, whether grand or petit, have ever been considered a barrier between the prince and the liberties of the subject.

The opponents of this system have somewhat the advantage of its friends. They can show us the faults of the system, as they have developed themselves in its operations; and what human institution is there that has not some faults? These they take good care to parade before us in their worst aspects; but we cannot so readily expose to view the evils that would result were their notions adopted, from the fact that we have not yet experienced them.

Gentlemen have been very eloquent in denouncing the Grand Jury, and in urging its abolition; but the amount of their objections, if I mistake not, may be summed up in a few words. They say they object to it, because it had its origin in a barbarous age; because it has come down to us through many generations from a British ancestry; because its proceedings are secret; because they are ex parte; because the system is expensive.

I shall not attempt, Mr. President, to reply at any length to the objections that have been made to the Grand Jury system, as these objections have already been ably answered, but shall content myself with making only a passing remark. The fact of its having a British origin, I think, is not calculated to cast odium upon the system. I presume that were the majority of this Convention to trace back their genealogy but for a few generations, they would find that their ancestors were citizens of the same country where the Grand Jury system originated; yet we boast much of our origin. Then I see not why we should condemn this system simply on account of its origin. It appears to give some gentlemen great satisfaction to speak disparagingly of everything English. But let gentlemen talk as they may about England, and about English laws, we are, notwithstanding, indebted to her for many things. It is the fact of our being the descendants of Englishmen that gives us our present importance as a people. Had this country been colonized by any other than the Anglo-Saxon race, the history of an American Republic would never have been written. Had any other than English blood flowed in the veins of our Revolutionary ancestors, the chivalric deeds of '76 would never have been recorded. It was from England that our ancestors inherited that enterprising character which distinguishes the American people. It was from England that our ancestors brought their notions of human rights, and it was in England that our favorite tree of liberty germinated. And although the tender plant long languished under the influences of the unwholesome political atmosphere that surrounded it, yet, when transplanted in the more genial climate of America, it grew up and shot forth its branches around on every side, so that millions now repose in peace and quietude beneath its shade. I must hear a weightier objection to the Grand Jury system than its British origin, before I can vote to abolish it.

To its antiquity, Mr. President, I find no objection. I have been taught to treat old age with respect, and to regard it as honorable. Nor is this the only feature in our civil polity that has come down to us from former ages. We all vie with each other in our professions of attachment to democracy and republicanism, yet there were democracies and republics many ages before the institution of Grand Juries. There once existed among the States of Greece something like our own federal system, but no one objects to our admirable system of government on that account. Neither is the Grand Jury system objectionable on account of its antiquity.

Some gentlemen object to the secrecy of its proceedings, and to the fact of its being an ex parte tribunal; others again seem to think these features are the beauty of the system. Where learned doctors disagree, I shall not venture an opinion.

That the Grand Jury system is expensive, Mr. President, I admit—probably more expensive than it ought to be—but I believe this expense can be somewhat reduced by reducing the number of offenses of which the Grand Jury shall take notice. Let the smaller offenses that now go before the Grand Jury be tried and punished by justices of the peace. As the greater portion of the time of the Grand Jury is now occupied with these petty offenses, if they are turned over to justices of the peace, the objection on the score of expensiveness will be in a great degree removed. Still, to maintain good order in a community, the community must incur expense. Violations of the law will occur, and the offenders must be brought to punishment. Much, no doubt, depend on the manner of dealing with criminals, yet the peace and harmony of a community depends more on its moral sense than on its method of administering justice.

It has also been said that the Grand Jury is an engine by means of which men vent their malice upon each other. I believe that many an informer is actuated only by malicious motives. I think, however, that a sufficient check can be given to malicious prosecutions by making the informer liable for the costs, where the judge will certify that there were no grounds for the prosecution.

The reason that so large a portion of the indictments fail on the trial is owing chiefly to the inexperience of the prosecuting attorneys, and not to any fault of the Grand Jury; yet this is urged as a principal reason for abolishing it. By inducing the more experienced lawyers to act as prosecutors, this objection may be obviated.

Thus I believe the most objectionable features of the Grand Jury system may be removed. Probably it cannot be so modified as to be entirely unobjectionable. Neither do I believe that anything can be substituted in its stead that will be faultless.

Our object is to bring to light crimes that are committed, and to punish the offenders, in order that others may thereby be terrified from committing the like offenses. I am not particular by what means this object shall be attained. If it cannot be so well accomplished by means of the Grand Jury as by some other method, I would prefer that other method, whatever it may be. I am persuaded, however, that some of the objections raised to the Grand Jury system will apply with equal force to the plan proposed. However this may be, the fact that the public mind, as I believe, is not at present prepared for this change, is a sufficient reason to induce me to vote against a change. Within a few years past, Conventions have assembled in a number of the States to form State Constitutions, and in all the new Constitutions that I have seen, the Grand Jury system has been retained. From this fact I would infer that Grand Juries are not regarded as much of an evil in those States. Neither do I believe the majority of the people of our own State look upon them as much of a nuisance. All that is required for it to give general satisfaction is an improvement of the system. If, however, I thought the people desired its abolition, I should not oppose their wish; but as I think they do not, I shall oppose an alteration of the old Constitution in this respect. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Vanderburgh is, I believe, in the language of the Constitution of the United States; I prefer the language of our old Constitution, but am not very particular—either will suit me.

Mr. BASCOM. I desire, Mr. President, as I before remarked, to reflect the will of my constituents on this subject. I have written to my constituents to get their views in regard to this proposition of abolishing the Grand Jury. In return I have received numerous communications, public and private, in a variety of ways, and I have also obtained the opinion of the press in regard to the subject, and from the best information I can get a decided majority of those I represent are in favor of abolishing the Grand Jury system. My action upon the subject, therefore, will be governed accordingly. In my county the Grand Jury has been divested of a great portion of its power with reference to the trial of minor offenses, and so satisfactory has been the result of this change that the people now desire that the system be abolished altogether.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved to strike out the amendment, and insert:

"No person arrested or confined in jail shall be treated with unnecessary rigor, or be put to answer any criminal charge, but by presentment, indictment, or impeachment."

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. Is it in order, Mr. President, to perfect the original section?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order to perfect that portion which it is proposed to strike out.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. Then I move to strike out all after the word "be," on the second line, and insert the words "held to answer to any criminal charge except in such manner as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. KENT said:

Mr. PRESIDENT—It matters not to me, whether the Grand Jury had its origin one thousand years ago, in the monarchy of England, or at the formation of our system of government. If it is a wise institution, one that will secure to the citizen and the country the greatest good, with the least evil, it should be continued, though its origin dates no further back than yesterday; but if it is a bad one, it should be discontinued, though it had its existence in the remotest ages of antiquity.

Our admiration of long established customs, and veneration of the memory of the great and good of past generations, should not weaken the force of that great truth in human action, that all "great revolutions of principles, and all great reforms, work from below, upward." Nor on the other hand, should the love of change be so great, as to disqualify us for a just appreciation of those measures of governmental policy, ordained by the fathers of the republic. But, while we should ever cherish, in grateful recollection, the men and the deeds of this most eventful period in the history of mankind, we should not forget that truthful maxim, that to err is human. We should remember, too, that however much we may admire this beautiful and nicely adjusted political organization, its builders were not infallible; and that time, and the progressive spirit, and searching intellectual energy of the age, demand great changes in the policy of governments. Nor need gentlemen apprehend, that because they advocate this measure of reform in our judicial system, they subject themselves to the just imputation of a want of proper regard to the framers of the American Constitution; for the chief excellence and undying fame of the fathers of this republic, consists mainly in their being the greatest and wisest revolutionists, the world ever witnessed.

Where! let me ask, in this world renowned republic, has the unfettered spirit of progress, in forming and re-forming State constitutions, been productive of evil? Was it in the determined and successful resistance that the honest, but mistaken few encountered in the early history of the nation, when they questioned the capacity of the people for all the purposes of self-government? Was it when, in a later period in the political history of our country, the legal profession vainly resisted the election of the highest judicial officers by the people? Or was it during those periods of our national history, when the people demanded, frequently against the will and effort of powerful monopolies, those great reforms of government, essential to the well being and prosperity of the country? And do gentlemen believe that the people, skilled as they are in the science and policy of governments, will heed the warning voice of those who have ever resisted their onward progress in perfecting the organic law of State governments?

We, sir, are a progressive people; this is a progressive nation, and this too is an age of great and rapid advancement in all those reforms of government, which have made this the greatest among the nations of the earth. But, while these radical and rapid changes are being made, not only in the affairs of government, but in the great departments of science and industry; why is it that gentlemen apprehend so great and direful evils in the discontinuance of a system, which is an anomaly in our form of government. Are they so wedded to this relic of barbarous and monarchical ages. this secret inquisition, where malice and revenge, hatred and perjury, go unrebuked and unpunished, and where the character and liberty of the citizen is but too often at the mercy of the vicious and depraved, that all efforts to change or modify it, is to be frowned down by the force of numbers? How much more would it comport with the spirit and humanity of the age, if, instead of laboring to retain this iniquitous tribunal, we should labor to devise a more humane and equally efficient one for the punishment of crimes. All acknowledge that the system has been prostituted to the basest of purposes, and the worst of crimes; and many believe that it is the great charnel house of character, sweeping in its resistless current, to ruin and despair, the innocent as well as the guilty.

It is a great mistake, Mr. President, that the legal profession are more familiar with the Grand Jury system, than the people generally. It is seldom that a lawyer, except the Prosecuting Attorney, enters the Grand Jury room; and whenever he does, it is for the purpose of giving information of some violation of the penal laws of the State. True, much practical knowledge of the working of this tribunal is acquired in open court, and in the examination of criminal cases; but this information does not impress one favorably with the system.

There is much, even in the prosecution of criminals, to the prejudice of Grand Juries. Hardly a case comes up for trial, where one or more of the witnesses for the prosecution does not exhibit bitterness of feeling, or strong bias, against the accused; so much so, as to make him the object of severe animadversion by the attorney for the defense. And this is not only frequently, but almost always the case. What, then, must be the character of much of the testimony given before a Grand Jury? Here is a secret and ex parte examination. The accused person is not there—his counsel is not there, nor are his witnesses present. The examination is not only without his knowledge, but for the avowed purpose of hearing evidence of his guilt, and of pronouncing judgment of criminality against him; and that, too, upon testimony oftentimes engendered by malice and revenge. And this is the institution which has been represented as one of the essential elements of enlarged liberty, and one of the main bulwarks of our free institutions.

This system, with its inquisitorial power, strikes at that just and humane provision of the law, which declares that all persons charged with crime are presumed innocent, until the contrary appears. But the bare finding of an indictment against a person, creates the presumption of guilt, not in law, 'tis true, but before that more terrible tribunal, public sentiment. And it is impossible for him to escape, however innocent, the blighting consequences of this public suspicion of his guilt.

But, Mr. President, there are other objections to this system, if possible, of a still more serious character. Without intending to call in question the honesty of motive, or integrity of character of Grand Juries, there is no sophistry which can possibly shield them from the allegation of having uniformly given a too willing ear to complaints originating in personal dislikes, and which have been the prolific source of long and bitter controversies, not unfrequently ending in scenes of the most startling and appalling character. How often is it the case, that this class of indictments, which are seldom, if ever sustained, deeply affect the peace of entire communities, and the happiness and prosperity of whole families. I know many instances where prominent citizens have been indicted for supposed breaches of the peace, or petty misdemeanors, which have created and kept the members of society in a state of excitement and hostility toward each other for years.

But, shall I be told that these cases are exceptions to the general rule, and that it is unwise and dangerous to determine the character of the system by this mode of reasoning? Undoubtedly, if this class of indictments are exceptions to this rule, I am wrong. But are
